

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

ART. I.—POETRY UNDER A CLOUD.

1. The Song of Hiawatha. By Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. London: David Bogue, Fleet-street. 1855.
2. The Mystic and other Poems. By Philip James Bailey, Author of "Festus." London: Chapman and Hall, Piccadilly. 1855.
3. Men and Women. By Robert Browning, in two Vols. London: Chapman and Hall, Piccadilly. 1855.

It is with pain we feel ourselves obliged to state, that if some very great reformation does not shortly take place, in the minds of our gifted literary men, it will be found impossible to withstand the rapid and inevitable decay of poetical taste in these countries. Some years ago we were of opinion, that notwithstanding the many grave errors which disfigured the verse of our modern poets, there was still sufficient evidence therein of rational reflection, comprehensive power, and exalted beauty, to warrant us in concluding that their poetry adequately reflected the spirit of the age. Locksley Hall, The Miller's Daughter, Oriana, Lady Clara Vere de Vere, The Lotus Eaters, or indeed any of the poems which Tennyson published, in 1830, and 1842, or subsequently, The Princess, and In Memoriam, possessed qualities which redeemed their imperfections. On the other hand, though Bailey had given birth to the most extravagant absurdities, he had also produced some of the most eloquent passages which had been written since the time of Byron: Browning, who doubtless perpetrated such literary atrocities as Paracelsus, Pippa Passes, and Sordello, had made compensation by his Blot on the Scutcheon, and Colombe's Birth Day: and Longfellow, by adopting, and developing their beautiful peculiarities, had identified himself with our Chaucer, Spenser, Goldsmith, and Thompson. It is sad to think how every one of these poets has since undone himself. Tennyson, all are aware, has almost approached the bounds which separate reason from idiocy, in his truly incomprehensible Maud; and we now feel bound to inform such of our readers, as do not already know the fact, that Longfellow's Song of Hiawatha, is quite unworthy of the Author of The Psalm of Life, Autumn, The Slave's Dream, or Evangeline; that Bailey's Mystic is immeasurably inferior to Festus, or The Angel World; and that Browning's Men and Women, must seriously injure the Author's reputation as a poet. If the love of mystification, and inane scribbling, confined itself to any one of our distinguished poets, the consequences would not be so injurious; but, unfortunately, all those whom we were wont to point to, as the shining lights of British poetry, have emulated each other in this course of folly, and would seemingly sacrifice, in the most reckless and demented manner, the pleasant vales, and sunny slopes of Parnassus, in order that they might breathe the atmosphere of Bedlam, and dash themselves, in spasmodic fury, against its iron bars.

The evil consequences resulting from their indulgence in this lamentable vice, have already exhibited themselves in no limited manner, in the effusions of our "Minor Minstrels," as every bookshop in the three kingdoms shows, and as the pages of every provincial journal exhibit. Where is all this to end? Have we indeed arrived at the iron age of English poetry? Is it possible that we have already seen our last great Bard, and that the massive portals of Westminster Abbey are never more to grate upon their hinges, for the reception of another tenant in Poets' corner? Is that long line at last filled up, which sparkles with the names of Milton, Spenser, Pope, Dryden, Coleridge, Shelley, Byron; of Shakspeare, and Ben Johnson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger and Ford, Congreve, Wycherly, and Farquhar? A sad prospective indeed, but what if true? We have had already the golden age of our great Dramatist, corresponding to that of Virgil, Horace, and Juvenal in Rome, we have had the silver age of Scott, Byron, Moore, Wordsworth, answering to that of Lucretius, Catullus, Lucan, and Propertius; a little interval, and the deepening shadows of the iron age, the "Sæculum ferri," must descend upon us, if its advent be not retarded by the presence of some peerless luminary, whose light, like that of the Aurora Borealis, in northern winters, dispels the brooding darkness which hangs over the earth, and cheers the pining Laplander by the benignity of its beams. Systematic freethinking, obscurity, and utter disregard of harmony, may safely be considered, as the great impediments which prevent our present poets from achieving greatness. They use the most harsh and discordant metres, they select subjects whose uninteresting nature it is impossible to surpass, they garnish them with sprigs of infidelity, and impertinent assumptions, the silliest, and most vapid ; and stretching them out as far as dulness and insipidity can extend, crown their unhallowed work, with a fog wreath, the thickest and most enduring, which quickly disperses its misty vapour over all. Voltaire, Volney, and Rousseau, were called with much reason the Philosophers of impiety; our own Thomas Paine underwent a scourging at the hands of an army of English divines and philanthropists ; Schelling, Kant, and Fichte, were scouted at for their infidelity ; but we doubt if it will not be found that some of our modern poets have promulgated as many dangerous doctrines, (and more imposing from their fascinating dress,) as any of those great infidel notorieties. Such habitual sinning against the doctrines of our common Christianity, must be combated, "vi et armis." We all know that revolutions are not made of rose water, that desperate cases require desperate remedies, and that if a growing evil of considerable strength and magnitude, be not met and opposed by vigorous counteracting measures, "the bad may become too strong for the good." It is for this reason therefore, we would earnestly invite the cooperation of all well regulated minds, in our stern denunciation of these fashionable evils : it is for this we would gladly behold the organization of a literary crusade, by some Peter of the intellectual world, whose energies would never flag, and whose numbers would know no diminution, until the blessed flags of virtue, taste, and judgement, should triumphantly wave above the baneful principles they had supplanted. If ever there was a time in which it were seeming we should lend the weight of our opinions, and the force of our example, to crush the snake—encircled head of the foul Erinnyes of infidelity, surely it should be now, during the existence of a war, which may effect so much for the liberty of mankind.

We are all aware, how much a healthy and vigorous contemporaneous Literature contributes to render the springs of human action, in the sacred cause of truth, and justice, buoyant and elastic; how much it tends to ennoble our feelings, refine our understandings, and purify our impulses: how it sharpens our wits to discern insidious machinations, renders us chary of our rights, zealous in their maintenance, or recovery, intolerant of errors, conservative of all that is excellent and wise: and lastly, how it causes us to sympathize with the universal world, in all that should bind man to man. Surely the knowledge of all this should be sufficient to make "the heart leap awake to its voice," and lead the mind to steady and sustained action in the proper field. We can do no more than hope for this desirable result, which, convinced of the important benefits likely to arise therefrom, we, in all sincerity wish for,—and from the bottom of our hearts.

In the pursuance of our undertaking, Longfellow's Song of Hiawatha, shall be our earliest care: judging its accomplished Author by his former poetical creations, by those philosophical beauties, which we were wont to admire with such keen pleasure, by the purity of language, and the elevation of idea, which so universally adorned them, we naturally expected that his next work would be remarkable for a manifestation of the increasing power of that fine intellect, and if possible, for the still loftier aspirings of that noble soul. We regret to state that our expectations have not been realized; but, on the contrary, have suffered deep and grievous disappointment. Hiawatha, in our opinion, is weak, puny and insipid; a Poem whose uninteresting pages are not redeemed by any striking beauty, utterly destitute of vigor, or manly enthusiasm, and not calculated in any way to expand the mind, or improve the understanding. Placing it side by side, with any of Longfellow's earlier volumes, for example, with that which contains The Psalm of Life, The Voices of the Night, &c., &c., we consider applicable to the former, the criticism which Padladeen, indeed inappropriately passed on one of our sweetest poems: namely, that, "this flimsy manufacture of the brain, in comparison with the lofty and durable monuments of genius, is as the gold filagree work of Zamara, beside the eternal architecture of Egypt." We may be informed with much speciousness, that we are not regarding Hiawatha in its proper light: that to do so, we should hold in mind that its Author, in writing this Poem, proposed to himself, the rescuing from oblivion, some traditions of the North American Indians, with a view to the enrichment of his country's literature; and that this laudable motive is sufficient, in itself, to ensure for the work a favorable reception from the public. Even if the first part of this proposition were true, (a fact which we must be permitted to doubt,) we cannot bring ourselves to admit the justice of a conclusion, which is so sophistically deduced. For, conceding the worthiness of the object in contemplation, we utterly deny the existence of any conformity between that object and the manner in which it is carried out. To us it would seem essential to the success of such an undertaking, that something more than the mere traditions should be followed: that ideas calculated to awaken the interest, and excite the sympathy of an educated mind, should have been superadded to the childish narrative of the savage; and that the genius of the age should leave its salutary impress on the wild imaginings in the fable. Here was a subject to draw forth the magic pencil of description! On such a canvass what unfading colors could not be limned, what forms of novel beauty could not be raised, what phases of the mind of primeval man might not be shadowed forth? This indeed was a theme inviting the Poet to unfold still more widely the workings of that magnanimous heart, many of whose sublime emotions have been made familiar to us by the delightful Author of The Prairie, The Spy, The Last of the Mohicans, The Deer Slayer, and The Water Witch. The wild faith of that primitive creature,

"Whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind," his figurative language, passionate temperament, and romantic disposition, were all fit materials for the beautifying of the Indian Legend; and in like manner might be added, not alone with the greatest propriety, but with a certainty of conducing in no inconsiderable manner to the heightening of the general effect, pictures of that stupendous scenery, whose varied features constitute the aristocracy of nature. But Longfellow would appear to have discovered no advantage in availing himself of these resources: to our mind he has acted as if they had no existence. In form of idea, in cast of thought, and in mode of expression, his portraits of the American Indian, are as unlike what from all accounts we had supposed him, as indeed they well could be; we had fancied him intensely imaginative, emphatically graphic in his speech, and unequalled in the exuberance of his imagery : in Hiawatha, he is prosaic, tautological, feeble, and often painfully discordant. But now a question may naturally arise ; has The Song of Hiawatha, in reality sprung from Indian Legends ? Do its materials properly belong to the Indian Edda ? Our answer is a most decided negative, which we will now proceed to justify.

In the "Beiträge zur genauren Kenntniss der Ebstnischen Sprache" ("Contributions to a more intimate knowledge of the Esthonian language"), may be seen a contribution by Carl Jaak Peterson, on the Finnish Mythology : in it he speaks of Jumala, the supreme god of the Finns, of Rauni, of Ukko, corresponding to the Jupiter of the Greeks and Romans, of Abaan-Emonen his wife, and amongst others of the celebrated Wäinämöinen. This Wäinämöinen is the hero of the "Kalewala," the great national Epic of the Finns. The name of the author of this singular production, (if indeed, which is questionable, it be the work of one individual) is not recorded. After living for centuries among the Finlanders, the fragments of this extraordinary poem, have at last been collected, and now present almost a perfect form. Alexander Castren, having made extensive journeys through Finland, with the most praiseworthy zeal, for the purpose of taking down the ballads, as he heard them sung by the peasants, on the long winter nights, by their blazing log fires, has given us a most excellent Swedish translation. In 1845, a French translation was published by Leuzen Le Duc ; another, in German, was printed at Helsingfors, in 1852, by Auton Schiefner, and dedicated to Castren : the latest by Dr Lonnrot, was published in 1849, and contains fifty songs, or runes, and twenty-two thousand, seven hundred and ninety-three verses. Now, it will inevitably be discovered upon examination, that Longfellow has embodied in Hiawatha, the entire form, spirit, and many of the most striking incidents in the Finnish Epics, and that, therefore, his new poem, is no English version, or amplification of the Indian Edda, but a simple appropriation of the prominent stories in the Finnish Kalewala. The resemblance between the two poems is so close, as to preclude the possibility of its being accidental ; and yet the author of Hiawatha, makes no further acknowledgment as to the source from whence he has taken his materials, than is to be found in his first note, where he speaks of "this Indian Edda."

Our subject will not, of course, permit us to give a detailed narrative of the plot of The Kalewala, but the outline which we now subjoin for the reader's examination, will, when he compares it with the frame work of Hiawatha, or even with that description of it, which we shall hereafter lay before him, be sufficient to shew the very great similarity which exists between them. The hero of the poem is Wäinämöinen, son of the daughter of the air, who let herself down from heaven into the sea, and was there wooed by the Storm Wind. After wandering on the face of the waters for ages upon ages, he at length reaches the land, and begins his career as a benefactor of man. Then follows a description of his exploits and adventures, extending through forty-nine runes. When at last his mission is accomplished, Wäinämöinen enters his boat, sails away over the sea, and is finally seen mingling with the clouds. Let us now compare the prelude of Hiawatha, with the following extract from that of the Kalewala (from the German translation), into English of the same metre, which is also that of the original :—

HIAWATHA.

SHOULD you ask me, whence these stories?
Whence these legends and traditions,
With the odours of the forest,
With the dew and damp of meadows,
With the curling smoke of wigwams,
With the rushing of great rivers,
With their frequent repetitions,
And their wild reverberations,
As of thunder in the mountains?
I should answer, I should tell you,
"From the forests and the prairies,
From the great lakes of the Northland,
From the land of the Ojibways,
From the land of the Dacotahs,
From the mountains, moors, and fenlands,
Where the heron, the Shuh-shuh-gah,
Feeds among the reeds and rushes."

I repeat them as I heard them
From the lips of Nawadaha,
The musician, the sweet singer."

Should you ask where Nawadaha
Found these songs, so wild and wayward,
Found these legends and traditions,
I should answer, I should tell you,
"In the birds'-nests of the forest,
In the lodges of the beaver,
In the hoof-prints of the bison,
In the eyry of the eagle!
"All the wild-fowl sang them to him
In the moorlands and the fenlands,
In the melancholy marshes;
Chetowalk, the plover, sang them,
Mahng, the loon, the wild goose, Wawa,
The blue heron, the Shuh-shuh-gah,
And the grouse, the Mushkodasa!"

THE KALEWALA.

These the words we have received,
These the songs we do inherit,
Are of Wainamöinen's girdle,
From the forge of Ilmarinen,
Of the sword of Kankorimeli,
Of the bow of Youkohainen,
Of the borders of the North-fields,
Of the plains of Kalewala.

These my father sung afore time,
As he chipped the hatchet's handle;
These were taught me by my mother,
As she twirled her flying spindles;
When I on the floor was sporting,
Round her knee was gaily dancing,
As a pitiable weakling,
As a weakling small of stature;

Never failed these wond'rous stories,
Told of Sampo, told of Louhi:
Old grew Sampo in the stories;
Louhi vanished with her magic;
In the songs Wiunen perished;
In the play died Lemminkäinen.

There are many other stories,
Magic sayings, which I learned,
Which I gathered by the wayside.
Called amid the heather-blossoms,
Rifled from the bushy coppes;
From the bending twigs I plucked them
Plucked them from the tender grasses,
When a shepherd boy I sauntered,
As a lad upon the pastures,
On the honey-bearing meadows,
On the gold-blumin'd hillock,
Following black Muurikki
At the side of spotted Kimmo.

Songs the very coldness gave me,
Music found I in the rain-drops;
Other songs the winds brought to me,

Other songs, the ocean-billows;
Birds, by singing in the branches,
And the tree-top spoke in whispers.

Without discussing the adaptability of the metre (the trochaic dimeter), in which Hiawatha is written, to the subject of the poem, which we make bold to affirm, the reader of five pages, will determine to its disadvantage, we come now to the story as it is given us by Longfellow. Gitche Manito, the mighty, seeing the necessity of putting an end to the constant battles and dissensions, which took place between the different savage tribes, convokes a meeting of the various nations, impresses upon them the wickedness of their past lives, and having previously broken a portion of the "red pipe stone quarry" on which he is standing, and "moulded it into a pipe head," he smokes it, "the calumet, the peace pipe," and urges them to follow his example, to live in amity with one another, assuring them that he will send a prophet amongst them, who shall guide and teach them, and also toil and suffer in their behalf. Then, "the Master of Life," having received their promise that his instructions shall be attended to, ascends in volumes of smoke from his peace pipe, to, "the doorways of the Heaven."

Hiawatha, the prophet, sent by Gitche Manito, is the offspring of Wenonah and the West Wind. Wenonah's mother, Nokomis, is the daughter of the Moon, and thus is her appearance on the earth accounted for.

She was sporting with her women,
Swinging in a swing of grape-vines,
When her rival, the rejected,
Full of jealousy and hatred,
Cut the leafy swing asunder,
Cut in twain the twisted grape-vines,

And Nokomis fell affrighted
Downward through the evening twilight,
On the Muskoday, the meadow,
On the prairie full of blossoms.
"See! a star falls!" said the people;
"From the sky a star is falling!"

The West Wind, Mudjekeewis, proves a faithless lover, the result of which is, that Wenonah taking it to heart, 'dies of grief, and the old crone Nokomis becomes the guardian of the young Hiawatha. His grandmother teaches the stripping many things, he gradually becomes acquainted with the different animals, and their peculiarities, learns the names of the different signs in the heavens, and proves himself a rare instance of the precocity of genius. In time, he cultivates the acquaintance of Iagoo the great boaster, who makes a bow and arrows for Hiawatha, and literally teaches "the young idea how to shoot."

Forth into the forest straightway
 All alone walked Hiawatha
 Proudly, with his bow and arrows;
 And the birds sang round him, o'er him,
 'Do not shoot us, Hiawatha!'
 Sang the Opechee, the robin,
 Sang the blue-bird, the Owaissa,
 "Do not shoot us, Hiawatha!"
 Up the oak-tree, close beside him,
 Sprang the squirrel, Adjidaumo,
 In and out among the branches.
 Cooched and chattered from the oak-tree,
 Laughed, and said between his laughing,
 "Do not shoot me, Hiawatha!"
 And the rabbit from his pathway
 Leaped aside, and at a distance
 Sat erect upon his haunches,
 Half in fear and half in frolic,
 Saying to the little hunter,

"Do not shoot me, Hiawatha!"
 But he heeded not, nor heard them,
 For his thoughts were with the red deer;
 On their tracks his eyes were fastened,
 Leading downward to the river,
 To the ford across the river,
 And as one in slumber walked he.
 Hidden in the alder-bushes,
 There he waited till the deer came,
 Till he saw two antlers lifted,
 Saw two eyes look from the thicket,
 Saw two nostrils point to windward,
 And a deer came down the pathway,
 Flecked with leafy light and shadow.
 And his heart within him fluttered,
 Trembled like the leaves above him,
 Like the birch-leaf palpitated,
 As the deer came down the pathway.

Having shewn his facetious friends, the Opechee, the Owaissa, and the Adjidaumo, that he has higher game in his eye than they are, he is ambitious to prove himself a crack-shot, so taking steady aim, he shoots the arrow, kills the roebuck, and carries him home, where he receives the hearty congratulations of Iagoo and Nokomis.

"Tempore ruricolæ patiens fit taurus aratro, Praebet et incurvo collo, premendo jugo."

And so, Time, the great teacher, accustoms Hiawatha to all the hardships of the hunter's life.

Out of childhood into manhood
 Now had grown my Hiawatha,
 Skilled in all the craft of hunters,
 Learned in all the lore of old men,
 In all youthful sports and pastimes,
 In all manly arts and labours.
 Swift of foot was Hiawatha;
 He could shoot an arrow from him,

And run forward with such fleetness,
 That the arrow fell behind him!
 Strong of arm was Hiawatha;
 He could shoot ten arrows upward, Shoot them with such strength and swiftness,
 That the tenth had left the bow-string
 Ere the first to earth had fallen!

This forcibly reminds us of the verse,

"Queen Bess was a charming woman,
 She knew both Latin and Greek,
 I'm told she could solve a problem
 In Euclid before she could speak."

With manhood comes the love of adventure, and Hiawatha, who had a pair of mittens, Minjekahwun, which, when he wore, he could smite rocks into powder, and mocassons which enabled him to advance a mile in every stride, determines to find out Mudjekeewis, and punish him for his treachery to his mother. Having crossed the Mississippi, the mountains of the prairie, the land of crows and foxes, and the dwellings of the Blackfeet, he arrives at the residence of Mudjekeewis,

"Ruler of the winds of Heaven."

All who have ever been at a public school are aware of the pugilistic tendencies of boys, and Hiawatha, now a young man, retains all the quarrelsome spirit of early youth, though his mode of fighting is more terrible, than that of those who figure "in the fisty ring." Evincing an amount of pluck, which might have excited the envy of the Tipton Slasher, he exhibits what we are assured by various writers in Bell's Life, is "one of the best signs," and picking a quarrel with his father, he "comes to the fight laughing."

And he cried, "O Mudjekeewis,
It was you who killed Wenonah,
Took her young life and her beauty,
Broke the Lily of the Prairie,
Trampled it beneath your footsteps;
You confess it! you confess it!"
And the mighty Mudjekeewis
Tossed his gray hairs to the West-Wind,
Bowed his hoary head in anguish,
With a silent nod assented.

Then up started Hiawatha
And with threatening look and gesture
Laid his hand upon the black rock,
On the fatal Wawbeek laid it,
With his mittens, Minjekshwun,
Rant the jutting crag asunder,

Smote and crushed it into fragments,
Hurled them madly at his father,
The remorseful Mudjekeewis.
For his heart was hot within him,
Like a living coal his heart was.

But the ruler of the West-Wind
Blew the fragments backward from him,
With the breathing of his nostrils,
With the tempest of his anger,
Blew them back at his assailant;
Seized the bulrush, the Apukwa,
Dragged it with its roots and fibres
From the margin of the meadow,
From its ooze, the giant bulrush;
Long and loud laughed Hiawatha!

The combat lasts for three whole days, during the entire time of which Mudjekeewis retreated, fighting. At length the strife is put an end to, Mudjekeewis having informed Hiawatha, that, "he bears a charmed life." He instructs his son to go home, compliments him on his valour, and bids him slay all the monsters, magicians, giants, and serpents, which infest the hunting grounds of his people. Hiawatha follows his advice, and departs homeward, calling on his way at the lodge of an arrow maker, of the tribe of the Dacotahs, who has got a handsome daughter, Minnehaha, Laughing Water, whose beauty you may well guess, and not the arrows of her father, was the principal cause of the visit. Our hero, like a true philanthropist, proposes to himself a fast, which has for its object the amelioration of the condition of his race. For three whole days he fasted without interruption, but on the evening of the fourth, he sees a youth approaching to him, dressed in garments of green and yellow.

"Plumes of green bent o'er his forehead,
And his hair was soft and golden."

The youth by name, Mondamin, informs Hiawatha that "he is the friend of Man," and is sent by "the Master of Life," to shew him, how by wrestling with him, (Mondamin), he may gain his prayer. Hiawatha wrestles with him for three consecutive evenings, and on the occasion of their third engagement, Mondamin tells him how he will be victorious the following evening, how he will kill Mondamin, and how he is to bury him in such a manner as to prevent the ravens and the worms from interfering with his slumber in the grave. Hiawatha obeys his instructions, and when he has killed his opponent, he buries him as he was directed, and now that his seven days of fasting had expired, he returns home. On his return, in a few days to, see that the grave of Mondamin was undisturbed, he is surprised to observe, a small green feather, which, "From the Earth shot slowly upward:" it turns out to be the maize crop, by means of which the Nation is to receive the blessings of plenty.

Day by day did Hiawatha
Go to wait and watch beside it;
Kept the dark mould soft above it,
Kept it clean from weeds and insects,
Drove away with scoffs and shoutings,
Kahgahgee, the king of ravens.
Till at length a small green feather
From the earth shot slowly upward.

Then another and another,
And before the Summer ended
Stood the maize in all its beauty,
With its shining robes about it,
And its long, soft, yellow tresses;
And in rapture Hiawatha
Cried aloud, "It is Mondamin!"
Yes, the friend of man, Mondamin!"

Hiawatha has two friends, "Chibiabos, the musician," and "the very strong man, Kwasind," assisted by whom we infer, he was in the first instance to refine the people by music, and in the second, to hew down the mighty forests which impeded cultivation. Anon, Hiawatha takes to carpentry, and having made himself a canoe, goes forth upon the waters with a view to fishing. He casts his line forth, but unfortunately catches a Tartar in the person of Nahma, "the King of Fishes," who swallows Hiawatha, canoe and all. This is, all, well worthy of Baron Munchausen, or might have happened to Gulliver in the Kingdom of Brobdignag; and we would not be surprised to hear that it has awakened no little amount of jealousy in the breasts of such men as Mansfield Parkyns, and Charles Waterton.

Hiawatha's first care is to discover the heart of "the King of Fishes," which, when he finds, he belabours lustily with his fists, until finally having worn out the monster, who reels and staggers in the water, he chuckles to hear its gigantic body grate upon the strand. A flock of sea gulls descending to feast upon the dead sturgeon, are entreated by Hiawatha to make cavities in the sides of the animal with their claws: they answer his behest, very much encouraged, (as also the squirrel which happened to have been in the canoe at the time of the accident), by Hiawatha's assurance, that they shall be known for the future, under the different appellations of Kayashk, anglice, "the noble scratchers," and Adjidaamo, "tail-in-air-up," which we suppose are equivalent to the decoration of the cross of the Legion of Honour, and the Order of the Knights Commanders of the Bath.

Then said Hiawatha to him,
"O my little friend, the squirrel,
Bravely have you toiled to help me:
Take the thanks of Hiawatha,

And the name which now he gives you;
For hereafter and for ever
Boys shall call you Adjidaamo, Tail-in-air the boys shall call you!"

Again—

"O ye sea-gulls! O my brothers!
I have slain the sturgeon, Nahma;
Make the rifts a little larger,
With your claws the openings widen.
Set me free from this dark prison,

And henceforward and for ever
Men shall speak of your achievements,
Calling you Kayashk, the sea gulls,
Yea, Kayashk, the Noble Scratchers!"

The tale would of course be nothing, without some of the "old, old story," and the Poet, (in a lucid interval), beautifully and truthfully tells us.

"As unto the bow the cord is,
So unto the man is woman,
Though she bends him, she obeys him,

Though she draws him, yet she follows,
Useless each without the other!"

Hiawatha woos and wins Minnehaha, the Laughing Water, and the daughter of the "ancient arrow-maker." We incline to the opinion that this is the best part of the book, and, "the Journey Home," is, it must be confessed, rather beautifully described. A wedding feast follows, as a matter of course, where the capacity of Iagoo, as a spinner of yarns, is tested, and found to be magnificent. After this, affairs begin to wind up very much in the same manner, as they do in the fifth act of Hamlet. There is to be sure a good deal of jargon about blessing the corn fields, picture writing, &c. &c., through which the Metre acts the part of the horrid bells, beating time to the heavy rumbling of an abominable French Diligence; but as far as the characters are concerned, θανατος μιλιαιος is now the order of the day. Owing to some fatality, possibly akin to that of Samson's losing his hair, the "very strong man Kwasind," finds all his strength ineffectual, and is literally clubbed to death. Pau-puk-keewis, an exquisite of the first water, a sort of primitive Beau Brummell, and a decided bore into the bargain, is obliged to make his exit, and the celebrated musician Chibiabos is also removed from the scene. Shortly after the disappearance of these worthies, we are introduced into the interesting company of ghosts, who, unlike the majority of ghosts, have an inordinate passion for eating and drinking whatever they can lay hold of. The next chapter conveys the sad intelligence of a famine, to which dire visitation, poor "Laughing Water," falls an early victim. Here in like manner, it pleases Longfellow to be again himself; the following passage reads all the better for the sea of trash which surrounds it.

O the long and dreary Winter !
O the cold and cruel Winter !
Ever thicker, thicker, thicker
Froze the ice on lake and river,
Ever deeper, deeper, deeper
Fell the snow o'er all the landscape,
Fell the covering snow, and drifted
Through the forest, round the village.
Hardly from his buried wigwam
Could the hunter force a passage ;
With his mittens and his snow-shoes
Vainly walked he through the forest,
Sought for bird or beast and found none,
Saw no track of deer or rabbit,

In the snow beheld no footprints,
In the ghastly, gleaming forest
Fell, and could not rise from weakness,
Perished there from cold and hunger.
O the famine and the fever !
O the wasting of the famine !
O the blasting of the fever !
O the wailing of the children !
O the anguish of the women !
All the earth was sick and famished ;
Hungry was the air around them,
Hungry was the sky above them,
And the hungry stars in heaven
Like the eyes of wolves glared at them !

But lo ! the scene shifts ! A change comes o'er the spirit of the Author's dream, and the White Man, the herald of civilization, descends upon the stage.

From his wanderings far to eastward,
From the regions of the morning
From the shining land of Wabun,
Homeward now returned Iagoo,
The great traveller, the great boaster,
Full of new and strange adventures,
Marvels many and many wonders.

And the people of the village
Listened to him as he told them
Of his marvellous adventures,
Laughing answered him in this wise :
" Ugh ! it is indeed Iagoo !
No one else beholds such wonders ! "

He had seen, he said, a water
Bigger than the Big-Sea-Water,
Broader than the Gitche Gumee,
Bitter so that none could drink it !
At each other looked the warriors,
Looked the women at each other,
Smiled, and said, " It cannot be so !
Kaw ! " they said, " It cannot be so ! "

O'er it, said he, o'er this water
Came a great canoe with pinions,

A canoe with wings came flying,
Bigger than a grove of pine-trees,
Taller than the tallest tree-tops !
And the old men and the women
Looked and tittered at each other ;
" Kaw ! " they said, " we don't believe it ! "
From its mouth, he said, to greet him,
Came Waywassimo, the lightning,
Came the thunder, Annemeeks !
And the warriors and the women
Laughed aloud at poor Iagoo ;
" Kaw ! " they said, " what tales you tell us ! "

In it, said he, came a people,
In the great canoe with pinions
Came, he said, a hundred warriors ;
Painted white were all their faces,
And with hair their chins were covered !
And the warriors and the women
Laughed and shouted in derision,
Like the ravens on the tree-tops,
Like the crows upon the hemlock.
" Kaw ! " they said, " what lies you tell us !
Do not think that we believe them ! "

Hiawatha, however, who has seen in a vision the approach of the White Man, assures his people of the truth of Iagoo's story, and proposes to give the strangers a hearty reception. In good time the traveller and his retinue arrive.

O'er the water floating flying,
Something in the hazy distance,
Something in the mists of morning,
Loomed and lifted from the water,
Now seemed floating, now seemed flying,

Coming nearer, nearer, nearer.
Was it Shingebis the diver ?
Was it the pelican, the Shada ?
Or the heron, the Shuh-shuh-gah ?
Or the white goose, Waw-be-wawa ?

With the water dripping, flashing
 From its glossy neck and feathers?
 It was neither goose nor diver,
 Neither pelican nor heron
 O'er the water floating, flying.
 Through the shining mist of morning,
 But a birch-canoe with paddles,
 Rising, sinking on the water,

Dripping, flashing in the sunshine,
 And within it came a people
 From the distant land of Wabun,
 From the farthest realms of morning
 Came the Black-Robe chief, the Prophet,
 He the Priest of Prayer, the Pale-face,
 With his guides and his companions.

Like Moses, who died when he had reached the promised land, Hiawatha, his mission over, prepares for his departure, leaving the White Man to perfect what he has begun.

On the shore stood Hiawatha,
 Turned and waved his hand at parting;
 On the clear and luminous water
 Launched his birch-canoe for sailing.

From the pebbles of the margin
 Shoved it forth into the water;
 Whispered to it, "Westward! westward!"
 And with speed it darted forward.

Thus Hiawatha vanishes; as Longfellow tells us—

Thus departed Hiawatha,
Hiawatha the Beloved,
 In the glory of the sunset,
 In the purple mists of evening,
 To the regions of the home-wind,

Of the Northwest wind Keewaydin,
 To the Islands of the Blessed,
 To the kingdom of Ponemah,
 To the land of the Hereafter!

This sketch we have drawn, will suffice to give the reader a pretty good idea of the plot of Hiawatha, and of the general character of the poem. He will not have failed to observe the great similarity between it, and the outline of the Kalewala, or Kalevala of the Finns. Wainamoinen's parents, "The Storm Wind," and the "Daughter of the Air," are marvellously like those of Hiawatha, namely, "The West Wind," and the "Daughter of the Moon." Again, the former commencing his career as a benefactor of man, reminds us forcibly of the promise of Gitché Manito at the commencement of Hiawatha, that he would send a prophet amongst the people, who would guide, and teach, toil, and suffer, for them: the exploits and adventures of the two heroes follow, and finally, both depart from the earth in a boat, and ascend to heaven. The extracts we have given are, to our mind, very fair instances of the poetry of the book, and we shall now leave the readers to draw their own conclusions, merely expressing our sincere wish, as ardent admirers of the genius of Longfellow, that if it be his intention to employ his valuable time, in carrying out the laudable and patriotic design of perpetuating the traditions of his country, he will, in the first place, take his materials, such as he finds them, at home, and secondly, that more character, vigor, and subjectivity, may be evidenced in the next offspring of his muse, than are visible in his so called, Indian Edda, Hiawatha.

In his new poem, the Author of Festus appears to us to have earned very little credit, beyond that which he deserves for the excellence of its name. The hero is indeed a mystic in the true sense of the word, and the whole book is the very essence of the most unintelligible species of mystery.

Festus, notwithstanding the magnificence of its language, was extravagant enough, Heaven knows ! but The Mystic fairly distances its antecessor, in obscure ideality, and incomprehensible symbolism. If the former was pantheistic, its Author was at least honest, and did not conceal the fact, but "The Mystic" is such a slippery gentleman, that his theological ideas elude your grasp with the activity of a spectre. No sooner have you congratulated yourself, upon at last discovering the colours which he has hoisted on the top gallant of his suspicious looking craft, than he either takes them down with the rapidity of lightning, and runs up others in their place, or like the Phantam Ship, in "Der Fleigender Hollander," disappears altogether from your ken. Our opinion of Hiawatha was not a very favorable one, but what can we say for The Mystic ? Or rather how can we express in language sufficiently strong, how heartily we condemn its unparalleled absurdities ? It is, (always excepting Sordello,) the most purposeless production we have ever beheld, and in like manner the most preposterous. The Mystic, good reader, is intended, we suppose, to represent the career of a divinely instructed soul, which "lived a threefold life through all the ages, and had seven different births, appearing under distinct attributes each time."

"Seven times his soul

Commingleing, leavened with its light the world."

He passes a thousand years as an oak, a million of suns in "the sea's arms," the same period of time among "the insect race," a myriad among the birds, and thrice that term among "all four footed tribes of nature," thus fully verifying the doctrine of Pythagoras. His first life is spent among the animals of the creation, every one of whom, from "the Ox Thunder begotten," to "the goat, sacred to sin in all rites," he cross examined with the dexterity of a Nisi Prius lawyer. After the case for the prosecution, or the defendant's, as the case might be, had closed, he departs for the mansions of the Gods, where he is conducted, by good demons, who protect him against the onslaughts of bad demons. Arrived at "the Heaven-wedding pyramid," we are told with seeming gravity, that our hero, "fainted in perfection!" "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" What are our poets about? The opening lines contain a very fair idea of the nature of the composition—

Who holds not life more yearful than the hours

Since first into this world he wept his way, Erreth much, may be. Called of God, man's soul

In patriarchal periods, cometiclike, Ranges perchance all spheres successive;
and in each,

With nobler powers endowed and senses
new,

Set season bideth. So with him, it seemed
Of whom I speak, the initiate of the light,
The adopted of the water and the sun.

Time's sand-dry streamlet through its glassy straits

Flowed ceaseless; and he lived a threefold life

Through all the ages; yea, seven times his soul

Commingling, leavened with its light the world.

First in the feasts of life, and the sun's son,

Through all God's homely universe he roamed

Lordly, and spake to earth the lore of stars,
The mother-tongue of Heaven our Fatherland.

Born to instate mankind in veriest truths,
By nature symbolled in gem, bloom, and wing;

To give to all the hope of bliss reserv ed,
And ultimate certainty of angelhood,
He, like a river which through gulleys, rocks
And deserts runs its purifying race

To Ocean's thrice regenerative depths,
Chose thorough all probations his own path,
And voluntary trode the downward way;

For they whose eyen by spirit-fire are purged

Move ever up the reascent to light,
On a celestial gradient, paved with wings;

Disrobed him of all privilege, and alone Suffered the dignities yearned for by the mass

But that he might ennoble servitude.

Very soon after this disclosure we are enlightened as to the endowments The Mystic received at his birth, and it is curious to remark here, the great likeness between a passage of Bailey's, and one of Calderon's, in "El Purgatorio de san Patricio."

From Bailey's Mystic.

He at his birth the starry stamps received,
For every limb held commune with its god,
And planetary gifts plenipotent;
The moon dispensed him riches, and the sun

Mind-wealth, that so before his dazéd eyne
The splendid spectrum of immortal fame
Perpetual danced; soul compulsory power,
The god of psychopompous function, round
Circling the sun with four-fold source, love's star.

The joys that come with beauteous shapes and eyes

Dewy and blue; courage the god-star red:
Supremacy and justice they who held
Successive, if usurped away, o'er the skies.

From Calderon's 'El Purgatorio de San Patricio.'

Sospecho,

Que todos siete planetas,
Turbados y descompuestos
Asistieron desiguales
A mi infeliz nacimiento.
La Luna me dio inconstancia
En la condicion, ingenio
Mercurio mal empleado, (Mejor fuera no tenerlo).
Venus lasciva me dio
Apetitos lisonjeras,
Y Marte animo cruel;

(Que no daran Marte y Venus?)

El sol me dio condicion
Muy generosa, y por serio,
Si no tengo que gastar,
Hurto y robo cuanto puedo;
Jupiter me dio soberbia,
De bizarros pensamientos;
Saturno colera y rabia,
Valor, y animo resuelto
A traiciones; y a estas causas
Se han seguido los efectos.

Jornada I.

I suspect that all

The planets seven, in wild confusion strange
Assisted at my most unhappy birth.

The fickle Moon gave me inconstancy,
Mercury gave me genius ill employed,
(Far better not to have received the gift!)
Lascivious Venus gave me siren passions.
And ruddy Mars a hard and cruel mind.
(What will not Mars and Venus jointly give?)

The Sun conferred upon me rank and state,—

Which to support I scrupled not the means;
Jupiter gave me pride and lofty thought;
And Saturn blended in my complex nature
Rage, anger, valour, and a ready mind;—
And fitting fruits have grown from out these lusts.

'Dramas of Calderon,' by D. F. M'Carthy.

After his second birth, he employs his time in leading men to do good, or in fasting, and in abstract contemplations of the Divinity.

Time's arid rivulet through its glassy gorge Laped ceaseless; and again, by Gunga's wave,
(O! life and bliss assuring fount of heaven,
The life-flowings divine of Deity,
How mighty, how mysterious is thy name!)

He, of a damsel, sacred to the god
With fellow maidens sporting, whom a cloud
Of sunset glory clasped, and circumfused With vital brilliance, dropping—next was born.

During this portion of his career, we learn to our great astonishment that:—

“The spirit,
Inured to meditate alone on God,
Pleasure no more can please, finds scant delight
In fragrant fields, grows discontent with Heaven.”

After his third birth, he sees the destruction, and rebirth of things, and warns man of their appearance. His presence this time is thus described—

Born of the tree blood-sapped, which, on the steep
Of knowledge, thrice, by vital wind, impregned,
Buds forth her life, the mother of the world,
Upon the royal rock four-faced, he dwelled,

The tripod mountain, with its jewelled feet
Long while; the orient side of silver pure;
Beryl, the brow which over-awes the sun,
When, abdicating Heaven, he calls the stars
To attest his end imperial; the dead north
Of glowing gold, the south of ruby paled.

The fourth time he comes into the world, he appears to have been engaged in the very ridiculous and preposterous occupation, of proving how infinity becomes finite.

Reason supreme him made innately wise,
The stars prophetic and the holy moon,
Interpreter to time of things eterne,
Ruler of rites and sacred festivals.
And the invisible heavens the giant world Through him instructed; him O! star of earth
Thou saddest, wisest, eldest of all lights!

The formless origin of things, and how,
Proceeding from itself, the infinite
Finite becomes: returning thitherward,
The finite infinite, whereby the parts,
O'erleaping the interstitial net of death,
Regain that continuity of soul
Which ones them with the boundless and divine.

Fifthly, that is to say, after his fifth birth, The Mystic seeks and finds Death, grapples with “the white monster,” smites him, and takes three drops of black blood from his heart, with which he proceeds “to purge the eye of wisest man.” Here is a piece of news for us.

Of the celestial vine, ten thousand branched,
Which stretcheth o'er the skiey roof of earth
Heaven's holy tree, whereon the luminous fruit
Of soul unborn, in glittering clusters hung,

One by one dropping into mortal moulds,
A golden shower, he tasted; and by stealth
Plucked from the pomegranates of Paradise,
Unknown to crowds, the secret fruit of life,
Star-orbed, immortal, ripe with solar seed
The single seed, deathful yet mastering death,

And knew himself divinised; for he,
With lots and holy honey-suckle crowned,
As well the bruised theangeline, which gives Prophetic sense, as juice of aglaophant,
That subjects to the eye the invisible world,
And hom sweet herblet of immortal life,
Sipped, till transmute he stood, star-headed; felt

His eyes irradiate with an inward light,
And recognized his angels where they wheeled,
Like mated falcons round their creanced
young,
Saluting him in rapture, man of men,
Sole son of life, the crown and heir of time.

He then gains admission into the company of certain "Mystics," "luminous, divine," "the first created witnesses of God," who, among other things, show him the "magic rose," from whose fragrance he gains knowledge of the past. Birth the sixth having taken place, we find that he has been made a present of the skies as a mantle, that he sits down to play a game of hazard with the Sun, fleeces him as well as ever a greenhorn was fleeced in a sponging house, "and plays such tricks before high heaven," as ought to make the "angels weep," though he would lead us to infer, that they were delighted with his gymnastics. Here is a glimpse reminding us very much of Hogarth's "Rake's Progress."

Thus conversant with gods, immortal, he
The pure perfection whence he fell regained,
Gifts plen-solar, and præ-astral powers,
Prophetic, and mnemonic of all time,
With added wisdom of all ill and good.
The gates of death he passed and doubly lived,
The gates of life, whereby the blest ascend;
Then drove his dragon chariot round the world,
Lashing with lightnings till they sweated
fire.
Gambling with golden dice, he of the Sun Won thrice his light; of ocean, deep by deep,

His boundless realms; of earth her countless lands;
But their own bade them take again, while he
One moment merged in that leviathan womb,
And through the starry tabernacles borne,
By seven bright maids immortal, (gleeful they
At the lost brightness refund) from the depths
Of heaven's siderial river drew and drank
The lymph divine of light, the dew of life.

The seventh transformation shews him eagerly endeavouring to discover "Truth," in pursuit of which he forsakes all luxuries.

For thrice nine years,
Through fits of silence, loneliness, fasting, toil,
He fought the foe of spirit and subdued.
The thrice thinned juices of the all-healing plant,
With moon-dews mingled and eye-brightening charms

The unseen to see, himself invisible;
Honey, and berries red of the eerie wood, Oakcorns and apples, roots and wheaton cates,
His fare and bever formed for twice an age,
With amber flowing mead at moonéd feasts.

We will allow the author to relate his eighth appearance:—

Initiate, mystic, perfected, epopt, Illuminate, adept, transcendent, he
Ivy-like, lived, and died, and again lived,
Resuscitant. On high his nest he wove
In the strange tree whereof man first was made,

Whose roots reach down to hell, whose topmost bough
Waves its bright leaflets in the air of heaven,
And communed with the universal life,
Beloved of lightning for its kindred birth,

That vivifies its veins; until possessed
Of all that could be known, the whole he knew;

Cropped where they grew the flowers of learning, massed
In meadowy beds, and bright with fragrant dew.

The above may be taken as a fair instance of the mysticism, pedantry, and purposeless nature of this truly incomprehensible Poem : take him again :—

Impowered in turn by those with chariest charms,
The sun, from dawn to night-noon, he out-eyed
From the peaked mountain which commands the world,
And earth's penumbral pinions, by her side Quivering; with him he leaped in joy of life
Immortal proven, hand in hand, through air ;
In sign whereof on that most holy day,

Heaven's globed flower whose perfume is the light,
Rose from the polar-north perpend, and not
With slow initial motion from the west,
As theretofore, in ages lost to time,
Ere coal-palm leaved, or pristine pine, now tomb'd
In earth's sepulchral centrals, had put forth
The mystic life-cone, fern her feathery stem.

And yet The Mystic, contains passages of much beauty, evidencing the great genius of their Author, but only adding tenfold to the censure, he deserves, who, gifted with such powers, has turned them to such a bad account : the following, but for a few conceited words, deserves the highest praise :—

Up shining streams and over odorous lakes,
In golden boat or silver, pearly oared, Dimpling the wave, he sped : or, dashing high
The fragrant foam ; and now his limbs imbathed
Amid immortal nymphs, serenely pure,
Like living lilies floating on the tide,
In love with their own shadows, as they lay Beneath the cooling moon. From sacred trees
Ambrosial fruit and gem-wrought raiment tinct
With the sun's infinite aureole, he culled ;
And walked resplendent with his meteor eyes

Thrice round the dragon king, world-lived, who saw
The first, and will the last of gods survive ;
So vast and vile a monster, heaven and earth
With thunderous groans and lurid blushes hid
Their starry heads, when God, in words of fire,
Asked them his generation.—Hell-begot, Hell-born, they said, we know no more of him.
Yet sought he not illumination thence,
But due confession of divinity ;
For, in the radiance of a frame divine,
In natal and celestial light he stood.

And here :—

Blessed with all visions holy and divine,
Communion holding only with the wise,
Silent in light (the radiant lizard loves
And lives in light, himself all constellate)
With Truth he joyed (as when the moon, disguised
Like naked nymph, her limbs of light revealed
To him, enamoured, on the Latmian hill, Whose touch was inspiration, whose embrace

Delfic, seemed absorption into heaven :)
Abstinent of all matter, every cause
Of mental perturbation, base desire,
Eradicate and razed, the lunar ark
Of pure regeneration awed he viewed ;
Beheld the eternal husbandman of heaven,
Who sowed with star-seed all the wilds of space,
Scattering the worlds broad-cast upon his way ;
And to that tilth celestial set his hand.

The next Poem, A Spiritual Legend, which has for its plot, the construction of the World, by the Angels, is a mere list, of all natural objects, and pedantic expressions. The most wearisome minuteness of detail is one of its prominent characteristics : let us take one example—

The angels scooped the lesser seas and lakes;

Baltic, and Midland, soundless; and that womb

Of nations, on whose life-devouring shore,
Far jutting into the black and bolsterous deep,

Sebastapolla, key of empire, stands;

The pool Mæotic, worshipped as a god

By Scythic hordes, and Amazonian dames

Militant, jealous of the dexter breast;

And Caspian, deep below whose silvery wave

God's Eden hideth, and the hallowed glebe;

Aral, Van, Baikal, holy lake, most vast

Of mountain meres; and Tahtar Kokonor;

Ladoga shoal, deep Leman; isleted

Lomond, subterraneous of access;

And many an iceless and unfathomed pool

On mountain crest, or cowering at the foot;

Ontario, Winnebago, and the Slave;

Yutah's; hard by where the polygamous

sect

(Misled by one self-unctioned, not anoint,

Nor golden oil of genius had, nor truth,
Who, from the brook the lines of lacquered lead

Sham angel forged, dug out; who, after, fell
Shotted with three times Caesar's trickling wounds—

Ill-doer he, ill-done by; bide their hour,
Dreadless; the great Saline; and Aztek, bowered

With floating pleasaunces, where sailed the swans

Of sway symbolic; Amucu, golden banked;

Or Titicacca, from whose sacred shores,

Long ages lapsed, the scions of the sun,

Manco Capac and Mama Oello, stepped,

Ancestral, to the sceptre of Beron;

Nyassi; Ngami; Mrima; Zana, and that

Lake of the gods, whence Nile, or white or blue;

And wide Nigritian Tschad, still unexplored;

All these, and countless more, the angels made,

While kind they were to earth, and dear to God.

We would venture to state, that there are more evidences of pedantry in this one poem, than in a hundred volumes of cotemporaneous literature we might name. A Fairy Tale, with all respect to the Author, is a very bad one, and we remember fifty, told to us in our infantine days, far better than this of Mr. Bailey's; the whole story seems to be that of a young lady, who having voluntarily joined a band of fairies, remains in their society for so long a time, that when she returns again to her paternal residence she can find no trace of any of her family, but beholds the castle in ruins, and the place altogether deserted.

In the remarks we have made relative to this new volume of Bailey's, we would not wish to be considered as denying any merit to the poetry it contains: there it a prodigality of language, a lavish profusion of the most gorgeous images, and a sustained elevation of style, throughout everything that issues from this Author's brilliant pen, which strongly typify a most luxuriant imagination, and a mind endowed with lofty contemplative capacity. What we condemn is, the pompous display of learned words, the perpetual mystery apparent, and the meaningless tenor of his themes. The Mystic, does not contain a dozen passages with which human nature can sympathise, which have any relation whatsoever to mundane affairs, or which even by allegorical construction, can be said to point a moral which is applicable to man. Our argument is, what is such poetry fit for? If it cannot please, or improve us, what on earth can it do? It becomes a nuisance to society, and should be disowned as such. If then Mr. Bailey is desirous of holding a place among the poets of his country, let him commence by committing "The Mystic," to the flames, and then set about correcting his faults energetically, just in the same manner, as one would endeavour to overcome a bad habit: by so doing he has a fair chance of obtaining a respectable position; if he do not achieve something considerable in the way of reformation, he himself may outlive his poetry.

"Men and Women," by Robert Browning, a work in two volumes, containing fifty poems, is now lying before us, and constitutes a subject for more melancholy reflections than does that of any other of the three, we have chosen for notice on this occasion. Longfellow in Hiawatha has evidenced a departure from the dignified and philosophical character of his former poems, but his late production is not the unmistakeable manifestation, of obstinate adhesion to false principles of taste and structure; Bailey's Mystic, is a still more ludicrous exaggeration than Pestus, but we never had such an opinion of the creative power of the Author, as to entertain the hope that his genius would endow our literature, with material gifts from its salutary idiosyncrasies; Browning, however, whom we still look upon as a poet of much originality, power and reflection, whom we regard as the possessor of attributes enabling him to confer considerable benefits on his countrymen, in the improvement of their intellects, and their hearts, has given, in his late volumes, to our very great regret, but too great a profusion of instances to demonstrate the dogged pertinacity with which he clings to vices, which would swamp in their fatal vortex the giant mind of Shakspeare himself. Obscurity is the evil genius that is working the ruin of this poet: Browning is, pre-eminently, the King of Darkness; like Charles Lambe, whose passion for "Roast Pig," was of that violent kind, that he confessed himself ready to give up anything to his friends, save and except that beloved dish, so Browning, (but with much less reason), appears equally as resolute in maintaining possession of his darling hobby, which is never permitted to be absent even from the most trifling conceptions of his brain. The poet's imagination is of that lofty order which stamps the impress of high intellectuality on all his thoughts, and his power of language can invest those thoughts with the most brilliant dress; but he is defeated in all his undertakings by this foul demon which ever marches by his side, and snatches the wreath descending on his brow. Mistaking the allegorical meaning of the Owl of Minerva, he would seem to have supposed that a somnolent and gloomy visage, and a love of darkness, were the striking traits which recommended that bird to the Goddess of Wisdom; never jogging his memory to call back the fact, that it was the power of "seeing in darkness," to which the "Bird of Night" is indebted for his appearance on her shield. But Browning has other faults, all more or less disfiguring, and constantly exhibiting themselves. In the two volumes now before us, there are sufficient crudities, contortions, and dissections of the language, to ruin the reputation of fifty poets: in almost every one of the poems they contain, concatenated verse, transposed sentences, direct inversion of grammatical rules, substitution of one part of speech for another, and obsolete or self-coined words are constantly visible. Besides these sad facts, the subjects of the poems themselves are the most tasteless, and the most unmeaning it is possible to conceive: the Author would appear to have sedulously searched the most dusty shelves of the most antiquated book cases; to have taken therefrom the most musty tomes, and like a veritable book-worm of the Dominie Sampson school, to have selected the most trifling quips and quiddities of the schoolmen for public parade, and as fit stalking horses, for his ponderous and drowsy amplification.

The first impression a perusal of these poems necessarily makes, is, how an Author who can create such beauties, can perpetrate such literary atrocities. It is a problem impossible of solution, unless we suppose that Mr. Browning has arrived at the conclusion, that to be ridiculous is to be great; or that the only way to make his books sell, is to distinguish them by some peculiarities, which at the cost of everything rational and consistent, will establish his name as a caterer for the morbid curiosity of the public. If indeed we reflect upon the great pervading taste which exists for anything that smacks of notoriety, we may be inclined to consider this latter motive a more sagacious one: in the same way as we give credit to Madame Tussaud, for the ingenuity with which her "Chamber of Horrors," with its interesting inmates, was devised, or as we applaud the inventive capacity of the manager who drew crowded houses to witness the performance of a lap-dog, when the glorious Siddons played to empty benches, and the genius of Kemble could not even fill the pit. But will the poet who respects his own intellect, who is conscious of the duty he owes his kind, who knows the more solemn debt he owes his God, for the gifts which he has conferred upon him, willingly barter the splendid promises of noble and enduring fame, which belong to him who can stamp the impress of wisdom, and beauty, on the workings of his mind, for such ephemeral admiration, as the buffoon, the conjuror, or the mountebank can command? We would prefer to think that the errors of Browning arose from any cause but this: for abstracting altogether the pecuniary character of the proceeding, he who panders to a vitiated public taste, is not alone quite unworthy to wear the poet's bays, but must inevitably bring upon himself the most thorough contempt of every honest mind. Now to substantiate our charges: the following extract is taken from an early part of "an epistle containing the strange medical experience of Karshish, the Arab Physician," and beyond all doubt, the doctor's experience was "passing strange."

My journeyings were brought to Jericho,
Thou I resume. Who studious in our art
Shall count a little labour unpaid?
I have shed sweat enough, left flesh and bone

On many a flinty furlong of this land.
Also the country side is all on fire
With rumours of a marching hitherward—
Some say Vespasian cometh, some, his son.
A black lynx snarled and pricked a tufted ear:

Last of my blood inflamed his yellow balls;
I cried and threw my staff and he was gone.
Twice have the robbers stripped and beaten me,

And once a town declared me for a spy,
But at the end, I reach Jerusalem, Since this poor covert where I pass the night,

This Bethany, lies scarce the distance thence

A man with plague-sores at the third degree
Runs till he drops down dead. Thou laughest here!

'Sooth, it elates me, thus reposed and safe,
To void the stuffing of my travel-scrip

And share with thee whatever Jewry yields.
A viscid choler is observable
In tertians, I was nearly bold to say,
And falling-sickness hath a happier cure
Than our school wots of: there's a spider here

Weaves no web, watches on the ledge of tombs,

Sprinkled with mottles on an ash-grey back;
Take five and drop them .. but who knows his mind,

The Syrian run-a-gate I trust this to?
His service payeth me a sublimate
Blown up his nose to help the ailing-eye.
Best wait; I reach Jerusalem at morn,
There set in order my experiences,
Gather what most deserves and give thee all—

Or I might add Judea's gum-tragacanth Scales off in parer flakes, shines clearergra'ned,

Cracks 'twixt the pestle and the porphyry,
In fine exceeds our produce. Scalp disease
Confounds me, crossing so with leprosy—
Thou hadst admired one sort I gained at Zoar—

But zeal outruns discretion. Here I end.

This shews us that Jericho after all is not the place to send a bore to: what think you, reader, of the next extract, representing a phase in the character of an Epileptic patient?

Should his child sicken unto death,—why, look
For scarce abatement of his cheerfulness,
Or pretermision of his dally craft—
While a word, gesture, glance, from that same child
At play or in the school or laid asleep,
Will start him to an agony of fear,
Exasperation, just as like! demand
The reason why—"tis but a word," object—
"A gesture"—he regards thee as our lord
Who lived there in the pyramid alone,

Looked at us, dost thou mind, when being young
We both would unadvisedly recite
Some charm's beginning, from that book of his,
Able to bid the sun throbwide and burst
All into stars, as suns grown old are wont
Thou and the child have each a veil alike Thrown o'er your heads from under which ye both
Stretch your blind hands and trifle with a match
Over a mine of Greek fire, did ye know!

Instans Tyrannus, is too perfect a piece of preposterous nonsense, if we may use such an expression, to authorize us in merely giving a portion of it for those uninitiated in the mystic rites, of which Mr. Browning is the "Fons et Principium:" it will be a task, we fancy, something like the cleansing of the Augean stable, to comprehend it.

Of the million or two, more or less,
I rule and possess
One man, for some cause undefined,
Was least to my mind.
I struck him, he grovelled of course—
For, what was his force?
I pinned him to earth with my weight
And persistence of hate—
And he lay, would not moan, would not curse,
As if lots might be worse.
"Were the object less mean, would he stand
At the swing of my hand!
For obscurity helps him and blots
The hole where he squats."
So I set my five wits on the stretch
To inveigle the wretch.
All in vain! gold and jewels I threw,
Still he couched there perdue.
I tempted his blood and his flesh,
Hid in roses my mesh,
Cholceest cates and the flagon's best spilt—
Still he kept to his filth!
Had he kith now or kin, were access
To his heart, if I press—
Just a son or a mother to seize—
No such booty as these!
Were it simply a friend to pursue
"Mid my million or two,
Who could pay me in person or pelf
What he owes me himself.
No! I could not but smile through my chafe—
For the fellow lay safe
As his mates do, the midge and the nit,
—Through minuteness, to wit.
Then a humor more great took its place
At the thought of his face,

The droop, the low cares of the mouth,
The trouble uncouth
"Twixt the brows, all that air one is fain
To put out of its pain—
And, no, I admonished myself,
"Is one mocked by an elf,
Is one baffled by toad or by rat?
The gravamen's in that!
How the lion, who crouches to suit
His back to my foot,
Would admire that I stand in debate!
But the Small is the Great
If it vexes you,—that is the thing!
Toad or rat vex the King?
Though I waste half my realm to unearth
Toad or rat, 'tis well worth!"

So I soberly laid my last plan
To extinguish the man.
Round his creep-hole,—with never a break
Ran my fires for his sake;
Over-head, did my thunders combine
With my under-ground mine:
Till I looked from my labor content
To enjoy the event.

When sudden . . . how think ye the end?
Did I say "without friend?"
Say rather, from marge to blue marge
The whole sky grew his targe
With the sun's self for visible boss,
While an Arm ran across
Which the earth heaved beneath like a breast
Where the wretch was safe prest!
Do you see? just my vengeance complete,
The man sprang to his feet,
Stood erect, caught at God's skirts, and prayed!
—So, I was afraid!

Browning sometimes takes off the buskin of Melpomene, and puts on the motley of Thalia: however, he does not always succeed in unlocking "the gates of joy," as the following will evidence; it places us in that curious situation (so beautifully expressed in Mrs. Sigourney's Death of an Infant,) in which we know not "whether to laugh or weep," to laugh at the unequalled absurdity of the passage, or to weep at such a ruthless disregard of all the promptings of reason, and all the whisperings of taste.

Est fuga, solvitur rota!

On we drift. Where looms the dim port?
One, Two, Three, Four, Five, contribute their quota—

Something is gained, if one caught but the import—
Show it us, Hugues of Saxe-Gotha!

What with affirming, denying,
Holding, risposting, subjoining,
Al's like . . . it's like . . . for an instance
I'm trying . . .

There! See our roof, its gilt moulding and groining
Under those spider-webs lying!

So your fugue broadens and thickens,
Greatens and deepens and lengthens,
Till one exclaims—"But where's music
the dickens?
Blot ye the gold, while your spider-web strengthens,
Blackened to the stoutest of tickens?"

Bishop Blougram's Apology, is as odd a discussion on Philosophy as ever was heard, and the author does well to inform us that it was an after dinner argument: we defy any one to say that having read it, he has gleaned anything tangible, or that he considers it possible to deduce any definite conclusion therefrom. Another melancholy instance of perverted talent, is presented to us in a Poem called, Old Pictures in Florence, where indeed we discern the "Membra," but unfortunately the "disjecta membra Poetae." Being Christmas times, it brings vividly before our minds the gyrations, somersets, "extraordinary leaps," and other excellencies of the Clown in the Pantomime, and never was there an instance of physical pliability of limb, in the person of any respectable Acrobat, since the days of the renowned Grimaldi, which could stand comparison, in its own way, with the intellectual kalysthenics this poem displays: take this example—

Not that I expect the great Bigordi
Nor Sandro to hear me, chivalric, bel-lieuse;
Nor wronged Lippino—and not a word I Say of a scrap of Fra Angelico's.
But are you too fine, Taddeo Gaddi,
To grant me a taste of your intonaco—
Some Jerome that seeks the heaven with a and eye?
No charliash saint, Lorenzo Monaco?

Could not the ghost with the close red cap,
My Pollajolo, the twice a craftsman,
Save me a sample, give me the hap
Of a muscular Christ that shows the draughtsman?
No virgin by him, the somewhat petty,
Of finical touch and tempers crumbly—
Could not Alesso Baldovinetti
Contribute so much, I ask him humbly?

Margheritone of Arezzo,
 With the grave-clothes garb and swaddling barret,
 (Why purse up mouth and beak in a pet so,
 You bald, saturnine, poll-clawed parrot?)
 No poor glimmering Crucifixion, Where in the foreground kneels the donor?
 If such remain, as is my conviction,
 The hoarding does you but little honour.

Or,

We'll shoot this time better game and bag
 'em hot—

No display at the stone of Dante,
 But a kind of Witan-agemot
 ("Casa Guidi," quod videas ante)
 To ponder Freedom restored to Florence,
 How Art may return that departed with her.

Go, hated house, go each trace of the Lo-raine's!

And bring us the days of Orgagna hither.

How we shall prologue, how we shall perorate,

Say fit things upon art and history—
 Set truth at blood heat and the false at a zero rate,

Make of the want of the age no mystery!
 Contrast the fructuous and sterile eras,
 Show, monarchy its uncouth cub licks
 Out of the bear's shape to the chimera's—
 Pure Art's birth being still the republic's!

They pass; for them the panels may thrill.
 The tempera grow alive and tinglish—
 Rot or are left to the mercies still
 Of dealers and stealers, Jews and the English!
 Seeing mere money's worth in their prize,
 Who sell it to some one calm as Zeno
 At naked Art, and in ecstasies
 Before some clay-cold, vile Carlino!

Then one shall propose (in a speech, curt Tuscan,

Sober, expurgate, spare of an "issismo")
 Ending our half-told tale of Carnuscan,
 Turning the Bell-tower's altitissimo.
 And fine as the beak of a young beccaccia
 The Campanile, the Duomo's fit ally,
 Soars up in gold its full fifty braccia.
 Completing Florence, as Florence, Italy.

Shall I be alive that morning the scaffold
 Is broken away, and the long-pent fire
 Like the golden hope of the world unbuffed Springs from its sleep, and up goes the spire—

As "God and the People" plain for its motto,

Thence the new tricolor flaps at the sky?
 Foreseeing the day that vindicates Giotto
 And Florence together, the first am I!

A poem called Popularity, furnishes us with another gem, which we lament to state, bears a disagreeable resemblance to a paste diamond, inasmuch as it assumes the brilliancy of truth, without having the slightest claim to merit the distinction.

Mere conchs! not fit for warp or woof!
 Till art comea,—comes to pound and squeeze

And clarify,—refines to proof
 The liquor filtered by degrees,
 While the world stands aloof.

And there's the extract, flaked and fine,
 And priced, and saleable at last!

And Hobbs, Nobbs, Stokes and Nokes combine

To paint the future from the past,
 Put blue into their line.

Hobbs hints blue,—straight he turtle eats.

Nobbs prints blue,—claret crowns his cup.

Nokes outdares Stokes in azure feats,—

Both gorge. Who fished the murex up?
 What porridge had John Keats?

But what can surpass this?

ANOTHER WAY OF LOVE.

JUNE was not over,
 Though past the full,
 And the beat of her roses
 Had yet to blow,
 When a man I know
 (But shall not discover,
 Since cars are dull,
 And time discloses)

Turned him and said with a man's true air,
 Half sighing a smile in a yawn, as 'twere,—
 "If I tire of your June, will she greatly care?"

Well, dear, in-doors with you!

True, serene deadness

Tries a man's temper.

What's in the blossom

June wears on her bosom?

Can it clear scores with you?

Sweetness and redness,

Eadem semper!

Go, let me care for it greatly or slightly!

If June mends her bowers now, your hand left unsightly

By plucking their roses.—my June will do rightly.

And after for past time
If June be refulgent
With flowers in completeness,
All petals, no prickles,
Delicious as trickles
Of wine poured at mass-time,
And choose One indulgent
To redness and sweetness:

Or if, with experience of man and of spider
She use my June-lightning, the strong insect-rider,
To stop the fresh spinning,—why, June will consider.

And, still, Browning has written passages of poetry which, for eloquent beauty and comprehensive philosophy, Tennyson himself can hardly equal! In a Balcony, like most of this author's plays, owns many beauties; the language is often akin to the sublime, and that peculiar delicacy of insinuation, and transparency of colouring, which he has so often evidenced, are here sufficiently abundant. However, there is no interest in the plot, without which it is impossible any play can become popular, even in a literary sense. Saul has many fine passages, but why so miserably monotonous? Here at last the heart of the poet breaks out—

A SERENADE AT THE VILLA.

THAT was I, you heard last night
When there rose no moon at all,
Nor, to pierce the strained and tight
Tent of heaven, a planet small:
Life was dead, and so was light.

Not a twinkle from the fly,
Not a glimmer from the worm.
When the crickets stopped their cry,
When the owls forbore a term,
You heard music; that was I.

Earth turned in her sleep with pain,
Sultrily suspirated for proof;
In at heaven and out again,
Lightning!—where it broke the roof,
Bloodlike, some few drops of rain.

What they could my words expressed.
O my love, my all, my one!
Singing helped the verses best,
And when singing's best was done,
To my lute I left the rest.

So wore night; the east was grey,
White the broad-faced hemlock flowers,
Soon would come another day;
Ere its first of pathy hours
Found me, I had past away.

What became of all the hopes,
Words and song and lute as well?
Say, this struck you—"When life gropes
Feebly for the path where fell Light last on the evening slopes.

"One friend in that path shall be
To secure my steps from wrong;
One to count night day for me,
Patient through the watches long,
Serving most with none to see."

Never say—as something bodes—
"So the worst has yet a worse!
When life halts 'neath double loads,
Better the task-master's curse
Than such music on the roads!"

"When no moon succeeds the sun,
Nor can pierce the midnight's tent
Any star, the smallest one,
While some drops, where lightning went,
Show the final storm begun—

"When the fire-fly hides its spot,
When the garden-voices fall
In the darkness thick and hot,—
Shall another voice avail,
That shape be where those are not?"

"Has some plague a longer lease
Proffering its help uncouth?
Can't one even die in peace?
As one shuts one's eyes on youth,
Is that face the last one sees?"

Oh, how dark your villa was,
Windows fast and obdurate!
How the garden grudged me graces
Where I stood—the iron gate
Ground its teeth to let me pass!

The Statue and the Bust, a poem in the terza rima metre, is remarkable for wonderful fidelity in the narrative of an Italian story, and, notwithstanding the dulness of the translator here and there, there are few, be they old or young, who will not experience some pleasure in this curious tale. The lines below, taken from a quaint piece called, A Grammarian's Funeral, are so true, and so artistically told, as to entitle them to pass into a poetical Apothegm —

That low man seeks a little thing to do,
Sees it and does it :
This high man, with a great thing to pursue,
Dies ere he knows it.
That low man goes on adding one to one,
His hundred's soon hit :
This high man, aiming at a million,

Misses an unit.
That, has the world here—should he need the next,
Let the world mind him !
This, throws himself on God, and unperplexed
Seeking shall find Him.

In these passages Browning evidences his capacity to create the beautiful, making it evident that its appearance is not the result of accident, but design. This is the very fact which excites our indignation : it is nought but the poet's laziness, or love of notoriety, or greed of gain, by conforming to a vicious taste, which fills his books with so much garbage. We have not so many Poets now-a-days, that we can afford to suffer any of the gifted band, to waste their genius in the indulgence of such ungraceful oddities, or in its prostitution to such unworthy ends ; in the name of Apollo, and the nine Muses, let Browning, even at the eleventh hour, register a vow of reformation, and take as a motto for the title-page of his next collection of poems, the following aphorism of the ancient critic—"Non fumum ex fulgore, sed ex fumo dare fulgorem."

Were we asked to point out the causes, to which we would refer the existence of those errors we so strongly reprehend, we fancy the task, notwithstanding its unpleasant nature, would be easy of accomplishment. We should not hesitate to impute it, in defiance of all that has been said in favor of Science, to the dull and gross materiality of our social life, and to the superficial spirit which predominates in our world of letters. In vain does the Novelist search the columns of our journals, or draw on the memories of his acquaintances, for materials wherewith to sketch a tale of modern disinterestedness, nobly natural, sublimely simple, or of chivalry, generously heroic ! These belong to a past age, they are not to be found in this. Where is the ingenuous candor, the kind heartedness, the wit, the humour, the hospitable feelings of our fathers ? We answer boldly, they have vanished with the dust of those who have gone before us ; they are no longer here.

Fifty years ago, slow poisoning was not so rife ; murders such as those of Rush, and Kirwan, and the Mannings, had not been committed ; pamphlets called, " Infanticide made easy," were not published. But our subject is not one which admits an enumeration of these horrors, whose rapid growth amongst us have disgraced our age, and make us tremble at the depravity of man. What a deplorable falling off in all the branches of literature has taken place during the last half century ! Our Drama, which we were wont to reverence so much, as possessing such stores of imaginative beauty, such mental galleries of historical, and self-created portraits, drawn on the broad page of nature, with brushes dipped in its own unfading colors ; containing such noble examples, such lessons for imitation, or avoidance, " To point a moral, or adorn a tale," such models of virtue, conjugal affection, heroism, judgment, eloquence, self-restraint, piety, and justice ; a massive treasury of everything admirable, instructive, wise, as a living art, has almost ceased to exist.

Operas, as flimsy and as vapid as the minds of many of their admirers, receive the unqualified homage of millions, while the only theatre (in that city which can boast of such a number,) appropriated to the performance of the divine Dramas of the immortal Shakspeare, can scarcely command a respectable attendance. The wit of Congreve, the humor of Fielding, the ingenuity of Massinger, have long since been forgotten : while the puny Burlettas of the French Stage are received as the result of inspiration : finally, the naturalness of Goldsmith, and the matchless sparkle of Sheridan's dialogues, are lost sight of in the agile movements of some eminent danseuse, in the glare of an Extravaganza, or in a wonderful display of Chinese lights. Eloquence, in like manner, has well nigh departed from the Senate, and the Forum : the matured preference for matter-of-fact language, has shut out all opportunity of appealing to the human heart, and he who addresses himself best to the selfish feelings of our nature, is now the best orator. If Pitt, Fox, or Burke were at present in existence, we doubt (unless for its novelty) whether a speech by any of the three, on some great subject, such as the restoration of Polish Independence, would attract as large an assemblage as a display of Cochin China hens ! Our great prose writers are never sought after, unless to fill up the empty shelves of a book-case, and the class of readers, who had they been men, twenty years since, would have read Addison and Johnson with avidity, are altogether ignorant of their writings; and consider themselves profound masters of the English language, if they have waded through a few volumes of Alison, and the essays of Macaulay.

It were superfluous to demonstrate the evil tendency of all these unhappy circumstances, upon the character of contemporary poetry, which is naturally more affected by the existing state of things than any other art; and it only remains for us to shew, "how from this nettle danger" we may "pluck the flower safety." Our poets should combat the degeneracy which is everywhere apparent: they should shew that if they have been gifted with great capacities, and noble impulses, they can act consistently with the teachings of the one, and the callings of the other; thus proving that they are the natural guardians, and perpetuators, of all that adorns and enriches the language of their country. Great and manifold as are the short comings of the time, there is one redeeming trait in the sad aspect it presents: in all the superficiality of art, and social materiality we have hinted at, there is ever apparent an earnest longing for, and seeking after a higher state of humanity.

Steeped in error though we be, we do not, like Pliable, in The Pilgrim's Progress, abandon all our courage in the Slough of Despond: we still hope on, and in that lies our safeguard. Let our poets use this instrument which they have at their command, as the means to wean us back from the desert into which we have strayed so far, to the green plains, and breezy hills our fathers loved. The spirit to which we allude, is visible in every department of science, in every walk of art, in the mechanic's work-shop, the warehouse, the manufactory, and in all it can be used to the best advantage. This course adopted, by those to whom we have referred, a bright transformation shall take place, and they who were heretofore the ignes fatui of the mind, leading it away from the right path, to plunge it in destruction, will become to it, as the star to the wise men of the East, guiding it in safety, to enjoy the presence, and the influence, of wisdom, truth, and beauty.

ART. II.—THE ILLUSIONS OF LITERATURE.

La Comtesse de Mauléon. Par Louis Reybaud. Paris : Lévy Frères, 1853.

A gentleman, easy in his circumstances, and not embroiled in law-suits, gets tired of his state, he is only a unit in the crowd ; he aspires to make his name famous, to be on the tongues of men, in the leading articles in newspapers. He puts on a red coat, and sticks a feather in his head, to be the easier distinguished by the enemy : he rushes on the bayonets, or into the cannon's mouth ; and meets sudden death, or is disabled for life. And he gets his reward : he is spoken of among his neighbours for half a year, and forgotten by a grateful nation in three days. A young lawyer foregoes repose, family endearments, and necessary relaxation, for thirty or forty years, and becomes the DESIRED among attorneys, and an object of envy to the idle frequenters of the court. He has obtained renown such as it is, and an impaired constitution. His days are filled with labor and never-ceasing, anxious exertion to obtain a victory, perhaps with a bad cause, and against a practised opponent. His nights are periods of unrest or suffering : he has won fame, but is unfitted to enjoy it.

Is then the candidate for literary eminence more unwise in his generation than such as these ?

He merely exercises his faculties on pleasant or unpleasant studies, for the production of a book to be read or a drama to be witnessed : the book is unread, or the drama unsuccessful, and his labor is lost and his mind soured. After a fair proportion of efforts, if he can tell the world something it knows not already, or if he can make it look on things well known and familiar, through some medium giving them a new color or appearance, his end is obtained : his works are in the hands of thousands with whom he thus hold interesting communion ; a grateful and pleasant influence is reflected back on himself ; and he is the object of the good will of the multitudes whom his works interest or entertain.

Moralists will say that a person so circumstanced must be no less than a saint, if such attention and interest do not cherish self-conceit to an unhealthy extent in this, the happiest, phase of literary reputation. How undesirable such an acquisition must be, when the productions are of an unhealthy character, we need not pause to consider, but we may surely bestow some sympathy on the many who, in their peaceful country retreats, dazzled by the glowing pictures presented to their minds in the works of their favourite writers, feel disgust at the commonplace tiresome society in which they merely vegetate, and sacrifice everything for an introduction to the gods and goddesses of the literary life of the metropolis. An unsophisticated youth in the pit of the theatre, admiring the heroes and heroines of the stage, as they move about in their fine draperies, and breathe nothing less than the noblest sentiments, and afterwards finding these heroes squabbling over a pack of cards in a tavern, or the heroine's lovely lips employed on unworthy petty scandal, is very disagreeably brought down to little, shabby, common-life miseries. So will it be with our worshipper of genius, if he expects to see his favorite authors and authoresses moving with dignified steps, and ever giving utterance to noble remarks, profound truths, or witty sayings, as in the scenes of a genteel comedy.

In our last paper we got glimpses of the shifts, privations, and struggles of our pioneers of literature in their fitful struggles for artistic or literary distinction. In our present, we will be introduced to a more genial and higher sphere in the same world; and find the acquisition of a respectable status there, and a connection with the established denizens, still incapable of conferring happiness, when the mind is not well regulated, and when literary fame is looked on as the only good for which it is desirable to live.

None can be a better guide for our purpose in this survey, than our old friend Louis Reybaud. He has a thorough knowledge of the literary coteries of Paris: the secrets of the Editor's sanctum are no secrets for him: he has the privilege of looking in on the pythonesse of the feuilleton while occupied in her trivial household concerns; and goodnaturedly feels for the young aspirant, groping through the pitfalls and thickets that invest the little elysium of the literati. Under his guidance we get into a purer atmosphere than when we were led by the torch of Murger, through the outer caverns and unclean purlieus of the Bohemian suburbs. Now we are sensible of being with a guide whose thoughts are profound and just, whose wit is bright and keen, whose morality is pure, and whose heart is in the right place.

The readers of the IRISH QUARTERLY have no need that we should enlarge on the keenness of our author's penetration, his facility of detecting shams, and divesting pretension of its borrowed garments; and on his sound judgment in pointing out the advantage of pursuing more useful, though less shining occupations than art or literature, when the true and strong vocation is not vouchsafed. And oh! how much misery would be spared us here, if every one could at an early age, discover his vocation, and enter on it betimes, and vigorously act in accordance with it. Then would we not see artists striving to paint with spade-handles for brushes, and mechanics endeavoring to pick locks with goose-quill pens..

We have training schools for crossing-sweepers, and free instruction held out for the encouragement of pickpockets: why are not our youth sent for a year or two to a college whose professors' chief duty would be to find out the bent of each pupil's disposition, and the peculiar pursuit for which his abilities and powers are best fitted, to make him pass through life, with comfort to himself and benefit to the community?

When this greatly needed college shall have been some years established, visitors will read with much profit and complacency, divers testimonials, carefully framed and hanging in the great hall, arranged in no particular order, but doing the part of votive tablets—testimonials to the heads of the establishment from players, engineers, inventors of incombustible cloth, novel writers, self-adjusting-plough wrights, attorneys, and statesmen; all expressive of gratitude for their training, by which they are now supporting their families in comfort, and adding to the income-tax.

Our old favorite, Alphonse Karr, makes one of his characters obtain first class prizes in all his university studies. The solemn owl who presented his last and crowning premium, gravely pronounced, that now his future was to be one scene of usefulness and enjoyment: he was fit for anything. The talented but useless hero on being obliged to exert himself to obtain a position in society, is ignorant of what he should do; he has literary tastes, but no penchant for any profession in particular, and falls from bad to worse till he becomes a burden to himself and all who feel an interest in him.

Louis Reybaud, as is known, has filled some stations of trust under the French Government, and has full knowledge of the secret springs by which the engines of the press are set in motion. He tells us that he heard the outlines of the present story in the penetralia of a newspaper office, the narrator being the Great Nepomucene.

However difficult it might be to penetrate to the sanctum of an editor, this worthy found all doors open before him : his air, gesture, and mode of walking imposed on the clerks ; and no one ever thought of asking his right or title to the privilege. Some understood him to be a celebrity, others a capitalist ; all bowed before him. He had a pinch of the best snuff for the treasurer, a delicate piece of flattery for the office clerk, and a princely smile on his lips which the other subalterns could not resist : thus he was at home in the office of every journal.

"But who was this favored personage? No one knew. A certain obscurity hung over his antecedents ; and he disappeared one morning without leaving his address. The only relic left was his name, The Great Nepomucene ; and, after all, was this a real appellation, or a political or literary allusion, a trap set for posterity? Mystery on mystery ; I have no desire to penetrate them. However, if the name could escape memory, the hat would remain ; for Nepomucene had a hat as well as Napoleon ; a hat of character, irritating to the sight, and the most aggressive that hand of hatter ever turned out. You might not have known the man, but not to know the hat was impossible. It still lives in the minds of all, with its low crown and its many cornered brim. It will long remain in the memory, an abuse of form, and one of the greatest impertinences of plastic art. So in his hours of pride, Nepomucene called it his monument.

So much for the man. He was not of any journal, but he had the freedom of all : he took special care never to write, but still he gave the tone to those who did. Without him, no great success was possible ; he would not suffer it. In the cafés and divans he would explain, on being plied with a few glasses of the right sort, how such and such renowned scribes were indebted to him for their fame ; and by what curious processes he had raised some wretched productions to the skies. Was any eminent writer mentioned in his presence, 'it is I,' he would say, 'who raised him to his present position.' Speak to him of self-wrought reputations, he laughed in his sleeve at the idea ; and when pressed, he would relate, apropos to certain celebrities, bits of scandal that would set a college of bonzes a laughing."

Being determined on literary rule and influence, he had begun by having the utmost confidence in himself, and thus inspiring it into others: so by degrees, his single admirer enlarged to a full court, and 'his hat became the centre of opinion.' No sooner did he appear in a theatre, than he was surrounded by a group of familiars. In an unsettled question, 'What is the opinion of the Great Nepomucene,' was the first thing asked; and then the lovers of ready-made judgments who happened to be within hearing of the oracle, propagated the fiat to the long-eared world without.

One day in a select literary re-union, and in the enjoyment of the agreeable sensations arising from a generous lunch, he was holding forth on the number of successful aspirants whom he had advanced to fame; but he was suddenly taken back by recollection of the only check he had ever received.

"'Ah, gentlemen! you look for excitement in dramas, in romances: here is an occurrence from real life, where the heart left its fragments on the brambles, and shed its life-blood drop by drop along the high way of the world. Alas for the inconsistency of the most philosophical and selfish amongst us! Here am I, an old stager, as sentimental as a gun-flint, and who have assisted with dry eyes, at the most showery melo-dramas, at the most dishevelled hair, and the most gasping agonies of modern art; yet I feel my old eye-lids moisten at the memory of this event; but I was more than an eye-witness, I was a deeply interested personage in the story.

'Nothing more simple than the early part of the occurrence: it might be one of Berquin's stories. In the mountains of Quercy, beside Gourdon, and nigh the ruins of a once celebrated abbey, lived a worthy woman, widow of an officer who had perished in the service of his country. She now had but one care and one pleasure, to bring up her son in the esteem of the world, and in the fear of God. Her only fault, if it was one, was looking too high for him: so she spared no expense to give him a suitable education. Her resources were limited, a piece of land, and a small pension; but she multiplied them by economies and, alas! by privations also. She got him taught Latin, Greek, dancing, fencing, and playing on the violin, so that he might be accomplished as well as learned. At twelve, he could handle his bow after a fashion, but to secure the accomplishment, his mother had lived for the last nine years on milk and chestnuts. * * * * * So our young hero at last returned from Toulouse, invested with the privilege of wearing a robe, and snatching a criminal from the gibbet."

Now that Madame Merival has her advocate ready made, she cannot think of shutting him up in the petty provincial bourgs, Figeac, Cahors, Agen—bah ! she has a soul above these hamlets : to Paris he must go ; there only can be find a theatre worthy of his acquirements. In an unlucky hour Nepomucene is mentioned by some neighbours who have seen him in Paris on friendly terms with influential people. His family were of that part of France ; so the poor widow's imagination begins to seethe ; by going back four or five generations, she convinces herself that if the great Nep. was not Lucien's uncle, he ought at least turn out his cousin, the removes being more or less distant. And now his influence is exaggerated by the Paris-visiting gossips : 'Nepomucene is the man—it is he that has the long arms—he only, sends the rain and the sunshine—he is gossip and crony with the ministers—his knife and fork are laid at the King's table—Vive le Grand Nepomucene.' Had Nepomucene then appeared in the neighbourhood, his horses would been removed and his chariot drawn by the brawny arms of the rustics, but he suspects that he should in return bestow several Bureaus de tabac (in promises).

So our selfish Parisian receives a letter from the self-denying widow, announcing her intention of consigning Lucien to his care on the strength of their relationship ; and congratulating him on the credit his pupil will surely confer on him. The patron is vexed enough by the threatened boon ; he can forgive the fall of a tile on his head, but that a man should descend on him unawares was not to be borne. He is going to return a civil but denegatory answer, when glancing at the postscript, confusion ! he finds that his pupil is on the road, and will be under his charge next day. In due time he arrives, and is so chagrined by the cool reception he meets, that he is on the point of taking leave.

"Our connexion was about being dissolved ; a singular circumstance prevented it. The young man had under his arm, a basket from which issued odours, about whose nature or origin I could not be deceived, and the chamber was filled with the perfume : it was a packet of truffles sent by Madame Merinval. Oh you widows ! nothing escapes your penetration : well you know our feeble points : poor sainted mother, I forgive you ; but the accessory saved the principal. According as the odours expanded, I returned to better feelings ; my native air seemed to environ me. The young man was already on the lobby, but I detained him on some pretence, and we entered into conversation. * * * * From this first interview I entertained presentiments of his horoscope very different from those of his mother, and alas too well verified in the sequel.

'A conscience and pure morals,' cried I as he departed to his lodgings, 'a dangerous baggage—he cannot possibly succeed.'

The association so disagreeable at first becomes dear to the old gentleman. Before, his reign was solitary ; now he has a thurifer to burn incense on the altar of his vanity. Then Lucien has as many gold pieces sewed in his waistcoat as will last for a year ; moreover he is artless and goodnatured, a handsome brun, talented and patient of study, and calculated to reflect credit on his mentor.

Our young aspirant having changed his everlasting country garments for the products of a Paris Schneider, and being pretty comfortable as to his lodging and meals, his now strongly attached patron submits him to a moral analysis, and finds to his great chagrin that poor Lucien is afflicted with an extravagant veneration for literary celebrities of every kind ; false gods and genuine deities being equally the object of his adoration. The drudgeries of the law he will not submit to ; writing political articles for the journals, is his aim, and he diligently exercises himself in preparatory exercises on the current topics of the day, comparing them with the leaders of the chief papers, and naturally giving the preference to his own. Nepomucene had much influence with the powers of the press, but to get his protégée appointed on the staff of a periodical, he found to exceed his powers. Every office had its complement, and when he insinuated his wishes, he met with the same civility which is shewn by a dog in possession of a bone, when an acquaintance approaches him with his nose on the qui vive.

On Lucien repeating his earnest desire to look on the princes and princesses of glory, and to form their acquaintance ; and requesting his patron's mediation—

" 'Lucien,' said I, 'beware : you form an ill regulated wish ; you desire to drink of the cup of disenchantment. How do you figure to yourself your ideals of these people ? adorned with a profusion of graces, endowed with supernatural gifts. You paint them on your mental canvas, lyre in hand, laurel crown on forehead, and their figures draped in antique robes ; or perhaps, with head inclined in meditation, graving with stile on page of iron, salutary and everlasting maxims. These are the creatures of your dreams; unhappy youth, why not allow them to exist! Apply not to the countenances of these noble images, the vulgar mask of reality. You have demi-gods; why look for mortals—mortals who are never found without alloy. Viewed from near, Genius himself is deprived of rays. Approach your literary magnate: you expect to see rays darting from his eyes; what do you find? a pair of spectacles, perhaps a false front on those brows instead of lambent flame; not speaking of a squint in the eyes, a snub nose, or one high shoulder: these little inconveniences occur to the gifted as well as the vulgar portion of humanity. Conquer your curiosity; it will only lead to disappointment: antiquity was right in perching its heroes on the clouds."

By such exhortations I sought to cool the heated brain of my friend: without self-flattery, I may say that wisdom herself made use of my voice: well, well; I must avow that I did not meet with the success which I deserved. He pressed for introductions, I temporised, and hence, a series of little snares laid, and ambushes contrived.

One evening as we were strolling through the arcades of the Rue Rivoli, a female passed before us: it was only the apparition of a moment, from the carriage to the door of a hotel; nevertheless Lucien pressed my arm, uttered a cry of joy, and exclaimed, 'The Countess of Mauleon.'

He had just pronounced a name celebrated on more than one account. I saw in the matter, only an accident of his abiding malady; nevertheless I asked where he had seen her. My question seemingly embarrassed him a little; and he made use of a subterfuge in asking me in turn, if he had said that he knew her. 'Without doubt,' said I, 'we do not name people on sight without previous knowledge.' 'Bah!' said he, 'it is pure instinct.'"

The road to political eminence being closed, and the pursuit of law being distasteful, nothing remains but the thorny path of letters; and Nepomucene gives him his own ideas on points connected with this career.

"If possible be yourself; if you cannot, then follow the great writers: these are the two divisions of my discourse. Have genius if you can; if not, have talent at least: God gives one, the other we can obtain of ourselves.

In your provinces, my friend, you are partial to tinsel and Dutch metal; it is a peculiarity of primitive people: the Indian encumbers his nose and lips with rings; the Negro doats on glass beads; every one pursues his own penchant here below. You are fond of what sparkles and multiplies coloured images: take care; the sight is injured by excess of glitter and refraction."

Honest Nepomucene then alludes to the revolt against the monarchs of the ancient regime of letters conducted by Victor Hugo and the other Romanticists, which may be found in the early career of Jerome Paturot,* and alludes to their short usurpation; and mentions with pity, the decadence and old age of the once effervescing mad spirits. Some have become reasonable and returned to the ancient standards, others have remained old boys, and their case is hopeless. He then mentions the system of a neutral party who by borrowing a strip of noble language from one, a colloquial style of wit from another, &c., have got on a new vesture for which though they owe nothing to any one in particular, they are in debt to the whole world. Next he directs his attention to the literature of the Regency.

"Are you curious in matters of the toilette? there you will find the patch, the hoop petticoat, the red high-heel shoe, pearl powder and what not. In other styles you have all nature at your command; the sun, the moon, the elements, twenty comedians of the first class, a full chorus, eight scenes newly touched up, and sixty tunics in real Tyrian purple. You need put no stint to your fantasy: cameo profiles, figurantes after the antique, frescoes of Herculeanum, Etruscan vases, trophies of arms, leopard skins, crested helmets, all the bric-a-brac of the historic ages beginning with Nabuchodonosor. But with the Regency, venture on none of these properties, none whatever. Two personages and two screens; behold your resources: make the most of them you can. After all, the receipt is extant: nice little words, nice little phrases, nice little intrigues, nice little dénouements: leave the rest to chance and the skill of the comedians."

The lecture continues, and the various high and by-ways of art are thrown open; and after passing the various schools in brief recapitulation before Lucien, he suddenly asks him to which of them he inclines; and the inattentive pupil half awaking from a reverie, involuntarily announces to his astonished tutor, his intention of entering the school of the Countess of Mauleon.

This second mention of the too celebrated Countess, between whom and George Sand we are inclined to detect a likeness, inquires the poor guardian, and by dint of affected sympathy, and a promise of revealing his own early follies some day, he induces Lucien to enter on a general confession.

* See IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Vol., III., No. 11, p. 497.

"I was sixteen at my return from Cahors to my mother's house, and during the four months between my humanities and law studies, there was a complete void in my occupations. It was too much for an unquiet spirit like mine, on which labour alone could impose a salutary restraint. From submission to a strict regime I passed at once to an independence the most absolute. This contrast surprised and troubled me: it seemed as if the ground was going to glide from under my feet, and I was stretching out my hand to find some chance support.

In the first week I was drunk with liberty; I climbed the mountain at morn, and did not return till night; as if I wished to recover in one day, the air, the azure, the songs, the verdure, and the sunlight of the last six years. Then this liberty began to weigh on me from its very excess. My body found healthy employ; my soul began to lack nourishment; I began to regret my mental chain, and would have voluntarily resumed it: such is the human heart; it follows those things which it finds to be slipping away from it.

I should find out some occupation at any price; want of exercise hung on me like a funeral pall. Our house adjoined the presbytery, and the good Curé used often come and chat with my mother. He guessed at my complaint, and offered me the only remedy in his power, permission to make use of his library. 'The contents,' said he, 'are not very amusing, but they are calculated to instruct us how to make use of God's gifts in this life, so as to merit his rewards in the next.' Sacred or profane, what did I care? It was an employment, a study. I welcomed the favor as a boon from heaven. Next day I was in the middle of the old books, and up to my eyes in theology; I did not understand all I read, but I had a book in my hands, and was satisfied. So the thing went on till I made a singular discovery one day when the Curé was on duty. I was on a scrutiny among the shelves to discover something more diverting than The Works of St. Anselm, or The Summa of St. Thomas, when in a corner I discovered carefully papered up, two volumes nicely bound, and having all the appearance of intruders—a romance in fact. You are not to form an unjust opinion of the good clergyman, my cousin; these were spoils he had wrested from the demon, and having been overlooked, they were lying there on their road to the kitchen fire.

When the work touched my hands it seemed as if I was handling fire; when I read the name of the author, I felt something analogous to an electric shock. For fear of being interrupted, I carried away the fatal work,—fatal but immortal. I carefully kept it concealed, happy to touch it, and anticipating the enjoyment of the forbidden fruit; alas, we are all veritable children of Eve. When I found myself really alone, I began with eyes and ears on the strain, for fear of detection. I read on, line by line, page by page, and then commenced again, as you would drink some exquisite liquor, drop by drop, to enjoy the full savor and perfume. Twenty times I renewed the delightful task, till at last, every word remained on my memory as if burned in with a red-hot brand. Thenceforward my solitude was peopled, my time filled up, my brain fully furnished. I even had extacies in which the heroes of the book figured: in my dreams I saw them smile on me, glide behind the hedges as I walked, and go before me up the mountain side. They formed a cortege sufficient to fill my thoughts, and from which I would not for worlds be separated.

Now from the personages of the romance, my thoughts naturally strayed to the author who had given them life and form. My dear cousin, if the benches of the Faculty of Toulouse could speak, they would betray the injustice done by my engrossing pre-occupation to the Pandects of Justinian. Even during the most interesting causes, I had little attention to spare from the very illegal object that lay in the bottom of my hat. I had now devoured, and ranged in the compartments of my brain, twenty volumes of phantoms, who always appeared to me in my sombre hours, and made the charm of my solitary existence. You ask me if I had known the Countess of Mauleon and where I had seen her; I have never seen her any place in my life, and yet I know her intimately. Out of all the beings animated by the breath of her genius, I have composed an essence, and that essence is herself. She has the grace of this, the port of that heroine; the eyes of one, the ebon locks of the other. Here and there I have collected the charms which she has painted, to attribute them to herself; the beauties budding and blowing under her pen, to present her the gracious offering. This is how I know her, it is this that brings her name to my lips on every occasion; this is why I recognised her when she passed us. Now you have the solution of the enigma: was I not right in calling it a school-boy's fantasy?

'Say rather a poet's; we must cure you of it, it is a malady of the country.'

'Cure me, dear cousin! why cure me of my only happiness?'

I did not push the inquisition farther, but I was sufficiently alarmed by my discovery. The head of my pupil was susceptible of a fermentation greater than I could have imagined. There were perils, and of different kinds in his path. I knew the divinity in whose honour he had been burning his solitary and unmarked incense for three years. I knew how she would treat her worshipper if he ever approached her altar, and on what footing she would receive his homage. These forebodings caused me much trouble. I should procure him some distraction, turn his attention to, and fix his interest on other objects; you will shortly see how I succeeded."

Nepomucene proceeds to say, that he looked on his patient in the light of those mariners of old whom the syrens allured, and reduced to death by inanition when they did not drown them outright; but how to stop Lucien's ears against the great syren's song is the task. He is of solitary habits, and duped by the creatures of his own imagination; his veneration for literary celebrities is extravagant; the proper cure for this must be an admiration directed to himself: it is the doctrine of cure by semblables in all its grandeur. We never see writers sincerely admiring their fellows; they reserve the precious article for themselves.

"To make amends they shew great attention to the dead, and this for two reasons equally judicious. First, they have nothing to dread from the vicinity of their pens, and secondly, the objects of their praise are not in a condition to profit by it."

It is hard if after securing so many literary reputations, I should fail in this one on which I have set my heart: but wherefore fear? a check to me indeed! You shall arrive, my Lucien, at the summit of literary eminence, without a halt, and to the sound of clarions. Nothing shall be wanting, and brass instruments shall be provided, regardless of expense. You shall have six benches of chevaliers hired expressly to applaud, and twenty crowns (provided by the management) descending on your head at once. You shall have six recals in succession, and four swoonings in the pit, confided to well dressed persons. You shall see, my dear Lucien, if my arm is heavy or not."

He now looks at his pupil's papers, and passing over several pretentious efforts, he fixes on a slight dramatic sketch, which he makes him retouch and enlarge; and after a world of trouble, he gets it accepted at a theatre on the Boulevards, songs being interwoven by a hack of the establishment.

"My first trouble was with the actress who was to play the principal part. All depended on her; let her take her role with a bad grace, with negligence, or ill humour, all was over: we sunk into the river of Lethe, where so many fine things are lost, from the humble vaudeville to the proud opera. Cost what it would, we must enlist her in our cause, push her to excess—excess of zeal, excess of the toilette; dazzle her with the merit of the work, and inaugurate its reception by a dress of a novel and tasteful character. A new dress for a piece in one act! When you put an actress to the expense of a new gown for a performance you enchain her; there is a unity of interest between you; a new robe! Nothing more sovereign; she must appear in it thirty times to have her outlay replaced.

Being sure of the actors, I had still to disarm and seduce the press. Nothing more easy; your newspaper critic for the most part, is easy and goodnatured ; his ferule often comes down without touching the obnoxious fingers. Besides I had had the forethought to scatter green-room reports abroad, which had found their way everywhere. In twenty quarters there were questions of a new piece destined to effect a revolution in art. A young genius had come up from the south, with his portfolio, crammed with the most original and finished productions. From his rich bouquet he had consented to detach one simple and modest flower. When pressed, the name of the piece and of the theatre so happy as to obtain it, were given ; but the name of the writer was enveloped in the most complete mystery. The human spirit is accessible to fables : this report had the completest success, and its echoes were innumerable among the lazy and inquisitive public. I was not content with public seductions, I practised personal ones and with great success. I visited the distributors of praise or blame. To interest them, I had only the one note, but it threw enchantment over each. 'The Author belongs to your school,' said I to the first. 'The Author has drawn inspiration from your works,' was my confidential remark to the second. To the third by way of variety, 'The Author looks to you as the true organ of public opinion : he sets little store by the judgments of the rest.' I made exception with none ; I repeated this song to every critic : what advantage in making any one jealous or discontented."

With such preparation how could the piece be damned ? It had a wonderful success, but to Nepomucene's great chagrin, Lucien was more annoyed than gratified by the adulation he met with from all quarters. So his patron takes the resolution of letting the Chevalier Rigobert loose on him.

This 'great unknown' had got a name by acting as fourth collaborateur in an occasional vaudeville got up to celebrate some such event as the three July days. The merit of the poetry can be judged from the specimens subjoined—

Célébrons notre Souverain ;
Son nom est gravé sur l'airain !

Or—

Ohantons, chantons, notre bon roi ;
Il a nos cœurs et notre foi.

Or this—

Vive, vive notre monarque !
Qu'il soit respecté de la Parque.

Dating from the execution of these precious bits of rhyme, he never ceased to persecute the Government till he obtained the Cross of the Legion of Honour. His claims were cogent : ' his three fellow-labourers were décorées ; why should not he ? ' The powers were tired out, and granted his request ; and he became the Chevalier Rigobert, first of the name, and unprivileged to transmit his title. And oh, what a world of care he took to keep his literary merits before the public ; to admit the sun and the air to his sickly hot-house plant at the proper season, and to cover it carefully at the approach of frost !

" In places where he was on a familiar footing he entered in a hurry, speaking before the door was closed behind him : ' what ! nothing said of my books or myself for three long weeks ! Not a line quoted, not one word : do we live in Tartary ? ' At other times he would take the man of influence aside, and accost him in a feeling and melancholy tone : ' My dear sir, what can I have done to you ? ' ' Me ! Chevalier ; nothing, at least nothing that I know.' ' Ah ! surely I have ; behold, I cast myself at your feet, I'll make any reparation in my power : speak.' ' Reparation ! Chevalier : what need of any, seeing there is no wrong done ? ' ' Ah ! I see you are implacable ; but why have you attacked me with such acrimony ? ' ' I attack you ! I have not even mentioned your name for two years.' ' That is the very thing I complain of, and every day you speak of my collaborateur X ; and now you say you have no spite to me : ah, you hypocrite ! ' "

So Rigobert is just the man to inoculate Lucien with a due appreciation of public favor, He has the entrée in many influential circles, Nepomucene is not always at leisure to chaperon his protégée, and so a very desirable connection springs up between the experienced dunce, and the inexperienced man of genius.

Soon after the acquaintance took place, the world was astonished to see in a certain feuilleton, a sketch replete with genius, grace, and ability, and subscribed with the name of Rigobert. How had Rigobert, the sapless, fallen on a fresh living vein ? was the question. Had he, in the silence of his study, and safe from the eyes of justice, opened an artery in some young and innocent writer, and by drinking his blood infused life and vigour into his own spent frame. Still the fact was destitute of proof, till Nepomucene meeting him, and hypocritically complimenting him on his triumph, requested to see the piece, as he wished earnestly to submit it to Lucien for his imitation. Seeing the evident terror which this proposition struck into Rigobert's heart, he said no more, but guessed at once that it was some forgotten piece of Lucien's which the old pirate had purloined. Not willing to create an enemy for his pupil, but at the same time to punish the thief, he cunningly secured his appearance before a select company of known literati; and in spite of his doubtings and denials, at last forced him to acknowledge Lucien as the author. 'And after all,' said he 'what harm? Is he not a man without a name, and what's more, a fool?'

"Between Lucien and myself now ensued one of those strifes in which stratagem is brought to aid natural strength, and where the tactics consist in avoiding an engagement.

This role was the same as played in old times by Xenophon at the head of his 'ten thousand,' and by Fabius when guarding the approach to Rome against the conquering Carthaginians. It consisted in tiring out the enemy, in turning him aside from his object, and in enveloping him with wiles and ambushes. At all hazards Lucien pushed on towards his idol; while I fortified the outworks of the besieged temple with Chevaux de frise and impenetrable gabions. Mars defend the right!"

As a last resource, Mentor brings to his aid the Canoness Eulalie St. Epinac. This lady was born a poetess. Her mother saw in a dream, just before her birth, Apollo himself, lyre in hand, descend from Pindus, and scatter violets on her cradle; Euterpe executing variations on the harp, and Clio pronouncing a discourse: and all concluding with a rondo in the Ionian measure.

An eglantine was found marked on her body at birth; and before she was four years old, she had daubed her face and clothes with ink three times every day, and had almost poisoned herself on one occasion with a bottle of best japan fluid. At a very juvenile period she began to communicate her inspirations to the world. Hers was rather a precocious muse. The name of one piece was 'What is Love;' another looked more suspicious, its title ran thus, 'Life for two;' another took a still more decisive part, being addressed to 'To the object of my dreams;' but Nepomucene requested his hearers not to look for more harm than really existed: Eulalie merely clothed undefined longings in a sort of definite drapery.

She now began in the evenings to inflict recitations on her mother, and the servants at their spinning wheels ; and as her audience understood the poetry as well as they did Sanscrit, their admiration was without bounds. Finally she came to Paris, published her collection, and acquired a certain degree of consideration with the public.

"Now it should seem that with a fair share of renown and a respectable name, she would have her choice of husbands ; however, this expectation was not realised. A little court had formed round her, but no one stepped from the ring to offer her his hand : nothing, no proposal either spontaneous or formal ; homages in abundance, but no offers. Among the really serious well wishers, some recoiled in terror of the young and eager swarms of admirers who made her cortege ; others wishing to judge her by her works, read her poems one by one, and were frightened at the amount of sighs which she had already exchanged with the moon, the stars, and other objects still more suspicious. It seemed dangerous to take charge of a woman who had made declarations to so many animated beings ; and they naturally asked themselves if after such extravagant expenditure of sentiment, she could have preserved any thing agreeable at all to say to a husband : these natural but wrong suspicions kept them from offering proposals."

Having arrived at the mature age of thirty, unwedded, she became a canoness* to spite the tasteless crowd who should have interfered in time ; and lived on a small hereditary pension, and on the premiums annually awarded to poets and poetesses, under the names of violets and eglantines, by an old foundation which has existed in Toulouse from the time of the troubadours. She is now settled for life in a suite of two rooms, where she occasionally holds a little court of poets young and old.

Nepomucene adopting the system of counter irritation, determines that Lucien shall become a star of her little court, and be weaned from his attraction to the Countess of Manson, who is a special object of hate to the good canoness : he pays her a visit to prepare the way.

"The palace of the poetess consisted of two rooms and a kitchen on the entresol. The chief ornaments were four portraits of the presiding divinity in oil, crayons, &c. Here her fingers swept the harp strings ; there her hand rested on a virgin sheet of paper ; now she plunged her quill in the ink-stand, and lastly she contented herself with an absence of all attributes. To vary the furniture of the scene, a robe lay on one chair, and a slipper on the floor; instances of seemly negligence, and serving to strengthen the local color."

Eulalie at her visitor's entrance is cooking her dinner in her small adjoining kitchen, and invites him to take a seat in that sanctuary, as she must jealously watch her pot till the due turn is given.

"Never was I affected so by any spectacle; at the end of a Jewish patriarch's life it would not have escaped my memory. Armed with a big iron spoon, the divine Eulalie skirmished with that dexterity conferred by habit alone; plunged it into the boiler, drew it forth, and tasted the contents by gingerly touching its edge with her lips.

Sometimes even, in the heat of conversation, she used it as a music baton, and flourished it about to the imminent danger of my vestments. * * *

'Yesterday, my friend, I had a servant; I have been obliged to dismiss her without drum or trumpet. You cannot keep a domestic now; she will turn out so exacting, so argumentative, so hardened in vice. This one for instance, a cow-herd from her shed, from the middle of cocks and hens, with cow-dung in her sabots, and straw in her hair:—this one knowing nothing, never having seen service but with muleteers, a machine, a turn-spit;—eh, well! what do you think she complained of? I'll give you a thousand guesses.——She complained of the diet.' 'Oh, frightful!' 'You may well say so; I had a mind to cram her with clover on the spot; but that is not the worst; a new vice has crept in among servants; they are corrupted to the core; we will be devoured infallibly by the harpies. What do you think? they insist on being regularly paid.'"

Her astonished visitor asked could such wickedness be possible; and while insisting on its naked verity, she brandished her spoon with such recklessness, that he was obliged to make a brisk retreat to avoid its dripping contents. The culinary operation being over, she requests him to step into the salon while she puts herself to rights. She makes him endure a pretty long wait, and then enters in radiant guise, to compensate for her neglected kitchen undress. Nepomucene explains his wish for the admission of Lucien to her conversations, and to his surprise she asks the color of his friend. He rejoins by hoping that she did not imagine he could think of presenting her a negro; adding that Lucien was a handsome brun. She cries out that she has already eight of that complexion on her hands, and says that if he were a blond of Scandinavia something might be done. He observes that there are bruns and bruns, but she still persists in demanding a Swede or Russ. He then intimates that his friend is a poet; that once in accord, their lyres would sound in unison, and lend each other mutual support, but this unlucky suggestion is the worst move of all.

' "So, so; one coxcomb more on my hands, as if I had not enough already. Whence do you come, my friend? have I to do at last with an enemy? I begin to entertain serious doubts of you, your offers sound so strange. A poet indeed! you might as well offer me a serpent to be warmed in my bosom. A poet to deprive me of my living! to steal my eglantines, and reduce me to a dry crust! Ah! Nepomucene; ought I to expect this from you."

Foiled in all his side attacks, he now makes a direct charge, and tells the naked truth; Lucien's senseless admiration for the Countess of Mauleon, and his earnest wish to save him from coming within the sphere of her fascinations.

"Eh, my dear friend, why did you not say so at first? The Countess of Mauleon indeed! Oh you cannot be aware how I detest her. An observer of your power not to know that it is always a pleasure for one woman of letters to mortify another!

'You ask me to enter into your design. Why, my friend; I would cheerfully pay for the privilege. I will take your young friend in hands. He is dark 'tis true, but we will repaint him: besidea, the Countess doats on bruns; let her come: I'll pull out half a dozen of her teeth, sooner than give him up to her; Countess of Mauleon indeed!'

'Bravo! Eulalie. You are really superb;' and in truth she looked for the moment like the handsomest of the Eumenides.

'It is because I hate her so cordially: there is no word in the language strong enough to express what I feel towards her. A woman who has had such success, a woman whose works sell; and I, to pardon such a thing!'

'You are right,' said I, stirring up the fire of her resentment, 'it is unpardonable.'

'It might be borne, if she possessed talent; but one should be purblind, bandy-legged, hump-backed, and all skin and bone, like that idiot, THE PUBLIC, to find in her the shade of an idea, of a sentiment, of any beauty whatever; and yet her books are printed, are sold, and find publishers to push them, and imbeciles to read them. Misery! and what does this prove but that we are all going to the dogs?"

"So you accept your part, Canoness?"

"Accept it! Ay, with four hands, if I had them. Let me have the rosy, foxy or brown, who cares? I should not have looked to shades: he will be an instrument of revenge on the Countess. Do not mingle in this business, you would strike too light. Send the young man of any color heaven pleases. I'll be revenged for all I have ever suffered in enduring her praises. But in talking I have forgotten my simmering pot: now you must go. Oh! Vengeance, Vengeance! what a morsel for a king!"

Now is our young hero, day after day, plotting, fasting, walking, and watching at corners, and under gateways, to catch a glimpse of his idol; to follow where she has passed, and to look on these privileges as the greatest on earth. His guardian, seeing the state of things, hurries forward his first appearance in Eulalie's salon, where, in presence of her four portraits, and young, aspiring, hoping poets, and old, unprinted, despairing ones, and at the round serge-covered table in the middle of the apartment, he is to favor the presiding goddess, and her little court, with a specimen of his poetic powers. Nepomucene detests poetry, and on this occasion only, he will submit to the infiction.

"Must I acknowledge my shame; own to my cowardice? well, if it must be so, let it be. I spent an hour beside myself; I took pleasure in the recital. I resisted at first, then gradually gave ground step by step, then gave way to complete enjoyment. It was that Lucien sung his passion in true accents, such as go to the heart whatever be the form of the language. In a series of fragments, he painted the state of a soul attracted to unknown divinities; and moulded the feelings in a shape taken from the spirit of his dreams. A little of Pygmalion, a little of Venus Aphrodité; grace, languor, murmurs of the waters, murmurs from the sky, the hues of the solar prism, the perfumes of earth and air:—all these floated in the chaunt. Behold the cause of my defeat, of my utter discomfiture. Me sensible to the seductions of verse! Ye gods of good sense, gods of prose, give me your pardon."

If this poesy produced such an effect on one of the 'prophane,' judge of the emotions of the 'initiated.' It was but one cry and one extasy during the recital. At every instant, Lucien was interrupted by the marks of an involuntary admiration. Such testimonies were too vivid not to be sincere: besides, there prevailed in these fragments, such an elevation of feeling and thought, such vigour, and such brilliancy, that we felt ourselves bound, and hurried along, despite of every obstacle, and by an irresistible impulse. But you should have seen poor Eulalie. Her eyes flashed, and her lips breathed out a visible triumph. She had reason to be proud in reality: it was an epoch for her salon, now become the cradle of an illustrious name. Oh ! to see her movements, her gestures, her agitation !

'Oh ! divine, divine,' she cried : 'divine,' they all repeated in chorus ; 'a great poet is born,' she added ; 'yes indeed, a great poet,' cried the juniors with enthusiasm : 'a great poet,' repeated the unpublished seniors in a lower key, as became those who had felt the thorns of the art.

The assembly was dissolved and the youths would have constructed a bier to conduct the Laureat in triumph to his lodgings. The Canoness did not shrink from any excess : she had fished from the depths of a press, two or three perfumed handkerchiefs, and was not happy but while wiping the moist and heated brow of the poet. I am sure she would have proposed a foot-bath in addition, and herself as the hand-maid, but that this ceremony seems to belong exclusively to ancient manners."

We would now seem to be in a fair way to secure our young poet from the songs of the syren Countess, but the scheme, though well contrived, proved nought. A mad philosopher who has the entrée in the salons both of Countess and Canoness, fastens himself on Lucien to induct him into his system ; and the victim puts his head willingly into the snare, for by conversing with Trinachon, he can hear about his idol and her doings. A card of invitation is at last presented to Lucien, who of course, now walks on air ; but the same card being forgotten on the sofa in Eulalie's salon, and coming under her eyes, infuses fright and grief into her excitable and loving heart. She is now enraged at Lucien for his ingratitude and weakness ; against his patron for not having infused better principles into him ; and against Trinachon for seducing him into the enemy's camp. Poor Trinachon was a very unconscious instrument in the transaction. His system was, that we were all mistaken as to the proper offices of the feet and head. In order that honey should be collected from the leaves of trees, and wine flow without ceasing from all the public fountains, we had nothing to do but elevate our feet in the air, and use our heads as organs for walking. Hearing that a young poet had arisen, he pounced on him to secure his services as high priest to his new cultus, and the invitation to the Countess's party fell out without any selfish or treacherous design on the part of the system-monger. Lucien patiently listened to his ravings to get a word or two about his divinity, and Trinachon rejoiced in the acquisition of an important disciple.

On the very day before the much longed for party, Lucien, gazing on the Countess's hotel from the corner of a street, is struck by the pole of a carriage, and carried home senseless. The Countess and Trinachon are in the vehicle at the moment of the accident. She is naturally troubled at the mischief, and interested about the handsome young poet; makes frequent enquiries at his lodgings during his confinement, and though Nepomucene and Eulalie were his unwearied nurses while his life was in jeopardy, the ungrateful youth forgetting their devotion, makes use of his returning powers in the first instance, to wait on, and thank the Countess for her solicitude. His devoted nurse takes this proceeding in very bad part, she thus opens her mind to Nepomucene—

“ ‘ You cannot blame me for entertaining suspicion ; the thing is not natural. Here is a dame who wishes to demolish the young man, and pound him into fragments ; who sets her carriage at full speed to exterminate him ; breaks two of his ribs, and introduces the carriage pole into his reins ; and would have extinguished him but for the intervention of Providence. Well ! all this is fair and above board : I love open warfare of the sort, but what does my young hero ?—does he launch an omnibus against her ?—does he oppose pole to pole, wheel to wheel, horse to horse ? Not at all : this is only done in Corsica : our young poet is a chevalier and a Frenchman. He returns the thrusts of the pole with flourishes of his hat : he adores this she-devil who sought his life : when a name is on his lips it is hers. * * * But shall we endure this ignominy ? No. Shall we have the trouble ; she the profit ? Oh ! Nepomucene, when I think of it, I feel that I have nothing human about me : I am become a tigress, a wolf, a chacal : I think I could devour the traitress without repugnance. Shall she bear away the fruits of our labours ? No, it would be odious. I'll brave the laws if it must be ; I'll set the code at defiance ; I'll affront the Gens d'armes. If I must tell you all, Nepomucene, I will descend to poison, poison of the lowest kind,—ay even to ratsbane.’ * * * A new date now marked the life of Lucien : his career began, mine ended. He had nought to stay his conquering steps : I, nought to do but seek the shelter of my tent, and staunch my wounds. I had lost my Cannæ ; he had crossed his Rubicon.”

A fine description is now given of the little Elysium composed of the hotel and gardens of the Armida of our tale, but we prefer some account of herself. Reybaud, for obvious reasons, gives the heroine a genealogy different from the one adopted in the Mémoires de ma Vie lately published, but the reader will be under no doubt as to the identity of the two ladies. A painter immortalized by Cervantes, when commencing a sketch, dashed down colors and shades at random for a while ; then withdrew to a distance, and sought to discover in the chiar-oscuro, some resemblance to an object in nature ; having discovered a likeness, he put in a few finishing touches and wrote underneath, for instance, "This is a fox." In opposition to this process, our artist makes a finished portrait and puts a feigned name underneath. Having mentioned her as sprung from a warlike race, he proceeds—

"She had this martial spirit even from childhood. Under the show of an angel she concealed the tricks of a demon ; and a will of iron under the appearance of extreme sweetness. What shone out in her particularly was a need of action, which nothing could satisfy ; she should comprehend all at the first view. If you gave her a book, she would go to the last pages after reading the first few words ; a toy, she could not rest till she took it to pieces. She felt no greater delight than in destruction. Years brought a little moderation to her movements ; but still the destroying spirit was at work, and stormed the more for being obliged to remain inactive in the depths of her heart ; as the lava of the volcano rages in the breast of the mountain, before bursting its crater."

Our young prodigy marries, and is tired of the arrangement from the wedding day. Nepomucene requests his hearers to draw any consequences they please from this fact, as they will be in no great danger to go beyond the truth. The Count is not a man to be disturbed with small domestic troubles, but his outline is touched in the picture with a very misty brush. The Countess assumes the most perfect liberty of action from the beginning ; but the revolt against legitimate authority is not conducted in a vulgar style nor in bad taste ; not at all.

"Seldom has nature re-united under the same envelope, so many rare qualities ; a charm so evenly sustained, a tact so exquisite, a genius so true, a power of art so sure of its own strength. She looked at objects as no other person would ; and found colors wherewith to depict them, which were worthy of the greatest painters. Every view, material or moral, was imprinted on her mind in the freshest and truest outlines and colors ; and at a future epoch were produced as if they had been the object of her study only an hour before. She as yet had no presentiment of her destiny, and doubted her powers ; hence tumultuous sensations and ideas which, rising to the surface in disorder, destroyed each other. They formed materials, however, for future creations. At last her vocation was revealed ; and obeying her martial instincts, she marched direct to glory, and attained her object at the first effort. * * * She at once secured the public ear, and being of the number of spoiled children to whom so many things are pardoned, she at last did what she pleased with her audience. She had clients by thousands, the young who are always led by novelty; the women in whose breasts her complaints woke ten thousand echoes, all the spirits disturbed or in a state of revolt; finally, the critics who willingly raise such writers to the clouds, to have the pleasure of casting them down when they please. * * * Her salon became the centre of genius, rank, and distinction, which she ruled with ease by virtue of her matchless grace and talent.

Imagination with her was more lively than feeling. So she watched the emotions of her own heart, and the hearts of others, as subjects of study for future pictures and sketches. She cultivated the society of great painters, statuaries, musicians, dreamy poets, and dashing writers, to borrow color from this one, a bold and vigorous style from that, harmony, form, and adjustment of draperies, from the others. * * * Her real empire lay over the stormy or serene worlds of the imagination, where fancy creates or destroys at will; flings in her lights or spreads thicker darkness. * * * Besides her skill in the outline, color, and drapery of the outer world, she had sounded the mysteries of the heart, and examined the folds and recesses of its passions. It was an open book which she read at sight with ease, and interpreted with unerring truth. * * * But she could not be content with exercising her powers in the fields of fancy and feeling, so full of verdure and flowers, and pleasant paths, and peopled with happy images, or even those thunder-stricken rocks, which occasionally throw gloom on the landscape. No; she aspired to patronise Trinachon and such as he with their mad systems; and she quitted these pursuits in which she was supreme, for those where success was unattainable. So she exchanged the outward lovely human form for the dry bones and corded muscles; and trucked her fairy robe for a doctor's gown. Every system-monger seized on her, and had her ear by turns. With one set, she fired out Heaven with blasphemies, and heaped tirade on tirade to elevate her defiances still higher: with another she dived into the metempsychosis, and patronised ghosts and mid-day visions. It was not the fault of the Trinachons that she did not descend to those morasses from which ascent is impossible.

Thus had she successively reflected the influences by which she was beleaguered. From the poets she had passed to the romancers; from the romancers to the artists; from the artists to the philosophers; from the philosophers to the creators of worlds turned inside out. She was in this last stage, when Lucien was thrown into the melée, and traversed her systems in a sort of comet-like orbit."

Nepomucene accepts an invitation to a pretty crowded reunion at the Hotel Mauleon, in order to see upon what footing Lucien is received. Lucien he cannot find after strictest search, but Calypso dazzles and captivates Mentor in spite of his ægis.

"This evening she was absolutely radiant, and filled the salon with her presence. She attracted every one's attention, and extorted the admiration even of the most rebellious. No one could be less disposed to submit to her fascinations than myself; I had too many causes of grief against her, and these of a really legitimate kind. No matter: I was overcome, and obliged to give up my arms, vanquished by her grace. Among so many fine women present, she alone bore the stamp of acknowledged grandeur. Others might be regular in feature, pretty, beautiful, charming, she alone was grand. Among the rich and fashionable costumes, she was dressed with enchanting simplicity: you would have said that a goddess had descended from her altar to mix for a while with mere mortals.

When I entered, the concert had begun, and the virtuosos were relieving each other at the piano. Every one knows what intolerance reigns on occasions when talent of the first order is in question. Movement or circulation is strictly interdicted; an involuntary sound, a whisper, brings indignant and furious looks from every side. The exercise of the natural functions is abolished; even breathing is only tolerated under certain conditions. All this is detestable to me. I do not hate music, even when pushed to its ordinary excesses; but I admire its bona-fide amateurs and endurers, who, for three mortal hours, between the heated air of the salon, and the icy breeze from without, and all the while standing upright, are pressed, crushed; a butt to digging elbows, and those swayings one side and the other, which inflict vertigoes on the toughest heads. If this be pleasure it must be owned that it is a dearly bought one.

Why should I remain? the artist at the piano was one of those the wavings of whose long hair give duly every vibration of the keys, and thus serve for most accurate melometers. I had nothing to learn; I had his mode and repertory by heart." . . .

Nepomucene makes his escape to the grass-plot for a little fresh air, and on his return, when he finds the rancour of the music abated, he detects Lucien perdu, behind a curtain, watching every movement of the Countess as if life depended on the scrutiny. He secures his guardian's arm for a promenade, in order to keep himself in countenance, and Nepomucene gives a sketch of a few Parisian art-sovereigns as they successively approach the fauteuil of the Countess to offer homage.

We give our readers permission to apply the proper christian and family names.

"'Eh! that blond with the metal buttons: prostrate yourself at once; that is the Baron Fanfare, who would not be appeased with less than twenty-eight editions of any of his works. One is cited as having run through sixty-four editions in three days; there appeared one per hour, day and night; you could not turn without having five in full chase after you; when you awoke you had ten additional ones on your hands.'

'He ought to be contented with his fame.'

'Not he, till he would be translated into all known languages, including the dead ones. From the Samoieds to the Iroquois his book should be a household word: from Norway to the isles of Oceanica. Such was his determination, and he succeeded: what will not an iron will accomplish? At first there was only one or two versions: now he walks abroad with thirty-two at his heels, and three of these can only be read by himself. People say that he has bought up the editions himself and paid the translators: sheer envy. He figures in the Magyar, and, let me ask, where did he find the translator? * *

'This is Count Melchior, the phoenix of statuaries, who has chiselled more lean heroes, and erected more blocks of marble than all the other artists in France. * * Whenever, either in Paris or the provinces, you see a great man looking cross, and exposed to the air, with an arrogant and morose mien; weak on his legs, and appearing on bad terms with himself and his neighbours; you may safely say 'that is Count Melchior' without a mistake. Moreover, if the drapery is clumsy, and the hair in disorder; if the collar of the coat sits awkwardly, and the pantaloons fit as the Fates please; if the whole figure wants grace, harmony, and distinction, you may repeat in a still more assured tone, 'that is Melchior at all events.' He despises detail, loves rude outlines, and thinks it a point of honor to depict nature uglier than she is. By these demerits he has captivated the public, and, if they chose to applaud, why should he aim at a purer and higher style of art?'

This evening the Countess was sustaining a siege of celebrities. Scarce had Melchior withdrawn when the Painter Maximus took his place. She had laughed with the others; with him she was serious. * * * No one could hold his head more grandly, or exhibit in his whole deportment such dignity. His features, mode of expressing himself, gesture, and accent, were peculiar to himself. Lucien was at rest while the others entertained the Countess; but the attentions of Maximus filled him with uneasiness, and he asked with eagerness for information concerning him.

'This is another prince of art: a few colors spread on a canvass with one brush only, and lo! he has won immortality; but you must gaze on the chef d'œuvre from a distance; if you don't, the effect will be lost: viewed near it is dirty, blotchy, rugged; far off it is sublime. I suppose you to be nigh one of his canvases, say a yard or two away. Very good: you cry it is a field of beet, and very indifferent plants they seem: the root tops might be better, and it is not easy to make out the leaves. This artist has mistaken his vocation; he has not a good hand for vegetable portraits. Wait, wait, you are mistaken. At six yards it is a battle field, at eight a sublime mêlée, at eleven you can easily distinguish the plumes on the casques, and the foam on the bridle bits. The brickly tones have become brilliant, and the dirty ones like the surface of a mirror: now the field of beet has disappeared. These are the miracles of perspective, and the triumphs of those who paint with a long brush.' * *

In the centre of the salon we observed a shabbily-dressed group whose members were not sparing of gesticulation. They spoke together in a loud key, as is usual with persons of pretension. Far from seeming offended, the Countess took all in good part; smiled at their loud laughter, and applauded their coarse jokes."

On Lucien enquiring, in a rather contemptuous tone, who these unseemly guests might be, Nepomucene requests him to speak low for fear of bringing their wrath on his head.

“‘Do you wish, madman, that they should cut you in slices, chop you into mince meat, and put you in a bottle of spirits to be preserved? Rash youth! these men would devour you alive without even the ceremony of plucking: several of them have not yet dined.’ ‘You are joking, cousin.’ ‘You are quite mistaken; I never jest on people whose commons are short and uncertain: it would be terrible sport. Do not look too attentively in their direction; they are like tinder at taking offence; and if one opens on you, the whole pack will join their throats in a moment. Beware! You would be surprised to behold personages of rank and influence bowing before them. Ah, ha! these are the lords of pen, ink, and paper, and powerful enough to sink you perches below the surface of the earth if you dare offend them. And then their lives are so wretched! for one that has wherewith to live, fifty are starving. See what furious looks they are darting towards us: I knew we would have them on our hands. Gently, gentlemen! you are all powerful writers, and honest critics. Be pacified; we have not the slightest intention of interfering to stop your supplies.’”

Lucien fancying that he has been neglected by the Countess during the evening, prepares to depart in dudgeon, and Nepomucene lauds his resolution. They have to pass near the spot occupied by the lady, and she simply utters the cabalistic word ‘remain’ in a low tone so as to be heard by our youth only.

“I urged him gently to the entrance, and he moved as leisurely as was possible, cudgelling his brains for a decent pretext to shake me off. To every excuse he hazarded, I had a suitable reply: none seemed reasonable to me, and I objected to the whole, still getting him toward the fatal porch. The poor wretch was now beside himself; he was covered with a cold perspiration, and wriggled under my arm like an eel. Finally I took pity on him; I received his last sorry excuse as valid, and left him to his destiny. He made his escape, bounding for joy, and I gained the entrance, laughing in my sleeve at the punishment I had made him endure.”

On coming out, Nepomucene is joined by the indefatigable and heart-sore Eulalie, who had come to the soiree to render her own misery more decided. She relates to him as they return, by what means she had made the irruption into the enemy’s camp.

“‘I had not the slightest hope of an invitation, nevertheless I did not delay my preparations for a moment. I drew out my deep blue gown, my jacket with gold cords whose effect is irresistible, my necklace and ear-rings of pearl, (best imitation), my embroidered handkerchief, my fan of the purest mother-of-pearl composition, and my shippers of real satin. Thus caparisoned and armed at all points, where did I first direct my steps think you? 'To the Hotel Mauleon I suppose.' 'By no means, my friend. I am none of these impudent people who force their entry; I know the usages of good society. I visited Trinachon, the great Trinachon, the favored of the Countess. He was dressing when I arrived, but I could not stand on trifles, and he was at the time in one of his darkest lunas: I do not believe that he was sensible of my presence. I aided his efforts at decency; adjusted his cravat, and gave his coat a touch of the brush of which it had great need. I then deposited him in the fiacre, and so we arrived without accident at the Hotel.

When we arrived, I made my debut in triumph, hanging on his arm.' 'But the Countess?' 'Ah! the poor Countess: it was refreshing to witness her perplexity. She came up to us, stiff as a pike, and looked from one to the other: lost labour, a genuine check-mate. Trinachon's feet were in the clouds; he spoke no word, I courted to the very floor. She returned to the charge, and enveloped us with a still more haughty regard: Trinachon preserved his immobility, and my reverences were lower than before. At last, to loose us from this dead lock, she pointed out a seat in a small side apartment, the impertinent dame! Ach! what a shabby entertainment! you took notice of it, I suppose.' 'Scarcely indeed.' 'That was not my case; I saw all, I tasted all. Refreshments indeed! nothing but rinsings; and the punch, warm water; as if rum and sirop were not to be had at the grocers'. It is a general rule, my friend, that where the punch lacks body, the house is badly managed. And the lighting—bah! those little lampions that seemed to chase each other, and strive which should give least light! I think that the liveries were borrowed; at all events I noticed more than one pair of cotton gloves. And it is with such frippery that we think we can play the great lady, and allow ourselves insulting airs: oh! it cries for vengeance: if the punch had even been strong!'"

Eulalie out of her slender salary, has hired an Auvergnat porter, whose station is nearly opposite the Countess's house, to keep a watch on Lucien's entrances and exits; and he, like a conscientious agent, and one who wishes to make the temporary employment a permanent one, is not sparing of ingenuity in making his returus interesting. Lucien at first paid his visits at the ordinary hours; afterwards, when the usual guests had departed, and finally the commissionaire could not look on him in any other light than as a member of the family. Nepomucene had latterly observed a studied elegance in dress about his rebel son, and well knew that to preserve a recherché appearance he was obliged to live on a dry crust; every new pair of gloves was balanced by a domestic privation, but Lucien appeared the happiest of men.

"All these circumstances taken separately were of weight; but united, they deprived me of every hope for the well being of my unfortunate pupil.

Shortly after, things got worse, the countess published a new work, and the flimsy veil was removed. * * * I have mentioned that she was in the habit of seeking for studies in the tumultuous struggles of her own heart: she also had her heroes and living models at her command. Nothing more simple or easy than the process. She had under her hand, an animated being: she could count the throbbings of his heart, and the pulsations of his arteries; there was no trait, no gesture, no word, no accent, no movement of his features, no impulse, no cry, no joyful sound, no complaint, that could escape her. These were her property, her domain, and she enjoyed them without participation. Had she need of a situation? She could create it at her own convenience. She could excite wild joy or deep grief in her subject, in order to paint them more exactly. She could cast this soul from one extreme to the other, conduct it from Elysium to Tartarus in order to furnish a more truthful picture of the heart's fluctuations. Such are the advantages of acting a part: certainly they were only on one side, but victims were never wanting for the experiments.

It was now Lucien's turn; there was no mistake about it: he was the hero of the new book. All were there except the name and place; She even selected for the scene of action, a site which could be associated with ease to the souvenirs of Merinval. She had sketched in, the mountains of Quercy under another name. There was nothing wanted; neither the hamlet, nor the presbytery, nor the figures of Madame Merinval and the good Curé. In this frame and among smiling friendly faces, the two walked hand in hand by the sides of thorn hedges; and under the old forest trees, over beds of moss.

Oh gods and goddesses! What beautiful things they said to each other, and what delightful invocations they made to nature. What irresistible arguments they discovered in favor of marriages made in the open air, and engagements not binding! With what vigour they cudgelled our prejudices and social slaveries, so contrary to the free development of the affections; and how clearly they established, that the true mode of celebrating heart-unions consisted in taking the sun or moon as witness to the sanctity of our vows.

Well they proved the vanity and disgrace of more serious contracts; and bitterly they lamented the lot of those females who have the cowardice and littleness of soul to submit to them. It was a veritable state of independence put within reach of all mankind, and particularly recommended to the initiated."

When Nepomucene encountered his friend after the publication of the book, he hinted to him that he had been used as they use well made corporals at the life academy; in fact that he had figured in a pose, and Lucien fled from his presence in the reverse of a good humour.

Nepomucene gives his hearers no further information than what has been dealt out already as to the domestic life at the Cornless's. Consequently the most fastidious reader need not fear piquant nor indiscreet revealings. In this point our Author deserves our very earnest praise, as he has not pandered to vicious or low tastes in any of his works that have come before us. Many writers pretending to disgust youth with vice, have produced the opposite effect, either by evil propensities inherent in themselves, or by a mistaken mode of proceeding:—not so with Reybaud. He represents his female demon as fascinating and irresistible, and makes only moderate use of censure or hard words; and yet the general effect is not attraction, but terror of falling under the influence of such a being.

Lucien bestows little of his tediousness on his old friend; but one morning he enters in a disturbed state, and after considerable hesitation, he announces that he must request his good offices as second, for either Marimus the beet-root painter or himself must kiss the sod.

Nepomucene seeks out Rigobert to act as the other second, and finds him with twelve small slips of paper before him; these are refreshers which, on the one subject—Rigobert's own honour and glory—and a little varied, he is about to dispatch to the different influential journals. Nepomucene acquaints him with the object of the visit, and Rigobert having no idea separate from seeking public applause, and being thoroughly incredulous as to the chance of a real duel in the present state of the world, rubs his hands in glee, walks backwards and forwards, and at last shouts out in joy, 'oh, the happy idea! oh, how well imagined!'

" 'Well imagined! What do you mean? Do you suppose that people imagine such things? I am sorry to say it is only too serious.' 'Do you take me for a school boy? Oh! it is only a healthy morning exercise.' 'I tell you the life of a man is at stake.'

'Do you imagine, my friend, that any one is killed in a duel nowadays? Can you quote an example?—a hostile meeting is only a healthy exercise.' 'I wish you would condescend to believe that the present business touches the life of a fiery young man; and that I am under the most extreme anxiety on his account.' 'Bless my soul! What fire is in your every gesture, and how well you simulate anxiety! It is in vain for you to refuse my praise; it is most divinely conceived.' 'I will really be offended if you continue in this vein, it shews very bad taste.' 'My dear friend, you could not have acted more to the advantage of Lucien; you have anticipated his fame and glory by ten years; you have created an enviable position for him ;—enviable even to such old stagers as myself. Oh ! What a delightful piece of excitement the day after the duel ! I fancy myself present. ‘Have you heard the news ?’ ‘No.’ ‘Little Lucien has been on the sod.’ ‘Indeed ?’ ‘Yes, he has fought : he nearly received four bullets and six sword thrusts.’ ‘Noble boy ! real heart of chivalry ! Soul of bronze !’ and so on, and so on. Now he has won a new position, he has his brevet of courage, his fame will fly abroad on the wings of two hundred journals ; it will encircle the globe ; and you wonder that I should be in raptures at the invention.

‘An instant now for business. We will have a formal account of this affair to draw up. You may say ‘tomorrow will be the proper time ;’ Ah my friend ! tomorrow will see us under the influence of our feelings, and there will be no time for the little delicacies of form or style. Besides, it is probable that there will be a déjeuner in question ; and then good bye to presence of mind. Let us compose the official at once : sit opposite, and give me the aid of your talents.’ ‘Write an account of a fact before it occurs !’ ‘Bah ! they all are attended with the same circumstances ; for instance :—

‘A rencontre took place this morning in the wood of Vincennes, ‘between the celebrated painter, Maximus, and Lucien Merinval. ‘After the exchange of two pistol-shots, the seconds declared ‘that honor was satisfied on both sides.’

‘Now, Nepomucene,’ said he, fixing his eyes on me with much solemnity, ‘how do you wish to figure in this affair ? Speak to me with entire sincerity. Use my pen as that of a true friend ; everything may be introduced into the paper in company with this celebrated duel. Shall I give you a warlike pose or paint you as the conciliatory genius of the meeting ? May I enumerate your hereditary and personal titles ?’

‘You will oblige me, chevalier, by not mentioning me in any manner whatever.’

‘Affecting instance of discretion ; I must strive to imitate you. I might abuse this godsend to my own glorification ; I will now not even use it legitimately ; so I will only add—

‘Among the seconds, figured the Chevalier Rigobert decorated ‘with various orders. The name of this gentleman enjoys a ‘European celebrity.’

The Countess gets wind of the duel, and by her strenuous interference (as we may suppose, for the particulars are not told), she brings about a hollow reconciliation. Rigobert’s chagrin and rage surpass all bounds when he hears the news. Such an opportunity lost for establishing Lucien’s fame, and for getting his own composition accepted by the journals. Rather than lose this triumph he would fight Lucien himself. Finally he was appeased by a solemn engagement that Lucien should get up another duel somehow, and an opportunity be thus given for repaying Rigobert for his preparations, and what was worse, his disappointment of a triumph.

There was now a fall in Jusien's life, but his happiness, such as it was, had a short duration. A young Swedish nobleman feeling the instinct of song unconquerable, offends his father, gives up the privileges of birthright, and comes to Paris where the most flattering reception awaits him.

"Everything combined to render him as happy as applause and admiration could make him. He was descended of a great race; he was from the land of fog and ice which Ossian has peopled with his terrible divinities; he united in his own person the perfections of the northern race, the beautiful fair hair, the transparent pearly skin, and the limpid blue eyes, it was the union of grace and vigour, the grace of the bard, the vigour of the hero. You may judge of the enthusiasm caused by his visit to Paris: this city does nothing by halves, where it stands godfather it does not spare the sweet-meats. From salon to salon, the aspirant found his renown expanding, till at last his empire was established over all minds and hearts: happy but transitory epoch, occurring but once, and bitterly regretted when the season is past."

At first he only appeared in the reunions of the old nobility, his last protest of high birth.

The Countess of Manleon, we may be sure, did not lose much time till he became a willing guest in her select parties. He felt himself there entirely at ease, for the mistress of the mansion knew how to preserve the discipline of the best society in her reunions, while there was much liberty of speech and opinion in many minor matters. Her reception of Count Rosario excited no particular scandal; she merely went out with all Paris to hail the new sovereign, reserving to herself the right to turn her allegiance elsewhere when she felt disposed.

Some time after Rosario's arrival, the Countess got up a charitable concert, in order to present to the public her new favourite, who could not possibly refuse on account of the laudable motive.

"We all know what ingenious stratagems raise recruits to assist at these pious and heavy entertainments. Wherever you go, snares are laid, and if you escape one you surely fall into another. At these seasons suspect the entire world and everything in it, the ladies particularly, they are patronesses; their smiles,—concert tickets are hid behind them. 'I have reserved two for you,' says one of these syrens, shewing two rows of the finest teeth in the world: 'expense, forty francs;' three for every tooth shewn. Perhaps you keep the chimney corner during the epidemic: alas! the penny-post is in existence for the secure dispatch of this afflicting commerce; your loss will be the same, and you will be a smile or two the less! No use in too much precaution against the plague; meet it with your face uncovered. * * *

I was one of the early comers, and yet the Countess was beforehand with me: Lucien was not far away, he seemed weary and sad. I had not seen him for some time, and was disagreeably affected by the change in his countenance. The appearance of ruddy health had quitted it, and the fresh color he had brought from his mountains had vanished: the expression was sorrowful, and the cheek pale; he seemed another being altogether.

The house was now filling fast, and in a short time every seat was occupied, and the Countess highly delighted with the success of her charitable speculation, looked back over the assemblage with a radiant expression on her face, greeted her friends, and sent her attendants from time to time to put different parties more at their ease: she had made it a point that the whole thing should be a wonder and a success. * * * I will not dwell on the pieces performed before Rosario appeared on the platform. At the long wished for sight, the hall was filled with such thundering acclamations, that I trembled for the stability of the building; it required the silence that immediately ensued, to reassure me. He sung, and the eyes and ears of the vast assemblage were fixed on him as by magic. It was said that his voice possessed the powers of every known instrument of music. Whoever has not heard this man cannot form a conception of the resources or power of the human voice, its all-pervading influence, and the mysterious ways by which it penetrates to the heart. Of all instruments yet invented, none can approach the expression of that which nature has conferred on man: on this evening no one entertained a doubt on the subject.

The first piece which was chaunted by Rosario was taken from an Italian opera; he did wonders with it, but it was in the second that he surpassed even himself. It was a national hymn of Sweden which he had got arranged for his voice, and in which the local spirit prevailed, and hid the technicalities of art. Nothing could exceed the vigour which he infused into this melody, the national traits which he wove into its composition, and the color with which he invested it,—a color martial and tender at the same time. In the rhythm, at once warlike and pastoral, might be recognised the child of the North, cradled by the Valkyriar, those tutelary spirits of the Icy pole who with one hand put the dying warriors out of pain, and with the other pour out for them in the halls of Odin, celestial draughts of beer and mead. The song scarcely occupied a quarter of an hour, but it was a period thoroughly filled; perhaps the audience could not have endured their excited feelings for a longer space. * * * While Rosario sung, the Countess's eyes were riveted on him, and her existence seemed as if suspended from his lips. On her countenance you might distinctly trace the expression of the passions or feelings he sought to rouse. Was the theme warlike? the stern sentiment took possession of her face. Did his voice express sweet or calm images? the glad smile dwelt on her lips. No shade of sentiment or feeling in the strain, but was reflected in the mirror of her fine countenance; she seemed to exist and to breathe only as the artist wished.

While she surrendered herself to her emotions with the most complete abandon, it was pitiable to look at poor Lucien. If I had to represent the deepest grief, I need only copy the woe stamped on his countenance. His eyes wandered from the singer to the Countess, and from the Countess to the singer, as if to catch hidden treason in its transit from one to the other. When he saw how complete was her absorption in Rosario, and her forgetfulness of himself, his features were convulsed with rage, and my heart bled at the picture of his wretchedness.

At last the torture was stayed, the entertainment was over, and I supposed that the Countess would have left the concert room attended by Lucien.

I was deceived: she passed into the adjoining room to compliment Rosario, and relieve her pent-up emotions. Lucien did not know how to keep his countenance at such a flagrant desertion. He took my arm, saying, 'You must see me home, dear friend; O heavens! how I suffer.' . . .

Thus, what Eulalie and myself had foreseen was accomplished. Scarcely had the myrtle wreath been placed on his brow, when the leaves began to decay under the blighting breath of an odious rival. Had he been given up to researches in antiquity like myself, I could have laid my finger among the leaves of history on two or three examples from which he ought to derive comfort; witness Elizabeth of England, and Catherine of Russia. These Queens of Nature proceeded just on the same system as the Queens of Art: they indulged their little caprices and changed their favorites. Thus he would have found himself kept in countenance by noble and distinguished men, without the inconvenience of being sent to Siberia or getting his head chopped off. But Lucien would not take comfort from looking on the matter in this light: he considered such meditations as incapable of bringing balm to his wounded heart: you and I would have acted differently. We have lived in contact with ancient sages, and know the value of the fair ones of the present day, and we would have used the maxims of one to counteract the evil influence of the other. The recipe is simple and effective. If the inconstant fair one says, 'Good day to you,' you have only to say 'Good day' in return, and all is over. Ah! how coolly and unconcernedly you and I would have pronounced 'Good evening' or 'morning,' as it might be. But poor Lucien had not cast his baggage of illusions into the trench: his heart, his imagination, his whole life was set on obtaining and securing the affections of the being who now threw him from her like a withered flower, and the defeat was more than his imaginative and sensitive nature could survive."

Roused by despair at last to make an effort, he entered the Hotel Mauleon, and had a scene with its mistress. Whether through caprice or a slight return to the former feelings, she would not hear of a rupture; and a truce was signed; but soon after our sensitive and much to be pitied hero (The reader is not to waste any portion of his valuable sympathy on the invisible and inaudible Count of Mauleon on any account), finding a relapse in process, flies from the Hotel, has his place taken for his native hills, and is on the point of starting when the entrance of a servant with a note in hand, and wearing the Mauleon livery, sends the diligence to the South without being encumbered by the weight of the prodigal son. The Countess feeling the privilege of desertion to be her own peculiar property, will not share it with Lucien or any man of woman born:—she of course might discard him, he should not desert her.

Rosario quits Paris for Italy, and now happiness is so secure that fate may do her worst. However, some ominous-looking little vapours are not wanting to chequer the otherwise unclouded sky.

"In the sketches published at this time by Madame Mauleon, the theme was Italy, and nothing but Italy, that darling of the sun.

Farewell our Quercy, with its goats suspended from the rocks; the Countess's fancy had flown elsewhere.

Our sombre groups of chestnut trees no longer gave her pleasure; she yielded the choice to orange and citron trees, with their delicious perfumes. I blame her not: the Apennines are as fine mountains as those of Auvergne, and the Tiber is somewhat more spoken of in history than the Lot; still, the sudden change in taste was suspicious.

Another symptom more alarming now exhibited itself. She began to lay down the world and its treasures at the feet of artists, particularly singers. She made them a race apart, endowed with all perfections and all virtues; they were the flower of the human race, the essence of animated nature. Providence had exhausted itself in producing them, and then reposed from its labours. Outside this class, all humanity served but as back-ground and foil. This was the theme; I will not dwell on the developments, as they might not suit the prejudices of readers of the ordinary notions in moral opinions. Among this privileged race she selected her hero. He was a proud youth you may suppose, and one who treated princes and kings with little ceremony. He did not hesitate to speak his mind to any son of Adam, and no one attempted a reply. Moreover he was a bon-vivant, no woman-hater, the adored of a whole bead-roll of Marchionesses, and not knowing what to do with such an embarras de richesses. How could it be otherwise, where there was such grace, talent, wit, command of voice, dignity, force, all centered in the same subject? In pagan times, there was here stuff enough for a demi-god, perhaps of a fully qualified denizen of Olympus. Nowadays, people look on such a paragon as scarcely a complete man."

We hasten to the only close such a tissue of folly and ill-regulated feeling could have. Lucien is pathetically informed one fine morning, that so much of the lady's time is to be taken up that day with necessary family business, visits of lawyers, &c., that she cannot see him till next day.—Next day arrives, and with it a note to our swain.

"I leave Paris, Lucien: seek not to rejoin me, enquire not why I quit you, nor whither I go, it will be a useless trouble. To every thing there are natural bounds which ought not to be passed: I feel convinced that we have attained these limits. I bear with me a kind recollection of you; it is the only essential thing. You are young; as you advance in life you will judge me as I wish to be judged, and not on the same footing as other women. Leave me the hope that on my return to Paris I will find a friend the more."

'ANGELE.'

We will not inflict on our readers, the sorrow, rage, and despair of Lucien on receiving his congé. It would have been in the ordinary economy of a feuilleton to have his body exposed at the Morgue a day or two afterwards: however it did not so happen. He pursued the false one, but a fever arrested his progress, and though he did not die, 'he, at least, was exceedingly sick' for a long time. By removal to his native air, and by the care of his mother, Nepomucene and Eulalie, he was restored to society at last, fell into an inheritance, married a virtuous and beautiful country girl whom we are sure he did not deserve, and Eulalie was welcomed to an abiding home in his chateau, a consummation which she really deserved.

The Countess did not reap the full amount of felicity she expected. A short time after her arrival in Italy, Rosario deserted her society for that of one who was neither a genius nor a beauty.

It is only justice to refer to the improved tone of the latter writings of the Lady, whose features appear plainly enough through the thin disguise thrown over them by our Author. Whoever reads Francois le Champi—Le Mare au Diable, Mont Revêché, or Les Maîtres Sonneurs, will enjoy the beauty of style and truth of feeling, the sound judgment in everything connected with art, and the management of the story such as distinguished her early writings, without any of the detestable offences against the true interests of society, by which they were sullied.

As our present Author's design may be so well gathered from the extracts, and as his peculiar powers and qualities, as a writer, have been displayed at such length in former articles, further observations on these heads seem unnecessary.

We have glanced at some of his novels of the ordinary sort, where sketching of character, and the excelling qualities of such a work as the one under review, were subservient to the interest of a mere story. But we prefer him as the caustic and close, though good natured observer, Jerome Paturot, or Nepomucene the Aristarch.

The reader cannot fail to be struck by the boldness and strangeness of the plan of the present story, where a well-known and accomplished writer is presented, and endowed with such selfish and unamiable traits of character.

ART. III.—JOHN BANIM.

CLOSING DAYS OF LIFE. DEATH. PENSION GRANTED TO HIS DAUGHTER. DEATH OF HIS DAUGHTER. PENSION GRANTED TO MRS. BANIM. MEETING CALLED IN KILKENNY TO ERECT A PUBLIC TESTIMONIAL TO BANIM. RESOLUTIONS AND NAMES OF COMMITTEE. TESTIMONIAL ERECTED. CONCLUSION. APPENDIX.

At the conclusion of the last published portion of this Biography of John Banim we left him, with the shadow of death around him; the mind was waning—the tree was dying from the top—the stage was darkening as the curtain fell. Yet life was about him, and he longed for life. Those who watched by his bed in these days tell us of the time, in memories bright and gloomy—those “bitter-sweet” recollections which have in them as many smiles as tears.

One friend, not his brother, who lived in daily intimacy with Banim during these times—who knew his phases of thought, his modes of composition; who watched the clouds and sunshine of his mind, has written, at our earnest request, the following narrative of Banim’s last months of life:—

“February, 1856.

My Dear Sir,

In consenting to your request that I would supply you with some written recollections of the late John Banim, I have had to overcome a great deal of reluctance which I very naturally felt when reflecting on the extreme delicacy of such a task, and the readiness with which many people take offence in matters of biography where none is even remotely intended. Your urgent importunity and my own desire to oblige you, however, have prevailed in the present instance, but I must observe in limine, that I greatly fear you will be disappointed, if you calculate on finding much or any at all of what I have to say worthy of being transferred to your pages.

I had some notion of putting what I had to say into the shape of a consecutive narrative; but considering there was so very little incident in the life of Mr. Banim after his return to his native city, and during the period of my intimacy with him, that the history of one day might well be regarded as embracing this whole term, I feared I should produce a rather dull chapter, and, therefore, concluded it would be better to throw the substance of my recollections and observations under the headings suggested by a reference to your first note to me respecting the points on which you were desirous of obtaining information.

First, then, as to his

MODE OF LIFE AND HABITS.

My acquaintance with the Author of the 'O'Hara Tales' began in the latter months of 1836, about a year after his return to Ireland. He was then residing in Wind-gap Cottage, which does not require to be described by me, as, if I rightly remember, it has been fully noticed in a former chapter. Here, sheltered from the public gaze, and safe from intrusion, he received only such visitors as he chose, and at such times as he thought proper to admit them. Though his limbs had now, for some time, refused to obey his desire to move, his mind was still vigorous and active, and enabled him, under an incredible amount of bodily suffering, to continue his literary pursuits, indulge his natural tastes, and labor to form those of his daughter.

He seldom arose in the morning earlier than eleven o'clock, and, if the weather at all permitted, had himself conveyed from his bed-chamber to a Bath-chair in the little enclosure that fronted the drawing-room window. The chair was provided with pillows and cushions which it was Mrs. Banim's or Mary's special duty to see properly arranged, as the organzation of his poor frame had become so sensitive that even a crumple was sufficient to cause a momentary agony. After a few turns round the circular bed of flowers which occupied the centre of the garden, he would order breakfast—a morsel of thin, dry toast, a rare egg, and a cup of tea. This despatched, the chair would be again put in motion, and the exercise continued for an hour or so, when he would have himself placed under the shade of either of the two trees which stood at opposite points of the enclosure, and devote the intermediate hours between that and three o'clock to writing or the care of his flowers, of which he was so passionately fond, that he frequently insisted on being carried out at night to ascertain by the light of a lanthorn what progress his favorites were making. He bestowed particular pains on the culture of a rose unique, which was afterwards affectionately transferred, by his daughter's hand, to the turf under which he rested, and, when last I visited his grave, was the only mark by which it could be distinguished from the narrow dwellings of the humbler dead around.

When three o'clock approached the business occupying him, whatever it might be, was immediately laid aside, orders given to have the horse put to the little 'machine' in which the pillows and cushions had been previously arranged with the same care as the adjusting of the chair required in the morning, and, accompanied by his wife or daughter, or some other esteemed friend, for he feared going out alone, he would proceed on the drive which, at this period of the day, he never under possible circumstances failed to take. This exercise seemed to be essential to his existence, for, if anything occurred to debar him from its enjoyment, he could not resume his occupation for the remainder of that day, but became dull, peevish, and uncomfortable, making every one about him share more or less in his unhappiness. On returning from his drive another process was to be gone through before undertaking the labor of dining—the table had but little pleasures for him for years before. An extraordinary chilliness invariably seized his whole body, particularly his lower extremities, on the cessation of the rapid motion of the carriage. To get rid of this disagreeable sensation he used to submit himself to a particular operation which he humorously termed 'champooing.' A field-laborer who lived close by was generally called in, by whose rough, horny hand he had himself briskly pinched from head to foot for a full half hour, when his natural warmth would begin to return, and the business of the dinner become practicable. The champooing was regularly repeated before retiring to bed at night, and before leaving it in the morning.

Whenever the little carriage was disabled, which was a circumstance of frequent occurrence, or that a horse could not be procured—he had not always one of his own—recourse was had to the Bath-chair as a substitute for the drive, and, accompanied by Mrs. Banim and Mary, who occasionally lent it an impulse from behind, some friend of the other sex having generally volunteered to place himself at the front, the scheme sometimes succeeded exceedingly well, while it almost as often involved its peculiar difficulties and even perils. When once equipped, if there was any spot sufficiently near commanding a prospect which he once admired, or presenting a natural beauty with which in youth he had been familiar, an endeavour was made to reach it, every practicable route being sought, and none considered too circuitous to avoid the public road, and escape the public gaze. Many were the obstructions which the unfortunate chair had, in such excursions, to encounter; many an intricate way was entered without ever reflecting on the possibility of effecting a return; and often and often the limbs of the poor invalid had to repose on the grass till the chair had been carried over obstacles there were no other means of surmounting. His eagerness on one of these occasions to reach a spot on the banks of the Nore, endeared to him by some early recollection, was near having a fatal termination. The spot alluded to was to be gained by descending a gentle slope, as it appeared to him, at the base of which the stream flowed smooth and deep; none of the party present apprehended the slightest danger in gratifying his desire, and the chair was at once, and without reflection, turned in the direction indicated. But a very little progress, however, had been made when the motion of the little hand-carriage became too rapid for the control of the ladies who were to act as a drag in the rear; and had not the gentleman in front, by a sudden twist of the guiding wheel, and by dexterously placing his own person right in its way, succeeded in arresting its onward movement before it had acquired its full impetus, no human power could have prevented his being precipitated into the river, whereby the ‘stubborn Nore’ would have obtained with posterity the melancholy interest of having afforded Banim a grave.

It would be impossible to describe the terror that, for the moment took possession of him, heightened, as it was, by the consciousness of his inability to help himself; but the arrangements for effecting a return were no sooner completed than he commenced jesting at the probable catastrophe from which he had escaped, and ridiculing Mrs. Banim and Mary for their weakness in having yielded to womanly fears on the occasion.

There was another circumstance, too, connected with his excursions productive of no small inconvenience to Mrs. Banim in the way of domestic arrangements, but which her 'hereditary generosity' enabled her patiently to support. The roads, and green lanes in the neighbourhood of Kilkenny, in the latter of which the little carriage of our poet was frequently seen to pause on summer evenings, abounded at that time, at all events, in specimens of human misery which a sensitive heart, however well acquainted with the devices of mendicant hypocrisy, a species of knowledge in which he considered himself deeply skilled, could scarcely help commiserating. Whenever anything in the appearance or the story of one of these unfortunates seemed to speak of better days, or deserve a better fortune, he or she, or they—sometimes the case would comprise a whole family—had orders to follow the carriage or the chair home to Wind-gap where, when their comforts had been attended to, lodgings would be procured and, if the subject was a fitting one, an effort made to procure a service or some kind of permanent employment. Some act of theft or ingratitude was generally the return for his excessive kindness; still, the very next day, a tale of woe would find as ready entrance to his heart as if he had never erred in his judgment of the narrator of one. Amongst the guests here alluded to was a deaf and dumb boy, of about fifteen years of age, who had been discharged, or else had made his escape from the Glasnevin Institution. Picked up one summer evening in the usual way, as Banim was enjoying his customary exercise, he was, of course, directed to come to Wind-gap, where his quick intelligence, docility, and eagerness to make himself useful, soon rendered him a general favorite. For nearly a month he presented himself regularly at the cottage, at the hour its master was wont to make his appearance in the garden. His face would beam with pleasure whenever Banim began to interrogate him, or invited him by means of slate and pencil or the telegraphic movement of his fingers, to draw the chair or water the flowers. He disappeared, however, like a young wolf, when he was thought to be quite domesticated, and without any apparent reason. He is mentioned here merely as an instance of the changes men's opinions often undergo with respect to the theories of their earlier days. The 'Revelations of the Dead Alive' shews what a sceptic Banim was in the doctrines of phrenology, and his sincerity in the ridicule of that science at the time the above mentioned work was published; at this period, however, so firm was his creed in the soundness of its principles, that he never left this boy at the cottage when going out to drive, without placing him in charge of the man who was employed to do the 'cham-pooing,' as he apprehended some dreadful consequences might result from an opportunity being presented for gratifying the animal propensities which he fancied were indicated by his cerebral conformation. Here are facts to illustrate his which, far from being confined to his own immediate friends, was for ever displaying itself in some one or other species of action, having for its object the moral or social improvement of so much of the humbler classes, collectively or individually, as came within the scope of his influence.

In close proximity to Wind-gap Cottage stood a newly erected schoolhouse, a fine, spacious building, and at the time, perhaps, superior to any provincial structure of the kind in the kingdom; it was the work of Michael Banim's untiring zeal in the cause of education. He spared neither time nor labor in collecting subscriptions, soliciting donations, or superintending the tradesmen engaged in the work. Indeed, in his eagerness to complete the undertaking, he made considerable advances from his private means, which were never repaid him. The National System was then in its infancy, and by no means popular; Michael Banim was, however, amongst the first to perceive its advantages, and entertained sanguine expectations of achieving the happiest results to the children of the poor of his native city from a combination of those advantages with the free character of 'Father Connell's' charitable institution. With this view the idea of a National Free School, to supersede the theatre of 'Mick Dempsey's' labors, to be still governed by a committee of the society which had been founded for the support of the honored seminary, which, it is hoped Banim's page has now immortalized, the members whereof (comprising every respectable individual in the community) still met occasionally and paid their small quarterly subscriptions ; and to differ only from its predecessor in the enjoyment of a government grant, was conceived and executed.

The result of Michael Banim's labors was not what he expected. The building being pronounced fit for occupation, the Committee met, and, through improper interference, from private motives, an incompetent person was selected to take charge of the new School, in opposition to the wishes and advice of the gentleman who had originated the plan, and done so much to carry it out and secure its success. Michael Banim, of course, ceased to take further part in the proceedings of the Committee ; the members of the Society began to refuse subscriptions, on the ground of the support to be derived from the Board of Education, and to declare off altogether ; few or no pupils made their appearance, on account of the prejudice that existed regarding the National System, and finally the Board of Education withdrew the gratuity, not recognising the claims of a school, in which no effort was made to promote the objects

- for which the Board was instituted. Such was the condition to which ' Mick Dempsey's' once flourishing realm was reduced on Banim's return to Kilkenny. He regretted the disappearance of the old thatched roof under which the shivering limbs of so many poor children were made to experience annually the blessings of Father Connell's charity, and that of many another benevolent spirit long after the pulse of that commiserating heart had ceased to beat. The handsome edifice which replaced it was but a poor compensation, in Banim's opinion, for the good that had departed with it, and in the general apathy that prevailed with regard to the matter, he resolved to take upon himself the task of reviving the Society, and of turning the fine new school-house to some practical account at least, if the ancient utility of the old one could not be restored. For this purpose he put himself at once in communication with the Education Board to request a renewal of the connection, and with the local clergy to secure an attendance of pupils. Both these objects attained, he succeeded in interesting Mr. Keoghan, one of the Catholic curates of the parish, and a gentleman for whose zeal as minister, and acquirements as a scholar, he had the greatest esteem, so much in the furtherance of his views that the latter readily consented to accompany him on a questing excursion amongst the quondam subscribers. On a fixed day, accordingly, the carriage was ready at an hour much earlier than usual, and Mr. Keoghan being punctual to his appointment, both gentlemen proceeded on their mission; the following day was devoted to the same object, and a sum was collected far exceeding all expectation. Banim's glee was great on the evenings of both these days, he and the clergyman congratulating themselves over a glass of sherry (which being plentifully diluted with water formed his favorite beverage) on their eminent success, and laughingly relating how, by judiciously flattering the wives, they succeeded in obtaining both arrears and current subscriptions, when the surly husbands would persist in obstinately refusing payment of either. Alas! for the mutability of human things, the good Father Keoghan was carried away in a few months after by a malignant fever caught in his attendance on a patient at the County Fever Hospital, Banim is scarcely remembered in his native city, while few, if any, know if there ever existed such a body as the once famous 'St. John's Parochial Society.' But to return. One week after Banim had formed his resolution the school was in efficient working order, and had an impetus communicated to it which bore it beyond the chance of again sinking into the condition from which his efforts had raised it. Nor did his solicitude in regard to it stop here; many an hour was snatched from other important business in order to pay a visit to the school. On these occasions it was necessary that the chair and cushions which he used at home should be sent before him, by which there was given timely intimation of his approach—a circumstance which frequently caused him to allude to his infirmity in terms of mingled pleasantry and sadness, and to observe how lucky it was for both teachers and pupils that they need be in no apprehension of ever being taken by surprise. And yet he would sometimes express himself on these and other occasions so as to lead one to think that he did not, at least at that time, quite despair that such might one day be the case.

Having taken possession of his chair in the school-room he would summon before him the various classes in turn, explain the subjects of the different lessons, lecture on the elements of Grammar and Geography, in the latter of which he would use his clenched hand with great effect as a substitute for a globe, when it was necessary to explain why the figure of the earth was usually represented by two circular pictures, &c., and communicate all sorts of knowledge in such popular language, and in a manner so fascinating, that the little students were always sorry when his visit terminated. He bestowed many marks of favor and encouragement, too, on such of the boys as exhibited marks of talent. There was one in particular for whose future way in the world he was resolved to interest himself, but chancing, during an evening drive, to surprise him in the act of lighting a collection of straw which he had heaped on an unfortunate hedgehog, for the purpose of forcing the poor animal into a state of activity, and thereby furnish pastime to a crowd of associates, he abandoned all his kind intentions towards him, and save reading him a severe lecture on his cruelty, never again noticed him in any of his subsequent visits to the school, which were only given up when increasing feebleness rendered it impossible to continue them longer.

Besides the improved system of education which he was the means of introducing into the school, he had in contemplation another project for still further elevating the taste of the generation then springing up around Wind-gap Cottage. It was, the establishment if possible, of light theatrical performances, in connection with the school, somewhat after the fashion of educational Institutions of loftier pretensions. The practicability of the scheme was often gravely discussed, and its success considered certain. The musical and dramatic talents of the artisans of the 'faire citie' had been celebrated even before the time of Moore's theatricals there, and I may safely add were sufficiently noticeable at this time at least to be considered characteristic. From those, in conjunction with the pupils attending the school, he reckoned on being able to form a tolerably efficient company; the school-room he pronounced admirably adapted for the purposes of a theatre; and one of his own short pieces, which required but simple scenery and moderate artistic skill, would afford suitable material for a first attempt. The rehearsals and other details were to be an affair of personal superintendence, and the recovery of a little even of his former strength was all that was required to put the design in immediate execution. This he kept fondly promising himself was some time or other to return; the hope of renewed health, while capable of hoping, never completely deserted him; it was a vain expectation, however, and so the experiment was destined to remain untested. The same cause prevented him from giving to the world a work, the plan of which had been conceived some years before, and for which considerable materials had been collected ; it was to have been entitled the ' Lies of History,' and dedicated to his daughter.

When discussing his theatrical project, he would lay it down as a maxim, that a high, moral style of drama was a test of a country's greatness ; that it fostered the seeds of nationality and matured its fruits ; that it should be regarded as amongst the most powerful instruments of refinement and order ; and that to cultivate and spread a taste for it was a task becoming every man truly desirous of regenerating his country or protecting her independence. His impressions in this respect seemed founded on grounds furnished by his own special case ; for questioning his daughter, one day, on the subject of her school exercises, and looking through the little pile of books from which she had been preparing her various lessons, he expressed some surprise at not being able to discover amongst them the one which of all others he most wished to see in her hands ; and to her request to be informed to what particular book he alluded, he replied that it was the old ' Scott's Lessons,' or ' Speaker,' as that once popular treatise on Elocution was more generally called, adding that the study of the dramatic selections comprised in it, had taken into view the whole circle of his youthful discipline, by far the largest share in the process which formed his mind. Indeed the ' rival near the throne' of the realm of theatrical recitation, whom James Charles Buomahon (Buchanan, for he was a real character, as I need scarcely say almost all Banim's were,) the Master of the English Academy, suspected he was one day to encounter in person of the young hero of ' Father Connell,' was no other than little John Banim himself. It was little John Banim's forefinger of the right hand that used to define with such exactitude the orb of Norval's shield ; his little head that was wont to drop as naturally asleep on the form in the old school-room, as if it were the genuine royal couch on Bosworth field, and then express by such unmistakeable signs the mortal terror that had disturbed his slumber ; and it was from his little fist when personating Will Boniface ' the imaginary ale' was quaffed with the smack and relish that were accustomed to draw tears of laughter from the good old priest, and throw the rough but warm-hearted housekeeper, who had never in the course of her life seen anything approaching a veritable actor, into a fever of delight, forcing her to vent her approval in terms so near the line in Shakspeare

—‘he does it as like one of those harloty players as ever I see,’ that a listener unacquainted with her unromantic nature might easily be betrayed into the belief that she actually meant a quotation from the bard.

He was not, however, by any means so much of a visionary as to allow a theory, no matter what it might have for its object, or how large a share of his attention it might claim, to interfere materially with his serious occupations; indeed it was only under the most favorable circumstances as to health and leisure, that he purposed his present plan should be worked out. Whilst the chance of such a happy state of things was becoming every day more unlikely, though not so as to assume the appearance of an utter impossibility, a portion of a company just then disengaged by the periodical closing of one of the Dublin theatres, arrived in Kilkenny, and the local newspapers were requested to acquaint the public that a series of performances would be forthwith given in the ‘Assembly Rooms’ of the ‘Tholsel,’ under the management of Mr. Gardiner, a comedian of established reputation, assisted by some of the most distinguished names in the profession. Amongst other great feasts to which the citizens were to be treated, there appeared announced in very prominent characters, ‘Banim’s ‘Mayor of Windgap’ dramatised for the occasion by a member of the company.’ Mr. Banim regarded the announcement with pleasure, believing that the story could be effectively used in that way by a skilful hand, and that the thing would not be attempted in his immediate presence, unless executed in commendable fashion. He awaited the performance, therefore, with some interest, hoping that the result would prove creditable both to himself and the dramatiser. It was evident, however, from the first scene that the gentleman who undertook the task was possessed of more temerity than talent. Mr. Gardiner’s humor indeed secured him some applause in his personation of the Mayor’s Bailiff, a character which had been sketched with such fidelity in the original, that much of its individuality as it had lost in its transmutation, it was still easily recognized, and ‘Bryan Sweeny’ resounded from all directions of the house each time he made his appearance. Bryan Sweeny was the real name of the worthy who sat for this portrait to Banim, and though some years had elapsed since the decease of himself, and the corrupt old corporation of which he had been an officer, the identity was at once admitted by all who had been familiar with that model official. In the remainder of the details the piece bore so little resemblance to the original, that it would seem the title of 'Mayor of Wind-Gap' was bestowed on it only as the best means that could be resorted to for the purpose of 'filling the house.' This report of the affair annoyed Mr. Banim, and for a time he felt almost as mortified as if the failure could be attributed to his own production. He bitterly observed that he believed there never yet was a scribbling fool who did not fancy he could write a play, and who failing to give the world some ridiculous production of his own, did not disfigure somebody else's. Anxious to impress his fellow citizens with a more favorable opinion as to his powers as a dramatic writer than what they could be expected to entertain from witnessing the performance just alluded to, and ambitious of having one of his own pieces represented in his native city, he proposed to Mr. Gardiner to bring out 'The Conscript Sisters,' which had been written for Arnold's Theatre, and acted there with eminent success. Gardiner perused it, but finding it did not come quite within the range of his own or his company's talents, he returned it to the author, who was thus debarred the only remedy that presented itself for the outrage committed on one of his most exquisite of the O'Hara tales."

"Late in July, 1842, I left home to spend a fortnight with some friends forty miles from Kilkenny : when parting from my brother I could perceive no change for the worse in his symptoms or appearance. I was suddenly summoned home in consequence of his dangerous illness. I returned at once. I found him barely able to recognise me—only able to take my hand and look in my face, but incapable of speaking. I saw at a glance that his time of suffering was nearly over. I attended on him until I closed his eyes. His struggle against death was an enduring one. His chest and lungs were sound and healthy, and he continued to breathe strongly, but not painfully, for a day and night after all consciousness had left him. Death was rather the extreme of exhaustion than a violent separation of the spirit from its prison. Life passed from him almost unperceived.

Frequently, during the last six years of his life, my brother and I had been together, he engaged my promise that I would stand by while his grave was digging, that I would see the side of his mother's coffin laid bare, and that when his body was lowered to its last resting place, I should be certain the side of his coffin was in close contact with that of his beloved parent. His instructions were religiously observed.

There are two portraits extant of the subject of your memoir; one, in my possession, painted by himself* when in his nineteenth, or approaching to his twentieth year; the other remaining with the talented artist of whose pencil it is the production, Mr. George Mulvany of Dublin; the last mentioned taken after the total failure of health. Both these pictures are excellent likenesses of the original at the different periods of life when they were painted. Placing them side by side it would require almost a stretch of the imagination to trace a resemblance between them, or to acknowledge them as representations of the same person.

I have not attempted, in any of my notes furnished you, to measure my brother's claims to literary distinction. His merit as a poet or novelist I have not sought to weigh or to decide on. I have contented myself with giving a faithful account of his early and more mature endeavours to establish the reputation he thirsted to attain. The range and quality of his genius as a writer I leave to more disinterested parties than myself to ascertain and define. I think I may claim for him, however, numerous amiable qualities, springing directly from the heart, the seat of the affections; and many valuable qualities emanating from the head, the formator of character.

His affections were ardent, impulsive and uncalculating. He was industrious, persevering, and self-reliant so long as his physical capabilities enabled him to be so.

It will be borne in mind that he died while yet young, and that, for fully thirteen years preceding his demise, the physique of his mental power was not in health, nor the full force of his mind at his command. At forty-four, his age when he died, men of genius begin to train the flights of imagination and fancy within the scope of reason, to prune exuberances and to contrast with judgment.

I think I may affirm that, had it pleased Providence to have given him health during the thirteen years he was an ailing and incapable aspirant for fame and independence, and to have prolonged his life until he had descended even but little from the summit of existence which he had not reached, he would have made good way towards the goal he had marked out ultimately to reach. I am confident that, had health and life been his, he would have advanced much closer than he did to 'Fame's Magnetic Altar', the bourne to be attained, as expressed in one of his early rhymes.

About to close my subject I will here reiterate the opinion I mentioned to you when relating the termination of his boyish passion. I still think that the peculiar ailment causing death, and which for some time baffled the skill of the most eminent medical men, had its origin at the period of this early calamity. I judge that his brain was then injured, and that the subsequent overworking of the seat of thought brought on the spinal disease, which first paralysed his limbs and finally extinguished life.

My brother left behind him a widow and an only child, his daughter Mary. I have stated that this beloved daughter had been, through the kind interference of the present Earl of Carlisle, placed on the Pension List at £40 a year. Shortly after her father's death she was placed at the convent school of Waterford, under the special care of the sister of Mr. Sheil, Mr. Sheil himself being one of her guardians. In the October of 1843 I visited her there, and spent the day in private discourse with her. She was then a very lovely girl, full of talent, full of endearing affection, giving promise of doing credit to her parent's name. The February following I received notice that she was very ill. She had shown symptoms of chest disease at Christmas, at first thought lightly of. When I visited her in February, consumption had painted two vivid spots of dazzling red upon her cheeks, and given a flaring lustre to her dark eyes. The June following she died, in her eighteenth year, and her coffin was placed on the yet sound timber encasing her father's remains."

When John Banim's daughter, his only surviving child thus died, his fellow-countrymen feared that his widow might not be considered a fit object for the bounty of the State. Such fear, however, owing to the active interposition of the late Sir Robert Peel, was not well founded. The following paragraph, from The Nation of Saturday, May 10th, 1845, describes all the matters of interest connected with the case, and the names appended show how warmly and how generally, despite opposite feelings of politics and religion, the memory of John Banim, the Scott of Ireland, was cherished :—

“ MRS. BANIM.

Sir Robert Peel has acted most kindly and creditably with reference to this lady. A Committee of twenty-one, including the most active of the Conservative and Repeal writers and speakers, undertook to procure subscriptions for the purchase of a small annuity for her ; but at an early meeting it was agreed to make one more application to Government for the re-grant to the widow of that pension so freely and so worthily given to the orphan of JOHN BANIM. The application was made through Mr. E. B. ROCHE,* the Member for Cork County, and SIR ROBERT PEEL has answered by saying that the pension list applicable to such a purpose is full ; but that he will give £50 from the Royal bounty now to Mrs. Banim, and will guarantee her £40 a year on the first vacancy.

Such acts so done introduce an amenity and generosity into public life ; and whether PEEL did this from feeling or policy, he deserves equal credit, and we thank him for it. Nor are we less pleased at another instance of the successful co-operation of Irishmen, differing in creeds and minor politics, when a matter of national duty or sentiment is involved.

This was the Committee that took up Mrs. Banim's case, and carried it to this fortunate issue :—

The county being, after its fashion, grateful, the fellow townsmen of John Banim resolved to manifest their belief in the fact that Kilkenny, the College, Windgap, and some other places existed, and that John Banim had done a little to make them stand before the world as something more than names in an atlas. Accordingly in the Kilkenny, and other Irish papers of December, 1852, the following announcement appeared :—

At a Public Meeting of the friends and admirers of the genius of the late JOHN BANIM, held in the Tholsel, Kilkenny, on Wednesday, 15th December, 1852, the Mayor of Kilkenny in the Chair, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted :—

Proposed by the Rev. Dr. Browne, Kilkenny College, and seconded by J. M. Tidmarsh, Esq., T.C.—

1. ‘That it is the opinion of this Meeting, that a suitable Testimonial to the memory of the late JOHN BANIM, be erected in this, his native City.’

Proposed by Robert Cane, Esq., M.D., and seconded by the Rev. James Graves—

2. ‘That the best mode of evincing our respect for the name of JOHN BANIM, would be, to erect (if the funds admit thereof), a Public Testimonial, which would be, at the same time, ornamental to the City, and prove of use and convenience to the Public at large.’

The Testimonial selected was a bust in marble, executed by Hogan, the resemblance being caught, for the most part, from Mulvany's picture, and in the year 1854 it was placed in the Tholsel of Kilkenny.

This, reader, is the conclusion of the Biography of John Banim. Is there no moral to this life history? Is there nothing to follow the "Here Lies?" Aye, lessons of labor, of patience, of love, of hope, of charity, of faith in God when hope was all but dead, of honor, of patriotism, and of firm, but smiling, endurance. But there is another lesson—a dead man of genius may have a bust erected to grace his memory in his native town, but he may not have a tombstone to cover his bones and to mark his grave, even though it can be procured for ten pounds.

Before closing this paper we beg to direct the reader's attention to the subjoined appendix. We have printed it as we desire to show that Michael Banim is worthy some mark of the nation's appreciation of his genius, and of his very considerable share in the authorship of the Tales By The O'Hara Family.

Michael is no longer a young, active man : he is now very different from that Barnes O'Hara for whom Cauth Flannigan and Peggy Nowlan selected the shirt which "was not a shirt entirely" ;* he is a hard worked man, subsisting upon the small profits of his general shop, aided by the per centages of a cess collector ; he has to rear a young family on such means as these, and considered it a triumph of financial ability when he was enabled, last summer, to send his eldest daughter, a young girl of astonishing ability and literary taste, to school to a convent in France.

We ask for no present aid from the nation to Michael Banim, but we do ask that, at the death of John Banim's widow, now in weak health, the pension which she receives, shall be transferred to Michael Banim, should he then be living, or to his eldest surviving daughter if he be dead. This is not demanding much, but we have no doubt it will be granted, if the citizens of Kilkenny petition for it, through an old and an sincere friend and patron of John Banim's—His Excellency the Earl of Carlisle.

The gentleman who has favored us with the letter printed at p. 67, has supplied us with many valuable notes of Banim's every day life, which shall be inserted in the June number of this Review. These notes are of the very greatest interest, and cannot fail to prove acceptable to every admirer of John Banim's genius.

INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE:—

TALES BY THE O'HARA FAMILY.

SIR.—Permit me through the medium of your very widely circulated Journal to correct a misrepresentation made in the last number of Notes and Queries by a person signing himself "William John Fitzpatrick." This gentleman writes from South-hill Avenue, Booterstown, Dublin, and says "The interesting Tales of the O'Hara Family, which some thirty years ago excited a marked sensation in literary circles, were until quite recently believed to owe their popularity entirely to John Banim. A memoir of Mr. Banim at present appearing in the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW informs the public that his brother Michael, ex-Mayor of Kilkenny, wrote Crohoore of the Bill-hook, the Croppy,—in fact, some of the very best of the O'Hara Tul-s." Now, Sir, let me inform the public through your columns, that a greater misrepresentation was never sent to print than the above passage from Notes and Queries. The fact is, that the late John Banim not only composed every line of "Crohoore of the Bill-hook" from his own brain, but also transcribed every line of it with his own weary hand, and that, too, at a period when he was not even on speaking terms with his brother Michael, better known as "the shabby Mayor of Kilkenny;" and at that very period when Crohoore was written poor John Banim was in a state of beggary and without a coat, and after a weary day's labor at this exquisite work he would stroll out in the dark with an old black cloth round his shoulders to roam by the river side for a breath of air, while his ex-mayorship Michael, who wishes to obtain some new installation or other honour on borrowed plumes, by robbing the dead of his fame, was luxuriating on homefed mutton and "mountain dew" in the town of Kilkenny, while (not the individual, as Mr. Fitzpatrick is pleased to call him) the great John Banim was, hungry, thirsty, and weary, weaving from his own brain that truly beautiful work for the amusement of an admiring English public. Now, Sir, regarding the authorship of that splendid Novel, the Croppy, Mr. Michael Banim, the ex-mayor of Kilkenny, was giving and attending "Harvest Homes," and dancing Irish-jigs in the Province of Leinster, while the poor half-starved author, John Banim, was writing the Croppy at the hospitable home of the late Mr. W. Donnell, of Balinlig House, in the Vale of Glenariff, county Antrim, Province of Ulster, North of Ireland. And the curious English traveller in passing through the beautiful valley of Glenariff can without any trouble see the very room in Balinlig house where John Banim, alone and unaided, wrote and composed every line of that exquisite Novel The Croppy; and that, too, when his brother Michael would not give the "Literary Madman," as he was pleased to call poor John, one single sixpence to save him from starvation. At this period, the late Lieut.-General A. Cuppage, of Clare Grove, in the county of Dublin, was sojourning at his shooting lodge (Mount Edwards) near Glenariff, and by chance the General met the half-clothed Novelist one day at a classic spot called the "Red Caves," nearly opposite to the place where the Spanish Armada was wrecked on the Irish coast. The rich East India Company's Officer and the poor author entered into conversation, and the sequel was, that the General gave John Banim fifty pounds to go travel to the town of Wexford and elsewhere, to collect the true incidents of the Irish Rebellion of '98 for the pages of "The Croppy." The shabby ex-mayor of Kilkenny (for there have been shabby Mayors in more towns than Brighton), knew nothing of these matters, or, in fact, nothing of the personal history of his clever brother at the period these works were written. John Banim's children were too young at this time to know anything of his movements, and his wife was a hundred miles or more away from him; so the friends of the ex-mayor may with impunity think that time has cast oblivion over the life and sufferings of the departed Novelist, and that now, in this distant period they may assert what they please, and pluck the laurel from the grave of him who earned it well. But if the readers of Notes and Queries take the trouble of inquiring who is the writer of the memoir of "this individual," they will find it is written by Mr. Fitzpatrick himself, or else some other minion of the ex-shabby mayor of Kilkenny, who have some worldly project to carry out by blasting the fame of a truly great Novelist, who destroyed his health at the midnight lamp and shortened his life in the cause of literature. If the shade of the late John Banim could arise from his lowly grave and read Mr. Fitzpatrick's article in the last number of Notes and Queries, with what truth it might exclaim,

Amid the stranger throng
 Enemies, I have none;
 But from my would-be friends and relatives,
 May Heaven save my fame.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
 A LOVER OF JUSTICE.

TALES OF THE O'HARA FAMILY.

To the Editor of the Brighton Herald.

SIR.—In the last number of the Brighton Guardian a writer who signs himself "A LOVER OF JUSTICE," makes a fierce attack upon William John Fitzpatrick for stating, in a recent number of Notes and Queries, that "Michael Banim, now ex-Mayor of Kilkenny, was the author of Crohoore of the Bill-hook, The Croppy,—in fact some of the best of the O'Hara Tales." "A LOVER OF JUSTICE," observes upon this—"Let me inform the public through your columns, that a greater misrepresentation was never sent to print than the above passage from Notes and Queries. The fact is, that the late John Banim not only composed every line of Crohoore of the Bill-hook from his own brain, but also transcribed every line of it with his own weary hand, and that, too, at a period when he was not even on speaking terms with his brother Michael."

Now, as this question of authorship is one that is interesting to the general public, perhaps you will allow me a portion of your space to endeavour to throw some light upon it. That the Tales by the O'Hara Family were the joint production of John and Michael Banim has never, I believe, been questioned until the present moment; and it is proved by the published correspondence of John Banim. It is new to me, too, that John and Michael Banim were ever upon bad terms. But if they ever were, certainly it could not of been at the time of the writing of these Tales; for upon this point, too, we have the evidence of John's own letters. These letters to Michael, extend over the period of John's residence in London from 1822, when he first arrived in town, up to 1825, when the O'Hara Tales made their appearance, and in these letters frequent reference is made by John to the tale that Michael had undertaken to contribute to the collection; and, moreover, there is internal evidence in these letters to prove that the tale in question was Crohoore of the Bill-hook.

"A LOVER OF JUSTICE" will find this correspondence in the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW for December, 1854; and I will give a few passages from it to settle the point that the two brothers were, if not upon speaking terms,—for one was in Ireland, and the other in London,—at least upon the most affectionate writing terms. Under date of "London, May 2nd, 1824," John thus writes to his brother:—

"My Dear Michael,—I have read attentively, and with the greatest pleasure, the portion of the tale you sent me by J. H.——. So far as it goes, I pronounce that you have been successful. Here and there I have marked such particular criticism as struck me, and them you may note by referring to the margin. I send you the MSS. of my tale, and I request your severest criticism; scratch, cut and condemn at your pleasure. This is the first copy. Looking over it, I perceive many parts that are bad; send it back when you can, with every suggestion you are capable of making. Read it for the whole family in solemn conclave. Let father, mother, Joanna and yourself sit in judgment on it, and send me all your opinions sincerely given."

Here we see that John had a much higher respect for the literary ability of Michael than "A LOVER OF JUSTICE" seems to have.

In another passage of the same letter, John thus directs Michael's talent to the delineation of "the peculiarities we daily witness in those we meet:—

"Paint for me to the life, our old parish priest, Father O'Donnell, hat, wig, jock coat, worsted stockings, shoe buckles, as he appeared and spoke, when he patted our heads, and approved of our proficiency in catechism.

Give me Tom Guinn, hat, gaiters, watch, pipe, and his horn tinder-box; his peculiar jokes, his frequent big words, and his gurgling laugh at his own conceits. For a reckless bully, boy and man, remember Michael B——. I might, but I will not here, increase the list.

Get fourteen or fifteen of any of the persons you ever knew; put them into scenes favourable to their peculiarities, their individualities can be exemplified, without straining after the point; in proper situations, set them talking for themselves; by their own word of mouth they will denote their own character, better than any description from your pen; thus will you dramatise your tale, and faithful drama is the life and soul of novel writing. Plot is an inferior consideration to drama, though still it is a main consideration.

Do not say that I am dictatorial, or that I consider you to be a subject for a drilling; but let us unaffectedly compare notes as often as we can, and both will be benefited."

In a subsequent letter dated "London, July 10th, 1825," and addressed to "My dear Mike," he thus refers to his brother's novel itself:—

"I think I recognise your tithe-proctor, Peery Clancy, the portrait is so accurate I could not mistake the gentleman. Your next door neighbour, Mickie Ryan, is your original, and you have not outstepped nature, or misrepresented facts, in the slightest degree.

You have given some of my people a good castigation ; you have frightened me in fact, and almost made me hopeless of them. Don't spare one of them, however—better you should deal with them, than critics of less bowels or humanity.

You must adopt my amendment. The woman, singing the keen-thecawn, must be the mother of Terence, not his wife ; kill his wife, I decree her death ; by slaying her, you give a very rational increased incentive to the wretched widower's thirst for vengeance.

You tell me you intend to cut off the proctor's ears ; slice them close to his head by all means : do not leave a shred : no honest man will say that he does not deserve the cropping."

Here, I think, is a sufficient confutation of A LOVER OF JUSTICE's allegations, both with respect to the authorship of Crohoore of the Bill-hook, and to the alleged ill terms on which the brothers were. His statement, that Crohoore was written by John Banim "in a state of beggary, and without a coat," is equally wide of the truth. The fact was, that at this time John Banim had a very good house over his head (viz., No. 7, Amelia-place, Brompton—the house, as he exulting tells his friends in Kilkenny, in which John Philpot Curran lived the last months of his life, and died), and doubtless had a very good coat to his back. He was earning an adequate, though arduous, income by writing for the English Opera house and for the magazines, until, in 1825, Colburn purchased the copyright of the O'Hara Tales. The share which Michael Banim had in these is thus told by the author of the biography in the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, whom no one will accuse of being negligent of the fame of John Banim :—

"He (John) had commenced, in 1823, the composition of his intended novel, (The Nowlans), and had written to Michael, urging him to hasten in the completion of his story, which was, as had been agreed upon, to form a portion of the volumes. Michael had little time to devote to literary pursuits. From morning till night he was engaged behind his father's counter, and in literary composition he had had, since leaving school, no practice beyond drawing up a business account, or writing a letter to John. But John had praised his talent as a story-teller ; had asked him to write a tale for the forthcoming work ; and as John, a judge of these things—a literary man himself—had approved his efforts thus, he determined to make the required attempt.

"But how was the attempt to be made? He could not start from a customer to write down the thought of the moment ; but when did genius ever fail in expedient? Michael Banim had naturally a good memory ; his story was one founded on facts : and accordingly, whilst he was behind the counter, with busy hands discharging all the multifarious duties of a shopman in a country town, his fancy was busily at work, weaving the scenes of his narrative, and when he retired to his room at night, he committed the already formed scenes to paper, and the early morning generally found him clothing his thoughts in words, and thus the powerful story entitled Crookore of The Bill Hook was composed and written.

"The first portion of the manuscript was transmitted to John for perusal, late in the year 1823. By return of post, a letter of praise and thanks was written to Michael; entreaties for more were pressingly urged. The progress of the composition was necessarily slow, but scrap by scrap it was forwarded; and, as had been agreed upon, John's portion of the work, The Fetches and John Dor, were sent to Michael, each brother acting as critic to the other, and thus the nom de plume, Tales By The O'Hara Family, was in every point a reality—John taking the name Abel O'Hara, Michael assuming that of Barnes O'Hara."

I have to apologize for occupying so much of your space with these details. But it is a point of literary history that is not without interest. It may appear somewhat singular that in a collection of tales by two brothers,—one a professed author and the other a tradesman,—one of the most powerful, if not the most powerful, should have been written, not by the author, but the man in trade; and that this should have been nearly, if not, I believe, his only production. But a parallel can be found to this in the somewhat similar collection of tales called The Canterbury Tales. These were the joint-production of two sisters, one of whom,—I believe, Harriet Lee,—wrote one tale, "The Hungarian's Tale,"—and this is the most powerful of the whole collection. It excited the admiration of Byron, and led him to write the tragedy of Werner, the incidents and characters, and, indeed, some of the language, of which are taken from "The Hungarian's Tale."

Why so fierce an onslaught should have been made upon Mr. Michael Banim by "A LOVER OF JUSTICE," I cannot conceive. The fact of his being ex-Mayor of Kilkenny, upon which the writer dwells, proves nothing against his ability as a writer. I have only taken up the pen as a matter of literary justice, and have no interest in the question of the authorship except as

ONE OF THE READERS AND ADMIRERS OF THE O'HARA TALES.
Brighton, Nov. 14, 1855.

[From the Brighton Guardian of Wednesday Nov. 22nd.]

THE O'HARA TALES.

SIR,—It was only by chance that I saw on this morning, for the first time, your journal of Wednesday, November 14th; and had it not been for the considerateness of some unknown English friend, who sent it even at the eleventh hour, I might never have had an opportunity of replying to a letter which contains most offensive references to me, and that worthy, unobtrusive, and respectable man, Michael Banim, Ex Mayor of Kilkenny.

Your correspondent begins by saying, "Permit me to correct a misrepresentation made in Notes and Queries by a person signing himself 'William John Fitzpatrick.' This gentleman" [he corrects his phraseology on reflection,] "writes from South Hill Avenue, Boosterstown, Dublin, and says :—‘ The interesting Tales of the O’Hara Family, which some 30 years ago, excited quite a sensation in literary circles, were until recently believed to owe their popularity entirely to John Banim. A memoir of Mr. Banim at present appearing in the Irish Quarterly Review, informs the public that his brother Michael, Ex-Mayor of Kilkenny, wrote Crohoore, The Croppy—in fact some of the very best of the O’Hara Tales. ’ ”

The above paragraph (as quoted by your correspondent) occurred in a recent inquiry as to whether Sir W. Scott wrote all the Waverley Novels, from beginning to end, and which, as the contents of each succeeding number of Notes and Queries attest, has excited no small amount of interest and curiosity. I did not make the assertion relative to Banim’s Tales without producing my authority. On that authority, let the merits of the case be judged. The Irish Quarterly Review is a work of high respectability and genius. For nearly two years, the life of Banim, written by the Editor, has been regularly appearing in that serial. Banim’s private correspondence and papers, have been placed at the disposal of the Editor—a gentleman, well known and respected in literary, and general society, at the Bar, and in Alma Mater. Your correspondent supports, that if the public inquire who is the author of the memoir, “ they will find it is written by Mr. Fitzpatrick himself. ” Although it is a biography which any Irishman might feel proud to have written, I emphatically deny all claim to the authorship.

I shall now proceed to give in detail, my authorities for the assertion which your correspondent in his wrath, has appealed to the public to analyse and judge.

In the Irish Quarterly Review for December, 1854, p. 830, appears an interesting account of the origin of those tales, during a conference between the brothers, John and Michael, and it concludes with these words :—“ And thus amid the green fields of Inistiogue were the Tales of the O’Hara Family planned, and a joint system of writing commenced, which rivalled in popularity, the Cautebury Tales by the Sisters Lee.” From the manner in which your correspondent heads his letter, “ Tales by the O’Hara Family,” it would appear as if he too believed their production to be through the joint agency of the brothers.

At page 850 is described Michael Banim’s literary labours, amid the most onerous occupation, . . . . . “ his fancy was busily at work, weaving the scenes of his narrative, and when he retired to his room at night, he committed the already formed scenes to paper, and the early morning generally found him clothing his thoughts in words, and thus the powerful story of Crohoore of the Bill-Hook was composed and written. The first portion of the MS. was transmitted to John for perusal late in 1823. By return of post a letter of praise and thanks was written to Michael—entreaties for more were pressingly urged. The progress was necessarily slow, but scrap by scrap it was forwarded ; and, as had been agreed upon, John’s portion of the work, The Fetches and John Doe, were sent to Michael, each brother acting as critic to the other, and thus the nom de plume, Tales by the O’Hara Family, was in every point a reality, John taking the name Abel O'Hara, Michael assuming that of Burnes O'Hara."

The interesting private letters from John Banim to his brother, with which the memoir is sprinkled, exhibit the full secret of their modus operandi. Some of John's letters are playfully signed "Abel O'Hara."

The revelation that "Crohoore of the Bill-Hook" (the best tale of the series) was not written by John Banim greatly surprised me, and early last May I called the attention of that distinguished Irish novelist, William Carleton, to it as remarkable. "I always knew," replied Carleton, "that Crohoore of the Bill-Hook was Michael's and not John's." Carleton knew John Banim intimately, and wrote that interesting memoir of him which appeared in the Nation shortly after his death.

With respect to the powerfully written novel of The Croppy I have referred to the Irish Quarterly for June, 1855, and at pp. 234 and 235 I find the fullest particulars given of the composition of The Croppy. The work was written by Michael, and not John Banim. It is, however, an understood thing, that the brothers criticised and revised each other's Tales; and if John was really seen by the late Mr. W. Donnell (as your correspondent says) poring over The Croppy in 1827, and even transcribing portions of it, it argues nothing. Your rather pert correspondent would do well to refer to the Quarterly, and read the truly affectionate letters from John to his brother Michael, at this and other periods, some of them dated from "45, Sea Houses, Eastbourne, Sussex"—perhaps not one hundred miles from your correspondent's residence. If he thinks that the Biography alluded to is written in dispraising terms of John Banim, he is mistaken. The biographer is absolutely in love with John's character throughout—in fact too much so for the taste of many. Your correspondent, who signs himself "A Lover of Justice," but which it would perhaps be nearer the truth to subscribe "A Lover of Slander," utters among other most daring and ridiculous statements, "Now, Sir, let me inform the public, that a greater misrepresentation was never sent to print, than the above passage from Notes and Queries. The fact is that John Banim not only composed every line of Crohoore from his own brain, but also transcribed every line with his own weary hand, and that too at a period when he was not even on speaking terms with his brother Michael, better known as the shabby mayor of Kilkenny." * * "His ex-mayorship wishes to obtain some new installation, or other honour, on borrowed plumes by robbing the dead of his fame." * * "Mr. Michael Banim was giving and attending 'Harvest Homes' and dancing Irish jigs in Leinster, while John was writing The Croppy." * * "His brother Michael would not give 'the literary madman' (as he was pleased to call him) one single sixpence to save him from starvation." * * "The shabby mayor of Kilkenny knew nothing of the personal history of his brother, at the period those works were written." * * "If the shade of John Banim could rise and read Mr. Fitzpatrick's statements, with what truth he might exclaim—

"From my would-be friends and relatives
May heaven save my name!"

For myself, I may say, I was never a personal friend of John Banim's, much less a relative. I never even saw him. The many affectionate letters written in the fullest confidence, by John and his wife, to Michael (the originals of which may doubtless be viewed, if necessary) sufficiently refute the rabid drivelling of a Lover of Slander. He has been rioting in the exuberance of a fortnight's unrefuted calumny. By to-morrow's post I will forward his production to the ex-mayor of Kilkenny, and let that gentleman deal with the writer, as he thinks fit. Your correspondent, like most slanderers, wears a mask. He trembles to appear before the public with his name and address.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your very humble servant,
WILLIAM JOHN FITZPATRICK.

Hillsborough, Booterstown, Dublin,
November 25th, 1855.

P.S.—Perhaps I ought to add, that Michael Banim has lately concluded, in the Dublin University Magazine, a very interesting novel called Lough Fionn, or the Stone of Destiny. He has also written a new introduction to Father Connell, lately reprinted.

[From the same Impression of the Brighton Guardian, as contained Mr Fitzpatrick's Letter.]

TALES OF THE O'HARA FAMILY.

SIR,—having read in Notes and Queries an article from the pen of a gentleman in Dublin to the following effect:—

"The interesting Tales by the O'Hara Family, which some thirty years ago excited quite a sensation in literary circles, were until quite recently believed to owe their popularity entirely to John Banim; but a memoir of that individual at present appearing in the Irish Quarterly Review, informs the public that his brother Michael, ex-Mayor of Kilkenny, wrote "Crohoore of the Bill Hook," and "The Croppy," and in fact some of the very best of The O'Hara Tales."

Now, Sir, facts are stubborn things, which remain the same despite of every misrepresentation. I was therefore truly startled by such a strange announcement in Notes and Queries, that John Banim, whose authorship of the best of the Tales of the O'Hara Family has been a well established fact for "thirty years," should have his fame nibbled at by an unknown writer in a recent number of the Irish Quarterly Review; and as the question of authorship is one of interest to the general public, I felt it my duty to state through the columns of your widely circulated journal, that a greater misrepresentation was never sent to print.

A writer in the Brighton Herald of the 17th of this month wishes to overturn my statement of authentic facts by a pile of inconsistent paragraphs which tell nothing.

First, he accuses me of "making a fierce attack on William John Fitzpatrick." This is very far from the truth. I made no fierce attack on that gentleman; nor have I any personal feeling whatever in the matter, save a love of justice towards one who is now incapable of defending his own fame. On the contrary, I never heard of Mr. Fitzpatrick's name until I saw it in Notes and Queries attached to a very foolish article which stated that "Sir Walter Scott was not the author of the 'Waverley Novels,' and that John Banim was not the author of 'Tales by the O'Hara Family,'—an article which very much reminded me of Essays printed some time ago by a gentleman who was not mad, [Dr. Whately,] but silly enough to attempt to prove that the Battle of Waterloo was never gained by the Duke of Wellington; and that no such person as Buonaparte ever existed.

Secondly,—This writer in the Herald backs the Irish Quarterly Review in the truth of its statement, that for thirty years John Banim was known as the recognised author of the O'Hara Tales, that he derived a great popularity from them, and that the literary world was quite in a sensation with his productions; but that a writer of a memoir last year brings to light that his brother Michael was the author. In another part the writer in the Herald states that Michael Banim under the name of Barnes O'Hara, was well known as one of the authors of the O'Hara tales.

Now in the name of common sense how do these two statements chime? If Michael was well known as the author of "Crohoore of the Bill Hook," "The Croppy," &c., &c., why would John be enjoying the undisputed fame for so many long years until a writer comes forward last year to accuse him of going on borrowed plumes? Is it consistent with human nature that Michael would allow John Banim to usurp his fame and his labours for so many years without producing proofs to show the world that he was wronged? And every one who had the honour of knowing the late John Banim,—and many are still alive—will bear me out that he was the very last man on earth to soar on Aura popularis, unless it was his right to do so.

Thirdly, the writer in the Herald says, that if the brothers were not on speaking terms, they were on affectionate writing terms. Now does not every body know that there never yet existed two brothers who have not been on both speaking terms and writing terms at some period of their lives, although they may have been on bad terms both before and after? This writer also refers me to a "printed correspondence" in the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW for December 1854. But does he think I am so unwise as to pin my faith to a printed correspondence produced at the end of thirty years? I cannot see the water-marks on paper, or the genuine post-marks of the letters in print; and do we not all know that type will refuse nothing while the printer works? Suppose the writer in the Herald were to write a memoir next week of the late Prince of Wales, and stated, "for thirty years the Prince enjoyed the popularity of being the sole owner of the Royal Pavilion, but the accompanying correspondence will prove that your present excellent and respected townsman, Mr. ——— was a joint proprietor, to whom belonged the best portion of the building," could such a statement obliterate an established fact, or is there a man in Brighton would swallow the memoir?

Believing, however, the letters to be genuine,—even for the sake of argument,—it is an established fact that posterity can gain no truth from the private letters of authors to their brothers, sisters, fathers, or mothers. These letters, when written, are never meant to meet the public eye, and are generally penned at a certain crisis, and under certain influences; sometimes to give pleasure to the absent, and sometimes in bitter straits to gain a little aid from home: they would succumb to anything, and would not only sign away their authorship to a brother, but their very birthright, if demanded to do so, for a small draft on the bank. As a proof of the unreliability of early private letters of authors to their families, we find that great genius, Thomas Chatterton, writing to his family at Bristol and telling them of his splendid successes in London, the number of magazines he was writing for, and the golden harvest he was about to reap, while, alas! poor fellow, he was in the last stage of starvation, and in a few days afterwards was carried to a pauper's grave as a suicide! We find Tom Moore writing home with a syren's pen a glowing description of his successes until his poor fond mother was made so happy that she thought dear little Tom dwelt in an enchanted palace in London, and had only to say "open Sesame," to enter mines of gold. And yet on the day he wrote one of these cheering epistles, we find him gloomy and wretched with an empty purse and a scanty wardrobe, going to a tailor's with ten shillings and an old coat to exchange for the loan of a dress coat to dine with the Prince Regent! We find that sweet writer, Gerald Griffin, writing to his truly amiable and excellent brother, Doctor Griffin, and in asking the loan of a few pounds stating that it will be the last trespass he will make on his purse, as his triumph will soon be complete; his engagements are many, and fortune favours him with a lavish hand; and yet he leaves London for ever as a dispirited author, and it was not until after his death that his kind and fond brother the Doctor knew of his many miseries in the vast Babylon. Wherefore, then, should any reality of wealth or happiness be drawn from the incident that for a time John Banim lived at 7, Amelia place, Brompton, the house where John Philpot Curran died? Did that prevent the gloom of adversity from falling on his pathway, and the brightest hopes of his heart passing away from him like a dream? As the writer in the Herald is so sagacious as to discover that John Banim had a good coat and was in good means in that house, why is he not also sagacious enough to know that there is a bosom friend of the late John Banin living, who, if he related the sufferings of the author while writing some of the best of the O'Hara Tales, the bare recital would draw tears from the most hardened eyes and sighs from the most obdurate heart; and why is he not also sagacious enough to know that John Banim had a dear bosom friend and companion called Michael B——, independently of his brother Michael?

Fourthly,—the writer in the Herald sets up an unnecessary defence of the cleverness of the ex-Mayor of Kilkeany, and says "that John had a much higher respect for the ability of Michael than a Lover of Justice has." That statement is very wide of the truth; for I always considered Michael to be a clever man, and I am aware that he has written some good things, although his genius was far below that enjoyed by his departed brother. His being a Mayor at one period of his life could not prevent him from being an author also if Nature had so gifted him; and although we do not generally see Mayors and Aldermen very great slaves of the desk or the midnight lamp, there are exceptions to every rule, and Michael Banim was among those exceptions. There was a vein of composition in every one of the Banim family; but in John alone did it find "a local habitation and a name." He had two mottos which he used to quote in his merry moments,—which were few,—and, as they bear upon his fate and the present crisis of his fame, I shall repeat them. The one was, "Ingenio stat sine morte decus"—the other, "Magna est veritas, et prevalebet." Without in any way depreciating the literary ability of Michael Banim, I again repeat, from my full knowledge of the facts, that a greater misrepresentation was never sent to print than that John Banim was not the author of "The Croppy," "Crohoore of the Billhook," "The Boyne Water," &c. Twelve years before the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW began to nibble at John Banim's fame, I held in the hand that now traces this letter portions of the original draughts of the above-named works in John Banim's own writing, and with his own corrections and interlineations, and I could at this moment,—if I were at liberty to do so,—point to the family who still hold them as sacred heir-looms of the great novelist; but the pear is not yet ripe enough to render such a disinterment necessary. Enough, the person who holds these literary treasures was from boyhood the bosom friend, often the companion, and always the confidant, of all the joys and sorrows of poor suffering, but gifted John Banim. The original draught of "The Croppy" amused me much, for in it he had made rattling Bill Nale the father of Eliza, and old Nanny the knitter her grandmother; but a Cork gentleman to whom he submitted the plot laughed at him for giving such strange relations to so gentle and elegant a lady as Eliza. John Banim took the hint, and in his final draught he made Bill the father of her beautiful, stern, and haughty friend.

But à propos to the absurdity of taking family letters as a proof of authorship, I beg to inform you that at this moment I know a very clever but poor author in this city who has a rich relative, and when in straits for money he applied to this relation for aid. The relative always sends the copy of a letter for him to write, and a legal document for him to copy and sign, embodying therein that he owes him ten pounds, in return for which letter and document he sends the poor author five pounds for his pressing wants. Thus the rich brother plays upon the urgent necessities of the wretched book-worm, and after this author's death, should posterity ever see this correspondence published, they will think the rich brother not only the most tender and humane of brothers, but also the real author of many works over which this poor author is now wearing out his health and life. I do not mean to hint that such a state of things ever existed between the Banims; but I only relate it to prove how worthless are private family letters towards establishing a question of authorship.

In conclusion, I beg to correct a typographical error in my last letter in your columns; namely, that John Banim wrote every line with his own weary hand. This should have been, "he invented every line in his own weary brain." The sentence must have been blundered either by your printers, readers, or by myself in the haste of writing it; but the contrary was the fact. John Banim had a heart-sick horror of copying anything he composed; he had three friends in the distance who generally performed that task. Two of them were my personal friends, and the third was Michael Banim; and thus arose the latter-day fiction that Michael was the author of some of John's best works. But it is quite a common thing in London for a hard-working author to send his manuscript written illegibly to a brother at leisure in the distance, to write out clear for the press, put slight alterations, if necessary, if the brother from a knowledge of the facts described were competent to do so, which no doubt, Michael was in reference to the O'Hara Tales; and return it slip by slip through the post. And this may account for John's bantering Michael thus: "Paint for me to the life our old parish priest, hat, wig, jock-coat, worsted stockings, shoe-buckle, and all;" for when the brothers were on good terms Michael (who was a good critic) had a habit of altering John's sentiments in a manner disagreeable to the great Novelist's feelings and amour propre. It is now many years since poor John Banim's death closed a chequered career, embittered at its close by a painful illness, in which the great Novelist was forced to use crutches, but I have not heard that since that event Michael has published any work whatever, which would hardly be the case were he the "powerful" writer which the despoilers of John's fame would represent him.

Hoping this will fully satisfy Mr. Fitzpatrick and his defender in the Brighton Herald,

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A LOVER OF JUSTICE.

Lincoln's-inn Fields, London,

November, 1855.

MR. FITZPATRICK'S REPLY.

To the Editor of the Brighton Guardian.

Sir,—I have to thank you for the Brighton Guardian of Nov. 28, containing in amusing juxtaposition, my reply to the attack of a "Lover of Justice," and his writhing acknowledgment of the dignified rebuke which "One of the admirers of the O'Hara Tales," through the medium of the Herald, levelled at him some days previously. Mr. "Justice" lays peculiar emphasis on this letter in connection with his renewed attack on me, and he concludes that column and a half of diffuse inconsistency, which in the following letter I shall endeavour to analyse, with a "Hope," that "this will satisfy Mr. Fitzpatrick, and his defender in the Herald."

I knew nothing of the existence of the letter in question, until the arrival of the Herald, with your own journal, at my residence on Thursday afternoon. Of my ignorance both of the letter, and its author, I pledge my honour. But really so wantonly uncalled for was Mr. "Justice's" diatribe on Michael Banim, the editor of the IRISH QUARTERLY, and myself, that no person of honourable, or upright feeling, who knew anything on the subject, could silently listen to his flippant slander. I rejoice to find that he has met, where he little thought of finding opposition, an able and an honourable adversary, who came to the rescue, "as an act of literary justice, having no interest in the question of authorship, but as one of the admirers of the tales." This lesson, I hope, may prove so far salutary to your correspondent, as that he will hardly again assail, through the medium of a provincial English newspaper, three private gentlemen living in Ireland.

Mr. "Justice," shamed by the able defence of the Herald, denies, in his second letter, the assertion, that he made a "ferce attack on me." I considered that he did so, and my unknown defender was of the same opinion. But it is richly inconsistent that in the very paragraph wherein he repudiates having assailed me he gives expression to vulgar and offensive personality.

His attack is resumed with a tedious repetition of the already published extract from my article in Notes and Queries, on the presumed assistance given Sir W. Scott by his late brother, and sister-in-law, in the composition of the Waverly Novels. In this extract which Mr. "Justice" quotes, without reference either to page, date, number, or volume, he takes the liberty of introducing no less than three words,—two of them not of much importance certainly, but curious, as evidencing that talent for inaccuracy which continually glares forth in his writing. He cannot even, by mistake, be right. In the same way he garbles a sentence in the Herald letter, taken from one of John's confidential notes to his brother: "This may account," writes The Lover of Justice, "for his bantering Michael thus: 'Paint for me to the life our old P.P. hat, wig, jock coat, worsted stockings, shoe buckles, and all.'" There are no such words in the original as last quoted. Mr. "Justice," garbles the sentence to give it a comical, bantering sound. John had no such intention. I can imagine his eyes filling with tears, as he thought of the good, and long deceased Pastor, patting their youthful heads, as he taught them the word and law of God. "Paint for me," says the original letter, "our old Parish Priest [&c. &c..] as he looked and spoke when he patted our heads and approved of our proficiency in catechism." And so Michael did, and perhaps the most exquisite portrait in the entire range of the O'Hara gallery is that of the venerable pastor—Father Connell.

Mr. "Justice" appears to regard as an essential object the distortion of his adversary's meaning whenever practicable. He insists that my article in Notes and Queries stated that "Scott was not the author of the Waverly Novels, and that John Banim was not the author of the Tales by the O'Hara Family." No such assertions were ever made. In reference to the first I have only to say, that it would have been, in the highest degree presumptuous and silly to utter it. The main character of Notes and Queries is to elicit facts. I published a "note" drawing up behind it a strong embankment of such grounds, documentary and circumstantial, as fully warranted, in the learned Editor's estimation, further enquiry. Mr. Ballantyne, an old friend of the Scott family, admitted that my arguments were most starting. Four writers in Notes and Queries have strengthened my position by adducing strong corroboratory evidence. I never said that Scott was not the author of the Waverleys. The assertion would have merited nought but ridicule. I had reason then for believing, and have certain evidence now, to feel convinced, that many of the Waverley Novels were a joint concern. So much so that I intend to publish a pamphlet at once upon the subject.

With equal nonchalance, he also assures your Readers, that I have declared John Banim not to have written The Tales by the O'Hara Family. This statement is proportionately distorted. I merely said, that according to Banim's life in the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, his brother Michael was the author of Crohoore, and the Croppy. There were many tales in the series. But what I have no doubt your correspondent considers "the unkindest cut of all," is where he declares that he had never heard of me until he read the Scott article in Notes and Queries. Allow me to assure this gentleman that I do not aspire to be a public character. Of independent fortune, I am a private individual residing not far from the city of Dublin, and although well known to a respectable portion of its inhabitants, could hardly expect the people of Brighton, or the citizens of London would be familiarly acquainted with my name. All who read Mr. "Justice's" first letter, and happened to know me, laughed very heartily, at his absurd assumption that I was "some petty minion of the shabby mayor of Kilkenny, who desired to advance my worldly prospects, by pinning my skirts to his local influence." I have no interest in this question, beyond a desire to maintain the dignity and integrity of those observations, which "THE LOVER OF JUSTICE" has so intemperately impugned. I never met Michael Banim but on one occasion. John, I never saw.

"A Lover of Justice" has been proved by my unknown defender in the Brighton Herald to have reiterated statements wholly wide of the truth. Professing to be conversant with all the private affairs of the Banim family, he declares that John was not even on speaking terms with his brother when, Crohoore, or the Croppy were written. "The two brothers," says the Herald dryly, "if not upon speaking terms—for one was in Ireland, and the other in London—were at least on the most affectionate writing terms," and to prove this the writer culls from Banim's memoir, some epistolary extracts, addressed in the fullest confidence to Michael, and pervaded by the most affectionate tone throughout. I took it upon myself to say, in my first letter, that the originals might doubtless be viewed if necessary, and I now repeat, on authority, that observation. This meets the ingenuous exclamations of Mr. "Justice", in reply to the Herald—"Am I so unwise as to pin my faith to a printed correspondence produced at the end of thirty years. I cannot see the water marks on the paper or the genuine post marks in print."

Another sweeping assertion made, is that "the shabby mayor of Kilkenny knew nothing of the personal history of his brother at the period when these tales were written." We have evidence, in the shape of an uninterrupted correspondence, and other proofs, to determine that each had the fullest knowledge of the doings of the other. "Justice," also assumes that "Mr. Michael Banim was giving and attending harvest homes, and dancing Irish-jigs, while John was writing the Croppy at Mr. W. Donell's, in the county Antrim." On the contrary, however, we find by Banim's own life, that during the composition of The Croppy, Michael was invited by him, on a visit to his residence in Sussex. He went, and we have ample particulars of this visit, and the contemporaneous progress of the Croppy.

After speaking in the most contemptuous manner of Michael, and indignantly denying that he knew anything of his brother's works, your tergiversating correspondent, when shamed by the clear and forcible reasoning of the writer in the Herald, now declares :—" I always considered Michael a clever man, and I am aware he has written some good things"—and again :—"Although we do not generally see mayors, and aldermen, very great slaves of the desk or the midnight lamp, there are exceptions to every rule, and Michael Banim was among those exceptions." In his first letter, he observed, among other Billingsgate references to the ex-Mayor, which described him, as dancing jigs, and drinking whiskey when the O'Hara Tales were being written by John—as utterly ignorant of his brother's movements, and now aspiring to soar on "borrowed plumes :"—"Michael would not give the literary madman (as he called John) a single sixpence to save him from starvation." It is not very likely that Michael, "a slave to the desk, and the midnight lamp," who according to your correspondent, has written such "good things," would sneeringly call John "a literary madman," or so affectionate a brother, refuse a single sixpence, to save him from starvation.

Mr. "Justice" goes on to say :—"A greater misrepresentation was never sent to print than that John Banim was not the author of the Croppy, Crohoore, the Boyne Water &c.!" The equivocating tendency of your correspondent is again manifest here. He has not only lugged in the Boyne Water, but an et cetera, which, of course, signifies the remainder of the O'Hara Tales ; and has disingenuously pursued this course in order that his proofs of John's sole authorship of the Boyne Water, may tell in favour of his denial that Michael wrote Crohoore and The Croppy. That John Banim wrote The Boyne Water The Nowlans, The Fetches, John Doe, &c., there cannot exist a doubt. Your correspondent adds, that he had in his hand twelve years ago portions of the above works in John Banim's own autograph, with corrections and interlineations, and that he could point to the family who still hold them as sacred heir looms. All this argues nothing. The brothers constantly transcribed each other's writings, and never hesitated to correct and interline according as their sober judgment prompted. Well might my defender in the Herald exclaim : "That the Tales by the O'Hara Family were the joint productions of John and Michael Banim, has never, I believe, been questioned until the present moment."

Mr "Justice" in his last calumnious discharge, speaks contemptuously of the Biographer of Banim, and twice protests against "Banim's fame being nibbled at by the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW."

I stated, in the letter which confronts, in juxtaposition, "Justice's" second onslaught, that "Banim's biographer is absolutely in love with his character throughout,—in fact, too much so for the taste of many." Such is the fact. Boswell was not a sincerer admirer of Johnson's intellect than the Editor of the IRISH QUARTERLY is of Banim's. To quote sentences in proof of this would be absurd. The work may be consulted passim, for evidences of what I say. Much as the biographer loves his hero, he loves truth and justice better, and he consequently scorns to suppress the fact, that in Michael's brain were formed the noble conceptions of Crohoore and The Croppy. The biographer of Harriet Lee, authoress of the Canterbury Tales, might as well be assailed for saying that her sister Sophia, wrote the best story of the series—The HUNGARIAN'S TALE—on which Byron founded his Tragedy of Werner.

I had the curiosity lately to ask one who possessed the entire confidence of the Banim family, why it was that Michael remained so long in the back ground, and never put forward any claims for literary distinction. "I asked that question myself," replied the gentleman, "and his answer was this, 'I had, as the eldest son, my father's shop and business to support me. Poor John had nothing but his brains, and I should have been the most ungenerous of men, to one of the most affectionate of brothers, to lower his literary prestige and popularity, by an unnecessary avowal of my share of the authorship.'" This explains, what your correspondent calls "the latter-day fiction that Michael was the author of some of John's best works." Mr. "Justice's" opinion of human nature is sad to contemplate. He cannot understand how Michael could be so destitute of vanity and selfish complacency, as to remain so long in retirement.* "Is it consistent with human nature," he exclaims triumphantly, "that Michael would allow John Banim to usurp his fame and his

* Michael Banim's introduction to Clough Fionn, or the Stone of Destiny (published a year previous to the memoir in the IRISH QUARTERLY) is interesting.—

"It is known to the reading public that the Works of fiction published under the title of 'Tales of the O'Hara Family,' were the joint production of two brothers—one of them, the younger, a literary man by profession; the other, and the elder, a man in business, who occasionally contributed the result of such hours as he could borrow from his more immediate and more pressing avocations. The origin, extent, and nature of this literary partnership may be, at no distant day, communicated to the curious in such matters, should it be ascertained that any curiosity exists. It is known, too, to those who consider the 'Tales by the O'Hara Family' worth perusal, that the younger brother was called on to pay the debt we must all pay, before he had passed the prime of life, and after many years of such bodily suffering as few are required to endure in preparation for the grave. Up to the period of John Banim's death in the summer of 1842, the connexion of the brothers existed, and with the survivor of 'The O'Hara Family,' many notes and memoranda remain, partly originated with the one, and partly with the other. The following story (Clough-Fionn, or, the Stone of Destiny) is wrought out of a portion of those materials; it is therefore, properly speaking, a renewal of old acquaintanceship with the public, under the 'old familiar name.'" labours for so many years, without producing proofs that ~~HE~~ HE WAS WRONGED?"

"Justice" would seem to have forgotten, at the close of his letter, what he admitted at the commencement, that Michael's frequent companions were the desk and midnight lamp, and that he always knew him to be a clever man capable of writing able things. The concluding lines of his letter, and the last five lines of mine, clash amusingly. He says that "since John's death Michael has not published anything, which would hardly be the case, were he the powerful writer, which the despoilers of John's fame would represent him." The information that Michael had lately concluded an interesting novel in the University Magazine, &c., was conveyed in the P.S. of my letter. Had Michael Banim leisure, and a brother living to exercise judgment, and bestow on his writings that artistic touch, at which John was so en fait, he would probably produce a series of Irish Tales hardly inferior to Miss Edgeworth's.

I will here append some extracts from an interesting letter of Michael Banim's, addressed to one, who urged him to write more—in fact myself. It is the only letter I ever received from him. After adverting to the benefit his works derived from the revision of John Banim, he writes:—"Originally my education was defective, and from my 15th to my 22nd year, I was engaged, hammer and tongs, acquiring a knowledge of the business I was bred to, with no leisure for study, or self improvement. This continues pretty much the same up to the present hour. The struggle for my 'daily bread,' gives me no leisure to indulge my literary propensities, such as they are. This 'daily bread,' must be provided—there is no manna now-a-days. My indispensable, and humble avocations are in opposition to the exercise of any mental power I possess. Stern reality, is a beast of burthen, and cannot be stabled with the winged horse of Imagination. They don't feed on the same provender."

John Banim on only one occasion publicly avowed the literary aid which Michael gave the O'Hara Tales. The admission—a characteristically honorable one—occurred in his acknowledgment of a complimentary address, and substantial present from the citizens of Kilkenny, in September, 1835. I did not happen to be acquainted with this thoroughly conclusive passage, when my share in the present correspondence began:—

"While thus for the first time," writes John Banim, "called upon to reply to compliments paid to me as the writer of these volumes, I cannot hesitate to mention that a considerable portion of the success of some of the stories, is attributable to the assistance of a dear, and respected brother."

"It is quite a common thing in London," writes Mr. "Justice," vainly endeavouring to spread a false colour over the facts, "for a poor hard-working author to send his MS. written illigibly, to a brother in the distance, to write out clear for the Press." Compositors are more generally skilled in deciphering illigible writing, than any other class of men, whether they are personal friends of the writer, or his own immediate family.

I have already adverted to the sweeping headlong statements which your pert correspondent tumbles off his pen. His whole letter is made up of mis-statement, and exaggeration. And when on inquiry he finds himself in error, and that no further sophistry can make his position tenable, he flippantly pronounces these mis-statements to be—printers' errors!

The "admirer of the O'Hara Tales" having taken him to task for one of the more plausible of his allegations, he now stammers out:— "I beg to correct a TYPOGRAPHICAL error in my last letter, namely, that John Banim wrote every line with his own weary hand. This should have been, he invented every line in his own weary brain."

It is a good joke truly to endeavour to prove, that pert mis-statements are printers' errors. Allowing the above, however, to be one, are we to understand that what Mr. "Justice" intended to write was, "the fact is, that John Banim not only composed every line of Crook's, from his own brain, but also invented every line in his own weary brain!" (See the first letter of "A LOVER OF JUSTICE," Ale, p. 5.)

From certain technicalities, and innuendoes made by Mr. "Justice," there cannot be a doubt but that he is a literary writer. In the above he has favoured us with a specimen of his tact in elaborating a sentence, for which we should all feel very much obliged. It is surely a rich joke to assert, that words so distinct, and unlike each other, should have been mysteriously introduced through typo-diabolical agency. I venture to say, that the very devils (who are rarely if ever known to take an interest in the matter of any "copy") grin sardonically at his expense as they "set up" these lines. I even see the usually solemn, and sedate reader, chuckling as he penetrates along the margin. Nay, I venture to affirm, that the very Publisher of the Brighton Guardian, will "laugh a few," (as Sam Slick says) when his attention is called to what your correspondent would fain have it believed were errata. He must have a sorry opinion of Brighton judgment to make such transparencies, as appear in his letters, and a poor opinion of Brighton dignity, to stigmatise their chief magistrate, as a "shabby" personage.

Why he should run from Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, to make his complaint to the good people of Brighton, I cannot understand, unless the editor of Notes and Queries, and the other literary journals of the metropolis, refused admission to his flippant and effusive observations.

Your correspondent would fain convince you, that he possessed the entire confidence of John Banim, and knew every minutia of his thoughts, and doings. Touching a point which my unknown Defender in the News, from peculiar information, was enabled to lodge in one of Mr. "Justice's" statements, he says, "why is he not also sagacious enough to know, that John Banim had a dear bosom friend and companion in MICHAEL B——, independently of his brother Michael?"

This revelation is doubtless calculated to increase the respect entertained for your correspondent. I am aware that Michael B—— was an acquaintance of the Banim family, but what character does John himself, give of him in a letter to Michael, dated May 2, 1824, and published in the Irish Quarterly for December 1854, p. 855.

When suggesting characters for him to daguerreotype, he says, "give me Tom Guinn, hat, gaiters, watch, pipe, and his horn tinder box. * * FOR A RECKLESS BULLY, BOY, AND MAN, REMEMBER MICHAEL B." The Editor of the memoir, knowing Mr. Michael B. to be still living, suppressed the name.

Mr. Michael B——, with what he blindly considers scathing irony, compares my arguments in Notes and Queries, to some ingenious specimens of logic from the pen of Archbishop Whately. To be likened, even in joke, to so distinguished a logician, is a compliment I could have hardly expected from such a hostile quarter.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your faithful servant,

WILLIAM JOHN FITZPATRICK.

P.S. There is one point, I had almost forgot to touch upon. Mr. "Justice" has taken great umbrage at my referring to Banim as "an Individual." It is an ignorant and vulgar error to consider the word "Individual" as conveying reproach, or expressing contempt. If it had any such appearance, however, I withdraw the expression, as nothing was further from my thoughts than to speak disparagingly of one of my most gifted countrymen. To refer to him as "that gentleman," would have a much more formal and affected sound. Lamb and Hazlitt's London Magazine, vol. ii. p. 671, speaking of Sir Walter Scott's connection with Blackwood, says, "this eminent Individual is known to have written some things for the Magazine in question." Again in the first page of Lockhart's Memoirs of Scott, "the public" are informed, "that they will know from good authority all they are entitled to know of an Individual who has contributed to their amusement."

No one entertains a higher respect for Banim's character, and genius than I do. If you be in the way of seeing the Nation newspaper, you will find a letter dated November 10th, signed by me, in which I reproached the Irish people for their apathetic feeling towards the memory of Banim and other gifted Irishmen, who toiled long and ably to purify the tone, and stimulate the growth of Irish literature.

[The letter referred to by Mr. Fitzpatrick, breathes so kind and healthful a tone, that its extended circulation can do no harm, and may do good. In allusion to Clarence Maugan's Recollections of Maturin, published in the Nation of November 3rd, and which concluded with a declaration that "he knew not where the bones of poor Maturin repose," Mr. Fitzpatrick writes:—]

"Alas, it is only in Ireland that such utter oblivion of genius could be traced. By some he is completely unknown—by all, with few exceptions, forgotten. Of the strength and purity of Maturin's genius I have long been an humble admirer. In 1849—five-and-twenty years after Maturin's death—I made various unsuccessful inquiries for the place of his interment. At length it was suggested that, having filled, while living, the office of curate to St. Peter's Church, his tomb would probably be found either within the walls of the old edifice or the adjacent graveyard. Aided by a friend, equally interested, I searched, but, until the sexton volunteered his services, we could discover no traces. Near the entrance gate, his grave was at length pointed out to us; and—can it be credited?—not even a plain head-stone marked the spot. An uninscribed flag surmounts the grave of Emmet—Maturin's has neither stone or epitaph!

Thirty-five years ago, the name of Maturin was on every second tongue. The diaries of Scott and Byron bear evidence of this. His presence was eagerly sought to dignify literary reunions, or lionize hilarious winter dinner parties. Edmund Kean flung his entire energy into the realization of the vast conceptions of Bertram, Manuel, and Monturio. If Maturin walked the streets of Dublin, every second person turned to stare;* if he preached, the church would be crowded to an extent unknown since the days of Dean Kirwan. He is now dead, and, like Charles Lucas, Curran, O'Connell and Dr. Doyle—forgotten! Lord Monteaule of Brandon, touchingly and eloquently observed to me in a recent letter (not marked "private"), relative to the above mentioned Patriot Prelate of Kildare:—"Your observation is quite true, respecting the rapid growth of forgetfulness in this country, which, like the ivy which covers our ancient monuments, concealing their architectural beauty, hides also the virtuous actions of many of our best men. The noble and distinguished men who laboured with Grattan in forming our constitution, are all forgotten, Grattan himself but slightly remembered, Plunkett is almost unknown, and in passing through Waterford the other day, I was unable to find even a tablet bearing the honoured name of Newport. This is very sad, for the want of a feeling of active and enduring gratitude deprives us of those moral examples which would raise and dignify our country, and would exalt and improve the present generation."

And what has become of the gifted James Clarence Mangan, who mourned ten years ago, at the thought of Maturin having been forgotten. My friend, Mr. Hercules Ellis, who has edited a pleasing little volume, called "Romances and Ballads of Ireland," gives in its preface the following account of Mangan's end:—

"I had not been acquainted with Mangan except though the medium of his writings. I had never even seen him, when in the month of June, 1849, I was startled by a newspaper announcement, that the poet who had so long afforded me instruction and delight had just died in the Meath Hospital, associated with the most wretched outcasts of society, and indebted to a public charity for a bed and shelter, in his dying moments.

* His rapidly attained popularity as a Poet, would absolutely seem to have excited, in some degree, the jealousy of Moore, who records in his Journal of September 10th, 1820, the fact that during George the IV.'s visit to Ireland, "the cowardly Scholars of Dublin College took pains to avoid mentioning his (Moore's) name; and who, after a Speech of some Sir Noodle boasting of the poetical talent of Ireland, drank as the utmost they could venture, "Maturin, and the rising Poets of Erin."—W. J. F.

"I hastened to the Hospital to ascertain if this report were correct. There, for the first time, I beheld James Clarence Mangan. Wrapped in a winding sheet, and stretched upon the table of the Dead House, lay the poet, whose works had so long formed the theme of universal admiration, an attenuated corpse, wasted to a skeleton, by want, sickness, and misery, and despair."

Moore—the brilliant, sparkling Bard of Erin—read in the newspapers, the account of Mangan's death, and probably sighed as he thought of Ireland's ungrateful neglect of genius. Moore has now been dead some years, and where is the English tourist to look for that Testimonial to his memory, which everybody who read the proceedings at Charlemont House on March 31, 1852, imagined would have been erected before the expiration of the year? The English traveller in Ireland visits the old house in Aungier-street where Moore first drew breath—he gazes upon the grave of Emmet, "where cold and unhonoured his relics are laid"—he visits Avoca, than which "there is not in the wide world a valley so sweet,"—he stands upon the Hill of Tara, and imagines he hears the thrilling tones of the Irish Harp rushing through the Halls of Celtic Royalty.—he wanders along "Lough Neagh's banks," enraptured by the prospect, and ruminating mournfully on Moore's dead genius, once so bright and powerful—he goes, of course, to Killarney, lands on Innisfallen, "where erring man might hope to rest," beholds on every side the theme of Moore's grandest melodies, and can it be wondered that he asks reproachfully to be shewn the Testimonial to him, who gave to Ireland's history, wrongs, and beauty, a European fame.

Almost every continental town proudly displays in its grand square, or market place, the statue of whatever remarkable man was born there. Bonn has its Beethoven; Antwerp, its Rubens; Frankfurt, its Goethe; Paris, its Cuvier, and Moliere. Swift has been dead 110 years. Where is his statue? He left his property to endow a Dublin Hospital. Have we been grateful?

The cenotaph to Grattan should not be hidden in that gloomy monument of national depression—the once "Royal Exchange." Grattan, as an Irish patriot, is better worth a pedestal in Sackville-street, than Horatio Lord Nelson, as an English admiral. Let Dublin assert its dignity and gratitude. Has Scotland neglected to raise a colossal monument to Scott, in Edinburgh, to Motherwell, in Glasgow, or to Burns' genius, by the banks of the Doon? As to London, Mr. W. Savage Landor, in his recent appeal on behalf of the great-grand-son of Defoe, declares that the city is choked with statues—"Demagogues and adventurers, in brass tunics, at every street corner."

In 1843, O'Connell looked down in the zenith of his power, on the grateful adoring, millions who surged around him. Four years after and the once all-powerful Tribune lay mouldering in Glanevin. No surging, uproarious multitude deluged his grave with tears. A solitary loiterer, perchance, paused to gaze. Quietude reigned unbroken throughout the city of the dead. Within its walls thousands who had often cheered O'Connell, lay cold themselves. Without, the living people slumbered in the apathy of a false prosperity. For years no effort was made to raise a stone over O'Connell!

Does Ireland know that her greatest male novelist is John Banim? Is she aware that in England he is styled "the Hibernian Scott?" Can she read, unmoved, the following appeal from Banim's Biographer?—"When dying, he said, I have only one request now—lay me so that I may be nearest to my mother—with my left side next her. And so they buried him more than twelve years ago, and so for twelve years he has lain without stone or monument to mark his grave. Thomas Hood died in 1845, he has a public monument. Mr. Blackwood's 'Delta,' died in 1851—he has a public monument. Have these examples of public gratitude no teaching for Irishmen? Must Michael Banim drag from his own small funds, the money to purchase a tombstone for John Banim's grave?"

Maria Edgeworth was the greatest of Irish female novelists. It was her example that stimulated into action the pen of Walter Scott. How long will Ireland take to consider that some monumental memorial of her services, would, while dignifying the land, show we can appreciate native greatness.

The remains of Gerald Griffin, unlike Banim's, have been honoured not only with a head-stone, but an inscription. Few know where to find it. A friend, who from his youth has been an ardent admirer of the intellect that produced "The Collegians," lately wrote to me from Cork to say, that sauntering through the north monastery he found in a small cemetery containing six tombs—poor Griffin's simple shrine. Sad to say, that were it not for the Christian Brothers whom he died among, he would probably still be without one. The inscription is simply, "Brother Gerald Joseph Griffin, died June 12, 1840, aged 36 years.—May he rest in peace. Amen."

I call upon the Irish newspaper press to arouse the people from their worse than stupid lethargy, which like rust on a bright metallic body, the longer it is suffered to continue, the thicker, and intenser, must become, its corrosive, overwhelming nature!"—W. J. F.

November 10th, 1855.

Since Mr. Fitzpatrick's letter appeared, we are glad to see that a considerable effort has been made by the Bar, to raise some fitting monumental testimonial to the memory of William Conyngham Lord Plunkett. We hope that a prolonged slumber may not succeed—as it too often does in Ireland—this national and commendable effort. The Bar meeting—brightened by the auspices of Napier, Staples, O'Hagan, Butt, and Brewster—was held on Tuesday, November 27th. We have heard nothing of their generous project since.—Ed.

ART. IV.—NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

The Priest's Niece ; or, the Heirship of Barnulph. By the Author of "Lionel Deerhurst." Three Vols. Second Edition. London: Hurst and Blackett, 1855.

WHO is there that has not at some period of, if not all through, his life, delighted in the creations of the novelist ; or lived a bright hour of elysium amidst the fancies of the romancist. The child begins his romance reading with Gulliver, and Cru-soe, and The Giant Killer ; the school-boy steals away from the frequented play-ground to revel, in the seclusion of some quiet haunt, over the wonders of that ever wondrous book, that concentration of all "Romance and Fairy Fable."—The Arabian Nights,—and so, as years pass on, the boy becomes a man, and the novel becomes still dearer, for fair young faces and bright eyes, showing every change of thought and feeling are bending over its pages with him ; and then, as other years roll away, and gray hairs are marking the course of time, he still, with a fresh heart, turns to the volumes loved in past-by days, and feels, as John Dunlop, in his History of Fiction, truly observes, that "life has few things better, than sitting at the chimney-corner in a winter evening, after a well spent day, and reading an interesting romance or novel."

What Dunlop thus wrote, forty-two years ago, was true of his age ; it was true in every age since the invention of printing ; from that epoch, fiction has been the solace of the weary, the soother of the sick, the refuge of those whom the "coy dame," sleep deserts. Chaucer tells us :—

"Upon my bed I sate upright ;
A Romaunce, and he me it took
To read and drive the night away :—" and the "Romaunce," with which he thus forgot his sleeplessness, and drove the night away, was composed of—

"Fables
That clerkis had, in old time,
And other poets, put in rhyme—"

it was Ovid's Metamorphoses.

And yet, through all the changes of all the years since the epoch of printing, it is interesting to observe how thoroughly, and how thoroughly, the spirit of each age is represented by its romantic literature. We find proofs of this assertion in every romance, from those preserved by Tressan in his Corps d'Extraits de Romans de Chevalerie, to Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur; from Vasco de Lobeira's Amadis de Gaul to Lord Berners' Chevalier de la Cygne; in Honoré d'Urfé's Astrea and in Sir Philip Sydney's Arcadia; from Fielding and Goldsmith to Dickens and Thackeray; from Miss Burney to Mrs. Trollope. In all the works of all these writers we see the taste and mould of their time, in all the phases of its literary taste, always following, never leading; and declaring, with their brethren of the stage, that "——they who live to please, must please to live."

Novels, and fiction generally, being thus so widely and extensively admired in all ages, it seems strange that in this, the most reading era of all, the demand should not have had its usual effect, the creation of a supply of the best material. Doubtless we have romances of every order and division of subject, from Reynolds' Mysteries of the Court, to Macaulay's History of England; from Mrs. Ellis's Mothers, Wives, Daughters, and relatives generally, and with a high, and frightfully moral purpose, to Cardinal Wiseman's Last Days of Pompeii, and water-novel, Fabiola. Dr. Cumming romances about the religious present, and the Cardinal romances about the Christian past. True it is, that the servant-maid has her London Journal, and the maid's mistress has her Little Dorrit; the servant-man has his Joseph Price and his Reynolds' Miscellany, just as the master has his Newcomes and his Bell's Life: there is great demand and vast supply, but, does the supply prove that, amidst all our writers of fiction, moral or immoral, religious or profane, grave or comic, we possess a single GREAT NOVELIST? Aurelia Murphy, fresh from a "good cry," over the loves of the impossible Copperfield, and the liliputian Dora with the curls, and the lap-dog with the ears, exclaims, "yes, Dickens." Augustus Mullowney, of the Sallynoggin Fencibles, who fancies himself quite a "heavy" of the Rawdon Crawley school, shouts, "I believe you, my boy, Thackeray is the ticket." Young Casey, who is a scholar in the Catholic University, cries, "yes, the Cardinal, who is great in everything, is a great novelist, although he will not describe the charms of his heroine ;" the Rev. Patrick Muldon, late R. C. C. in Connaught, now a light of the Priests' Protection Society, thunders, "yes, Lever, and the author of Poor Paddy's Cabin, are great authors ;" the routé, remembering the seduction-made-easy of Ernest Maltraversa, declares for Bulwer ; the fashionable young wife votes for Mrs. Gore ; whilst the bitter, coarse sarcasm of Mrs. Trellope finds a warm supporter in the hopeless old maid, or the superannuated dowager.

We have here endeavoured to indicate, by types of each class of readers, the phases of mind by which each class is swayed in forming an opinion of its favorite novelist. But if these opinions, grounded only on the degree of amusement, or mere mental distraction from thoughtful self-recollection, always a burthen to the great mass of the frivolous or the careless, be taken as the standard of merit in a writer of fiction, then the poorest trash of the circulating library must be admitted as excellent,—Ivanhoe must give place to The Coral Island, and The History of a Foundling must make room for The History of a Servant Maid.

But we protest against this substitution of feeling for judgment ; this species of criticism worthy only a school-girl, who skips all the descriptive and reflective passages, and who, arriving at the midst of the second volume, passes to the conclusion of the third to anticipate the denouement.

Doubtless, it may be aids, a novel is only meant to amuse. We admit, if it make you forget the passing of time ; if you are quite astonished by the announcement of dinner ; if you are forced to abandon your after dinner nap in your anxiety to follow the novelist through his fancy-created world, all these things prove that the novel interests you, but it does not prove the writer of the fiction a great novelist.

What is a great novelist ? One who, selecting his plot with care and deliberation, selects one adapted to his own peculiar genius for developement, and execution, and completion. One who, having selected his plot, proceeds with it, naturally, to the end. One whose characters are the real men and women of the period in which the action of the tale is laid. They must be the flesh and blood of their time ; they must not be the quips of the author's brain if comic characters ; they must not be his dream-children if pathetic : the light of life must be about each prominent character, and the denouement must not be unnatural or forced, for the sake of producing a clap-trap, melo-dramatic finale. To write thus, and to excite wonder, pleasure, interest and admiration, is to be a great novelist : to do this is to make for one's self more slaves and puppets to one's will, than ever bent before the throne of emperor or of despot : to accomplish this is to render one's-self the "cynosure of all eyes," to prove how truly Jules Janin has observed, "Si on annonçerait Monsieur de Balzac et Monsieur le Duc de Montmorency dans un salon, on regarderait Monsieur de Balzac." To become such a man as this is no mean ambition ; it must be achieved, without such support as the painter with his colors, or the dramatist with his actor, can bring to his aid ; "it is," writes Sir Walter, "the object of the novel-writer, to place before the reader as full and accurate a representation of the events which he relates, as can be done, by the mere force of an excited imagination, without the assistance of material objects. His sole appeal is made to the world of fancy, and of ideas, and in this consists his strength and his weakness, his poverty and his wealth."

If we considered the novelist as little more than a "diverting vagabond," we need not thus write of his position or of his qualifications ; but, when we ask, as we have asked, do we possess a GREAT NOVELIST, it is right that we should declare, as we have declared, what we consider a great novelist to be ; and this more especially when we remember the hold, firm and long placed, which some of our so called great novelists have upon the minds of a vast number of the reading public of these Kingdoms.

Take, for example, Dickens and Thackeray. Three years ago it was written, in our mind correctly, in this Review :—"It has been said, that Alphonse Karr is a French Charles Dickens ; the observation is sufficiently just, in its estimate of the genius of the former, provided we understand it as applying to the first works of Dickens, written before money, ease, fame, and the critics, had spoiled him. Karr describes nature as she is. His men and women are not caricatures of humanity, or the embodied quips and whimsies of a man of genius ; his children are not beautiful monstrosities, guiding their grand-fathers through the country, or, whilst sitting in a go-car, hearing voices in the waves of the ocean. Karr never reproduces his successful creations. Having drawn a Tom Pinch, he would not recall him in a Prince Thursday ; having succeeded in a Snawley, and a Stiggins, he would not revive them in a Chadband; having painted the Cheeryble Brothers, he would not produce the "two single gentlemen rolled into one," as a Jarndyce; having drawn a Mrs Dombey, he would not half-revive her as a Lady Dedlock; having succeeded in a Chuffy, he would not galvanise him in a Mrs. Smallweed; having painted a Pecksniff, he would not reproduce him, weak and sketchy, in a Skimpole; having to describe a nobleman, he would not habitually represent him as a fool, or as a scoundrel, a Sir Mulberry Hawk, or a Lord Verisopht, a Sir John Chester, a Lord Feenix, or a Sir Leicester Dedlock. Having joined the noble profession of the law, he would not pander to the taste of the ignorant, by representing its practise as little more honest than that of the pickpocket, or the charlatan; he would not render his book interesting to those readers, by representing all the abuses of his profession, those productions of time—whilst he never described the advantages of the system. If Karr were to write a history, or, 'a Child's History,' he would not take advantage of his position to perpetuate every error, to slander a noble but unfortunate nation, and would not barter truth for popularity, or cover profound ignorance by reckless assumption. Karr never outsteps the boundary of nature; he carries his plot through to the end, and never attempts to gain our sympathy by detailing the loves of a burglar and a strumpet; he never makes the chief interest of a portion of his plot turn upon a case of seduction, and if he did so, would not paint a victim ruined by such arts as must have failed, unless the unfortunate had been a maundering idiot, or half-corrupted and half-willing; he never describes a woman flying with a man she hates, for the purpose solely of vexing her husband. Alphonse Karr has no Bill Sykes, or his trull Nancy; he has no Steerforth and Emily; he has no Carker and Mrs. Dombey. In his religion there is no cant, nor is there an anxiety to represent a clergyman as a well-meaning poetising dreamer, or as a stupid prosing preacher, whose sermons act as 'a mild dose of opium.' For the sacred Redeemer of the world, Alphonse Karr has other, and truer, and more defined titles than 'He,' or 'Him,' with a capital H; and he never, like Dickens, leaves us in doubt as to whether the writer is to be looked upon as very affected in his style, and considered as an ordinary believer, or as one who glories in that belief, which is but a hair's breadth removed from unbec-lief—Unitarianism. With Karr, a church is a place raised for the worship of God, not a house in which we are to criticise our neighbours, and to cry down the preacher, forgetful of the moralist's thought—

'The worst speak something good. If all want sense,
God takes a text and preacheth patience.
He that gets patience and the blessing which Preachers conclude with, hath not lost his pains.'

It was the complaint of Jeremy Taylor to Lord Carbery, that he 'had lived to see religion painted upon banners, and thrust out of churches, and the temple turned into a tabernacle, and the tabernacle made ambulatory.' Had he lived till now, he would find all the errors we have pointed out, committed frequently by Mr. Charles Dickens, and would discern that, according to him, religion dwells in woods and fields, in the breasts of peasants and elderly gentlemen of the middle classes, and in the bosoms of impossible children. He would learn, too, that religion is still ambulatory, or peripatetic, that every man is his own tabernacle, and that all worship best in 'The Great Cathedral of Nature!' These are the distinguishing characteristics of Mr. Dickens's late works, and, therefore, we consider that Alphonse Karr is not a French Charles Dickens; in our judgment, he is, in his truth and fidelity in painting life and nature, a French Oliver Goldsmith. We do not write thus through any great personal regard for Alphonse Karr, but although we cannot consider him a Charles Dickens, yet we look upon him as something more than a French Charles Dickens,—we believe that the genius of the Author of Pickwick is as brilliant as ever; his faults spring from his knowledge of, and from his trading upon, the old regards and recollections of his readers."

These observations were true when written, during the publication of Bleak House, whilst the conclusion of that work, and a close examination of the other volumes issued previous to that period, have not only strengthened, but fully confirmed the estimate of Mr. Dickens' powers above inserted. He has not written, and we believe never will write a work of fiction, entitling him to the appellation of a great novelist. That he draws individual characters most admirably none can admit, more freely and more gratefully, than do we; but he fails, utterly and wofully, in the combination of characters, and in that harmonious working of plot and under plot, in which the real art of the great novelist undoubtedly consists. The Sketches by Boz, and the collection of sketches known as The Pickwick Papers, shew the full strength of Dickens' genius : give him a pathetic, or a whimsical, or a grotesque, or a burlesque, or a peculiar character, or one to stand in relief, as a study, and no man living can excel Dickens in the portraiture : but let this character form one of a series comprised in a work of fiction, and whilst it may, and will, save the work from forgetfulness, it will the more surely prove how little claim Dickens has to the fame of a great novelist, even though it may entitle him to the reputation of being the first living sketcher of character. Do we remember Nickleby, or Chuzzlewit, or Copperfield, or Bleak House, or the Old Curiosity Shop, for their plots or stories? Even Dombey and Bleak House, the only tales of the entire set in which a plot is even attempted to be carried out, are weak and spiritless, and unnatural. As to Dombey, Carker's proposed seduction of, and hide-and-seek elopement with Mrs. Dombey, and its futile conclusion, with Carker's calling her names, and thumping the table—are about the poorest and most unnatural, and most ridiculous things in the whole range of English literature. Referring to this character, Carker, when at an early stage of serial development, and referring also to Dickens' knack of changing the whole natural disposition of his actors as the tale proceeds, Lord Jeffrey wrote to him :—

"Perhaps I hate Carker even more, already ; so much, indeed, that it would be a relief to me if you could do without him. And I must tell you, too, that I think him the least natural of all the characters you have ever exhibited (for I do not consider Quilp, or Dick Swiveller, as at all out of nature) ; but it seems to me that a Knight Templar in the disguise of a waiter, is not a more extravagant fiction, than a man of high gifts and rare accomplishments, bred and working hard every day as a subordinate manager or head clerk in a merchant's counting-house. One might pass his extreme wickedness and malignity, though they, too, are quite above his position ; but the genius and attainments, the manners and scope of thought, do strike me as not reconcilable with anything one has yet heard of his history, or seen of his occupations. But I must submit, I see, to take a great interest in him, and only hope you will not end by making me love him too."<sup>2</sup>

* See Life of Lord Jeffrey, Vol. II. p. 427.

But, though we cannot admire the books above named for their plots, we do admire them for the beautiful, or whimsical, though often unnatural creations which they contain. It is this very admiration for them which has too frequently rendered Mr Dickens' friends forgetful of the many defects of his works; and thus, confirmed in his strength and in his weakness, he has grown the spoiled pet of the public. And who can wonder at it, when we find Jeffrey writing thus to him in, 1847:—

"You have the force and the nature of Scott in his pathetic parts, without his occasional coarseness and wordiness; and the searching disclosure of inward agonies of Byron, without a trait of his wickedness."*

"The force and nature of Scott"—The force of Flora Mac Ivor, of Rob Roy; of Jeanie Deans, of Burley, of a dozen others; the nature of The Basilic, "rest and bless him," of Andrew Fairfervies, of Magnus Troil, of The Antiquary, of Louis the XL of Dalgetty, of Caleb Balderstone: Dickens said to have "force and nature," to draw characters like these! "The searching disclosure of inward agonies of Byron;" let us think of the Prisoner of Chillon, of Alp the Renegade, of fifty passages in Childe Harold, of The Dream, and above all, of the serious portions of Don Juan, and then, what can we believe of the critic, who declared to Dickens, that he, Dickens, possessed "the force and nature of Scott," "the searching disclosure of inward agonies of Byron!" What could Jeffrey have meant? Would he have preferred the flattering of a London sparrow to the soaring flight of a mountain eagle? Would he set the Cheeryble Brothers against Oldbuck? Mark Tapley against Caleb Balderstone? Would he—but to continue the reil is absurd, a sketcher can never be enrolled amongst the great masters; a Rembrandt outline is never put in competition with a picture of Titian's, and therefore, and for all the foregoing reasons, we cannot consider Charles Dickens a GREAT NOVELIST.

And now, with powers weakened, with fancy fading, seeking in new scenes, and strange lands, and popular topics, for materials which genius should supply, or gather from the old and best known world of home, who can declare that Charles Dickens will ever again produce fictions worthy of his old reputation, even though we may not consider them as proving him to possess "The force and nature of Scott, the searching disclosure of inward agonies of Byron."

Is Thackeray a GREAT NOVELIST? Will he ever be a great novelist? No. A great novelist never outsteps the boundary of nature; he never mingles the comic and the burlesque. In the dissection of the human feelings he sees healthful as well as diseased structures, and in leading his readers onwards to a knowledge of the heart's various workings, he shews its beauties, its graces, its goodness, and its evils, and thus, though comprised in his system of teaching, morbid anatomy does not compose the chief portion of the text-book.

We believe that Thackeray excels Dickens in the structure of his plots, although often careless, and frequently forgetful of his earlier scenes and shadings of character. His men are inimitable—good as Fielding's—real genuine men, with the stamp of the world, and self, and nature about them; no body loves them, but who would love one-tenth the men he knows if he knew them as the novelist can show them? His women, too, are sharper in petticoats, or enduring, patient, loving creatures; hence the dislike that most female readers express to Thackeray's novels. Tom Pinch is preferred to Major Dobbin, Agnes to Laura Bell, David Copperfield to Pendennis, Sir John Chester to Major Pendennis, Mrs. Dombey to Edith Newcome, Mrs. Skewton to Lady Kew, and Steerforth to Rasdon Crawley. But is this a fair judgment? are we to prefer a fancy picture to an accurate portrait? We may regret that Thackeray prefers the demonstration of morbid to healthy anatomy, but we must admit that, in his peculiar branch of psychological anatomy, he is always accurate and just. Most men are like his men; most women as his women; and surely it is better he should paint men and women as they are, than represent the former as we have them from Dickens, beautiful fancy sketches or distorted caricatures; or the latter, as the authoress of Jane Eyre portrayed them—mental hermaphrodites.

As we have above observed, Thackeray frequently forgets that the comic and the burlesque are separate and distinct, that one should never be permitted to mingle with the other. This is a serious fault, a fault which often disfigures the writings of both Thackeray and Dickens. And yet, more than one hundred years ago, the distinction between the comic and the burlesque was very clearly indicated, and with his usual aptness of illustration, by Henry Fielding, who, in the preface to Joseph Andrews, thus writes:—

“The Epic, as well as the Drama, is divided into tragedy and comedy. Homer, who was the father of this species of poetry, gave us a pattern of both these, though that of the latter kind is entirely lost; which Aristotle tells us bore the same relation to comedy which his Iliad bears to tragedy. And perhaps, that we have no more instances of it among the writers of antiquity, is owing to the loss of this great pattern, which, had it survived, would have found its imitators equally with the other poems of this great original.

And farther, as this poetry may be tragic or comic, I will not scruple to say it may be likewise either in verse or prose; for though it wants one particular, which the critic enumerates in the constituent parts of an epic poem, namely metre; yet when any kind of writing contains all its other parts, such as fable, action, characters, sentiments, and diction, and is deficient in metre only; it seems, I think, reasonable to refer it to the epic; at least, as no critic had thought proper to range it under any other head, or to assign it a particular name to itself.

Thus the Telemachus of the Archbishop of Cambray appears to me of the epic kind, as well as the Odyssey of Homer: indeed it is much fairer and more reasonable to give it a name common with that species from which it differs only in a single instance, than to confound it with those which it resembles in no other. Such are those voluminous works commonly called Romances, namely, Clelia, Cleopatra, Astræa, Cassandra, the Grand Cyrus, and innumerable others, which contain, as I apprehend, very little instruction and entertainment.

Now a comic romance is a comic epic poem in prose; differing from comedy, as the serious epic from tragedy; its action being more extended and comprehensive; containing a much larger circle of incidents, and introducing a greater variety of characters. It differs from the serious romance in its fable and action, in this, that as in the one these are grave and solemn, so in the other they are light and ridiculous: it differs in its characters, by introducing persons of inferior rank, and consequently of inferior manners; whereas the grave romance sets the highest before us: lastly, in its sentiments and diction, by preserving the ludicrous instead of the sublime. In the diction, I think, burlesque itself may be sometimes admitted; of which many instances will occur in this work, as in the description of the battles, and some other places not necessary to be pointed out to the classical reader, for whose entertainment those parodies or burlesque imitations are chiefly calculated.

But though we have sometimes admitted this in our diction, we have carefully excluded it from our sentiments and characters; for there it is never properly introduced, unless in writings of the burlesque kind, which this is not intended to be. Indeed, no two species of writing can differ more widely than the comic and the burlesque: for as the latter is ever the exhibition of what is monstrous and unnatural, and where our delight, if we examine it, arises from the surprising absurdity, as in appropriating the manners of the highest to the lowest, or e converso; so in the former, we should ever confine ourselves strictly to nature, from the just imitation of which will flow all the pleasure we can this way convey to a sensible reader. And perhaps there is one reason why a comic writer should of all others be the least excused for deviating from nature, since it may not be always so easy for a serious poet to meet with the great and the admirable; but life everywhere furnishes an accurate observer with the ridiculous.

I have hinted this little concerning burlesque; because I have often heard that name given to performances, which have been truly of the comic kind, from the author's having sometimes admitted it in his diction only; which, as it is the dress of poetry, doth, like the dress of men, establish characters, (the one of the whole poem, and the other of the whole man,) in vulgar opinion beyond any of their greater excellencies: but surely a certain drollery in style, where the characters and sentiments are perfectly natural, no more constitutes the burlesque, than an empty pomp and dignity of words, where every thing else is mean and low, can entitle any performance to the appellation of the true sublime.

And I apprehend my Lord Shaftsbury's opinion of mere burlesque agrees with mine, when he asserts, there is no such thing to be found in the writings of the Ancients. But, perhaps, I have less abhorrence than he professes for it: and that not because I have had some little success on the stage this way, but rather as it contributes more to exquisite mirth and laughter than any other; and these are probably more wholesome physic for the mind, and conduce better to purge away spleen, melancholy, and ill affections, than is generally imagined. Nay, I will appeal to common observation, whether the same companies are not found more full of good humour and benevolence, after they have been sweetened for two or three hours with entertainments of this kind, than when soured by tragedy or a grave lecture.

But to illustrate all this by another science, in which, perhaps, we shall see the distinction more clearly and plainly; let us examine the works of a comic history painter with those performances which the Italians call Caricatura; where we shall find the true excellence of the former to consist in the exactest copying of nature; insomuch that a judicious eye instantly rejects any thing outré, any liberty which the painter hath taken with the features of that alma mater:—whereas, in the Caricatura, we allow all licence. Its aim is to exhibit monsters, not men; and all distortions and exaggerations whatever are within its proper province.

Now, what Caricatura is in painting, Burlesque is in writing; and in the same manner the comic writer and painter correlate to each other. And here I shall observe, that as in the former the painter seems to have the advantage, so it is in the latter infinitely on the side of the writer: for the monstrous is much easier to paint than to describe, and the ridiculous to describe than paint.

And though, perhaps, the latter species doth not in either science so strongly affect and agitate the muscles as the other; yet it will be owned, I believe, that a more rational and useful pleasure arises to us from it. He who should call the ingenious Hogarth a burlesque painter, would, in my opinion, do him very little honour: for sure it is much easier, much less the subject of admiration, to paint a man with a nose, or any other feature, of a preposterous size, or to expose him in some absurd or monstrous attitude, than to express the affections of men on canvas. It had been thought a vast commendation of a painter, to say his figures seem to breathe; but surely it is a much greater and nobler applause that they appear to think.

But to return.—The Ridiculous only, as I have said before, falls within my province in the present work.—Nor will some explanation of this word be thought impertinent by the reader, if he considers how wonderfully it hath been mistaken, even by writers who have professed it: for to what but such a mistake can we attribute the many attempts to ridicule the blackest villainies, and, what is yet worse, the most dreadful calamities? What could exceed the absurdity of an author, who should write the comedy of Nero with the merry incident of ripping up his mother's belly; or what would give a greater shock to humanity, than an attempt to expose the miseries of poverty and distress to ridicule? And yet, the reader will not want much learning to suggest such instances to himself.

Besides, it may seem remarkable, that Aristotle, who is so fond and free of definitions, hath not thought proper to define the Ridiculous. Indeed, where he tells us it is proper to comedy, he hath remarked that villainy is not its object: but he hath not, as I remember, positively asserted what is. Nor doth the Abbe Bellegarde, who hath written a treatise on this subject, though he shows us many species of it, once trace it to its fountain.

The only source of the true Ridiculous (as it appears to me), is affectation. But though it rises from one spring only, when we consider the infinite streams into which this one branches, we shall presently cease to admire at the copious field it affords to an observer. Now affectation proceeds from one of these two causes; vanity or hypocrisy: for as vanity puts us on affecting false characters, in order to purchase applause; so hypocrisy sets us on an endeavour to avoid censure, by concealing our vices under an appearance of their opposite virtues. And though these two causes are often confounded (for there is some difficulty in distinguishing them), yet, as they proceed from very different motives, so they are as clearly distinct in their operations: for, indeed, the affectation which arises from vanity is nearer to truth than the other; as it hath not that violent repugnancy of nature to struggle with, which that of the hypocrite hath. It may be likewise noted, that affectation doth not imply an absolute negation of those qualities which are affected: and therefore, though when it proceeds from hypocrisy it be nearly allied to deceit, yet when it comes from vanity only, it partakes of the nature of ostentation: for instance, the affectation of liberality in a vain man, differs visibly from the same affectation in the avaricious ; for though the vain man is not what he would appear, or hath not the virtue he affects, to the degree he would be thought to have it ; yet it sits less awkwardly on him than on the avaricious man, who is the very reverse of what he would seem to be.

From the discovery of this affectation arises the Ridiculous—which always strikes the reader with surprise and pleasure ; and that in a higher and stronger degree when the affectation arises from hypocrisy, than when from vanity ; for, to discover any one to be the exact reverse of what he affects, is more surprising, and consequently more ridiculous, than to find him a little deficient in the quality he desires the reputation of. I might observe, that our Ben Jonson, who of all men understood the Ridiculous the best, hath chiefly used the hypocritical affectation.

Now from affectation only, the misfortunes and calamities of life, or the imperfections of nature, may become the objects of ridicule. Surely he hath a very ill framed mind, who can look on ugliness, infirmity, or poverty, as ridiculous in themselves : nor do I believe any man living, who meets a dirty fellow riding through the streets in a cart, is struck with an idea of the Ridiculous from it ; but if he should see the same figure descend from his coach and six, or bolt from his chair with his hat under his arm, he would then begin to laugh, and with justice. In the same manner, were we to enter a poor house, and behold a wretched family shivering with cold, and languishing with hunger, it would not incline us to laughter (at least we must have very diabolical natures if it would) : but should we discover there a grate, instead of coals, adorned with flowers, empty plate or china dishes on the sideboard, or any other affectation of riches and finery either on their persons or in their furniture ; we might then indeed be excused for ridiculing so fantastical an appearance. Much less are natural imperfections the object of derision : but when ugliness aims at the applause of beauty, or lameness endeavours to display agility, it is then that these unfortunate circumstances, which at first moved our compassion, tend only to raise our mirth.

The poet carries this very far ;

None are, for being what they are, in fault,
But for not being what they would be thought.

Where, if the metre would suffer the word Ridiculous to close the first line, the thought would be rather more proper. Great vices are the proper objects of our detestation, smaller faults of our pity : but affectation appears to me the only true source of the Ridiculous.

But perhaps it may be objected to me, that I have against my own rules introduced vices, and of a very black kind, in this work. To which I shall answer, first, that it is very difficult to pursue a series of human actions, and keep clear from them. Secondly, that the vices to be found here, are rather the accidental consequences of some human frailty or foible, than causes habitually existing in the mind. Thirdly, that they are never set forth as the objects of ridicule, but detestation. Fourthly, that they are never the principal figure at that time on the scene; and lastly, they never produce the intended evil."

These are admirable hints: one wonders that the two novelists of our age, who owe much, very much, to Fielding, should have forgotten them, and forgotten likewise the examples furnished by their great master—but then, he was a GREAT NOVELIST, and they are only great sketchers of character, and drawers of humorous caricatures. Fielding's mastership is in nothing more clearly shewn than in the great number of characters introduced in his fictions, and yet each of these characters is pertinent to the tale; each has his own peculiar office, tending to the developement of the denouement: he is always in his place: never forgotten, never killed off before his time;—he is never like the brass nail in the back of the bellows—for ornament. But of which of Dickens' stories can this be said? In not a few of Thackeray's novels can it be declared as the characteristic. In this respect Thackeray's and Dickens' management of their people remind us of Lady Townley,—"O!" cries her ladyship, "Ten thousand guineas, O! the charming sum! what infinite pretty things might a woman of spirit do with ten thousand guineas, O! my conscience, if she were a woman of true spirit—she—she might lose 'em all again." Thus it is that Dickens always, and Thackeray occasionally, act:—they have the characters with the "ten thousand guineas," but like careless, spoiled men of spirit they—"lose 'em all again," after having had the trouble of creating them. This, in our mind, is Dickens' misfortune, not his fault, as his genius is not comprehensive enough to embrace all the continuous incidents forming a novel; but, it is clearly Thackeray's fault, and he is therefore less excusable for not taking up, at once, his position amongst the GREAT NOVELISTS of England.

But have we a GREAT NOVELIST now? Do the latest of Bulwer Lytton's works, The Cartons and My Novel, shew that he, best known, and the most generally praised of all our writers of fiction, is the Laureate of the living English novelists. We think so, but yet to be the chief of our living novelists is not to be a GREAT NOVELIST. Doubtless the two books above named are admirable, superior to the author's usual style; but they owe much to Fielding, much to Smollett, much to Sterne, much to Goethe, yet withal, they owe a vast deal to the genius, the fancy, and the eloquence of, as Thackeray used to call him, the "celebrated literary Barnet."

However, as we are not writing a history of this age's fiction, we shall not pursue this disquisition farther: we may safely affirm, that, although we have no GREAT NOVELIST, yet we possess more novelists of a second rank, and higher in all the qualifications of their craft than any other period could supply since the invention of printing. Mrs. Trollope, James, Mrs. Gore, Julia Kavanagh, Reid, Wilkie Collins, Lever, Kingsley, Whyte, three authors whom Blackwood's Magazine has introduced during the last five years, the authoress of Mary Barton, with a dozen others, any one of whom is equal to a score of the novelists, save of the very first-class, of other times, and then last, certainly not least, we have the author of the book before us.

The Priest's Niece, has unfortunately, a most deceptive title, and one most ill-chosen. It "takes" a Protestant reader, who is disappointed at finding that it has nothing about cloisters, or convents, in the Maria Monk style: Roman Catholics looking at the book, and being alarmed, or prejudiced by the name, will throw it aside, or will read it in an antagonistic spirit; whilst the mere circulating library haunter, who has been so frequently deceived by the titles of books, will think to himself, as he ponders on the name, The Priest's Niece,—

"His gran' aunt was once King of Connaught,
His Mother Viceroy of Tralee,
Priests' Nieces, but sure they're in Heaven,
An' his faylins is nothin' to me."

Yet this work is a good novel: full of incident, of invention, of bright flashes of genius, of descriptive power rarely excelled in these days, and placing before us the fair land of Spain, the varying scenery of Scotland, "the summer isles," the "knots of Paradise," at "the gateways of the day," and Ireland, too, has been sketched by our Author. The dialogue is good, worthy the other portions of the story; and considering the work as a whole, and judging it by the best of our modern novels, it deserves the success it has achieved, by arriving at a second edition, within five months of its publication.

It is not our custom to give extracts from novels, and indeed in this particular instance it would be impossible to do so with justice to the Author, who has that true talent of the genuine novelist, by which he is enabled to ingraft scene upon scene, to involve character with character so intimately, and so closely, that not a chapter can be extracted without injury to the story.

We hope soon again to find a work from the pen of the Author of The Priest's Niece before us, but we hope too, to find it with a less excitable title. A writer, such as this, with ability of the highest order, with invention, quickness of thought, and great power of observation may, and is, bound, to depend on his knowledge of the heart, of life and of the world : the heart, life, and the world are wide enough in their range of thoughts, of manners, and of feelings ; out of such materials then this Author can create forms of beauty, or strength, or passion ; but these creations must be works of time, and formed with the perfection of elaboration. We earnestly hope that neither the request of friends, nor the golden goadings of publishers will induce this writer to damage, or jeopardise a reputation already more than half made ; the pen too, which has thus been graced, should never be envenomed or stained by the recital of a tale hurtful to the feelings of the professors of any religion. The heart is the property of the novelist ; with it, and the world, alone has he to deal, and if from these he cannot form his story he is not a novelist. If the Author of The Priest's Niece will but observe these rules, he will produce fictions worthy his genius, and worthy his reputation ; and though he may never achieve the glory of a GREAT NOVELIST, he will, at all events, reach the reputation, the highest any now living can claim, of a good novelist.

Rumours have been rife and multiform this last autumn and early winter in the various bulletins from the seat of war in the East, and have been as disappointing as they were rife. In the physical world every one has observed the effect of great heats in raising exhalations, and in the moral world analogous causes have as commonly and as certainly been found to produce analogous effects. The fervid excitement into which the public mind was thrown by the occurrences of the 8th of September, has exhaled a cloud of imaginings now taking one shape, now another, but all finally melting into thin air, or to speak more appropriately, ending in smoke!

The victory of the Allies was immediately to be followed up. The Russians, driven from the southern shore of the inlet of Sebastopol, were but pausing for a breathing space, ere continuing their northward flight, and evacuating the Crimea. The generals of France and England were combining and preparing for another "masterly flank-march" that was to turn and render untenable the new position of their discomfited foe. A mighty and motley host of English, French, Turks, and Sardinians was gathering at Eupatoria, soon to march southwards from thence, and place the disheartened and beaten legions of Prince Menschikoff between two fires ! And finally, however it was brought about, those legions were assuredly on the point of throwing down their arms in despair, and surrendering at discretion !

To say that nothing of all this has been realized is but repeating what everybody knows and everybody grumbles at. The "enterprizes of great pith and moment" of which the public mind had conceived such expectations, in its double excitement of gratification at the fall of Sebastopol, and of mortification at the more prominent and effective part in its capture, performed by the French over that of our own gallant but badly generated army, did either become so "sicklied over by the pale cast of thought," as to lose the name of action, or else were never seriously intended. Our valiant enemy has not confessed by word, or shewn by act, that he was discomfited or disheartened. The Russian eagle as it soared into the rent and troubled air, amid the thunders and the lurid war-clouds that proclaimed the fall of southern Sebastopol, screamed but in angry defiance, and winging its majestic way to the impregnable northern shore, settled there menacingly and immoveably, right in the front of its baffled foes. The Allied Generals have pushed forward a reconnaissance here, and hazarded an insignificant foray there ; but have ever been glad to retire quickly within the lines of their hard won and all but barren conquest. The Eupatorian diversion has eventuated in a bootless skirmish or two. The Russian "surrender" has not occurred, nor is it now hoped for, even by the most credulous and dreaming. But there has been a surrender—a surrender not of, but to the Russians, and the gain of the city of Kars, the key of Armenia and Mingrelia, has far out-balanced for them, the loss of half their stronghold of Sebastopol.

The rumours to which we have referred having duly run their course and served their turn, were succeeded by others, totally differing and opposite ; but for the time at least, as empty and as disappointing as their predecessors. Long before the initiatory success, which at the moment that we write is confidently reported to have attended the unexpected movement of Austria in pressing an ultimatum upon her great Northern neighbour, Rumour had it, that due, and formal, and precise, and full, negotiations for Peace, had not only been initiated, but had most favorably progressed, and, in fact, were upon the point of being brought to a satisfactory conclusion. But whether the public mind had wearied of giving credence to plausible reports and stories, or whether they brought their own refutation with them, not only did they not by any means obtain the same amount of general acceptance, but they seemed even to have some effect in quickening the preparations for the Spring-campaign. The Funds did not rise, the newspapers abated not in their hot cry for pressing the new armaments, and urging forward all the preparations of War; and the nature and extent of the new taxes and loans, which should be brought forward for its sustainment, on the meeting of Parliament, engaged general attention and discussion. And thus, the peace-rumours of November and December passed away as vain and as bootless as the predictions of battle and conquest with which we had been dosed in the course of the two months immediately preceding.

Matters have now taken a very different turn and aspect. We have no longer rumours to deal with, but solid facts. Austria has presented her ultimatum to Russia, containing conditions which, according to any honest interpretation, embrace every point of large importance required by the Allies, and this ultimatum enforced by the clearly announced resolution of the Austrian Court, to withdraw its ambassador and prepare for war, in case of rejection, has been reluctantly, but positively accepted by Russia. So far all looks fair, and promises well for peace; and the rapid, and extraordinary rise of the Public Funds in England and in France, and the sudden and total turning of the current of Public Opinion in the Press, from its violent set towards war, into a direction quite as decidedly and unmistakeably pacific, demonstrate that Peace is looked upon as all but certain, and at no very distant date.

It had been our purpose in the present article, (commenced before this most unexpected and promising change in the affairs and prospects of Europe,) to have proceeded, after first making mention, as we have done, of the conflicting rumours with which the public mind has been amused or abused during the Autumn and the first two months of Winter, to discuss, independent of them, a question, the importance of which we considered to be in the then and indeed in the present state of Europe, very little affected by the immediate chances of Peace or War.—We mean the question of the relative strength, resources, and ability of the great leading European Powers; especially those who have been engaged in the mighty Debate in Arms of the last two years. Taking the progress of Peace negotiations to be assured, not only as to the point already attained, but to the uttermost point, namely, that of final ratification and conclusion, we yet do not alter in our view of the subsisting importance of the problem we have just stated, and therefore propose to proceed with our original intention; reserving to ourselves, in the course of this paper, the power and the opportunity according to the tenor and complexion of what duly authenticated news may from time to time arrive, to point, as may be required, the comparisons we are about to institute.

Whatever be the result of the present negotiations, it is impossible that the general state of Europe, so disturbed and agitated to its lowest depths as it has been by the circumstances of this war, coming as they did ere the turbulences of the unhappy years 1848 and 1849 had by any means subsided, can for some—perhaps for several, years, be considered as settled, or otherwise than most precarious; and accordingly everything that can assist in the forming of a reliable judgment on the respective conditions of those who must be the great agents and actors in whatever drama is to be presented on the European stage, must have a deep and powerful interest. In this spirit and with this impression we enter upon the discussion we have indicated before.

It will easily be understood, that whatever may be the facilities for obtaining accurate data bearing upon our subject in so far as the case of Great Britain is concerned, there must be less in the case of France, and very much less in that of Russia. The policy of the French Government is not one of any great degree of communicativeness upon such matters at any time, but especially since the War has become hot; and the same cautious and jealous spirit that has precluded the arising of a French Russell, to paint, in words, the sufferings, the miseries, and the losses of the French Army on the blood-stained and grave-furrowed plateau before Sebastopol, seals up at home with equal vigilance the sources whence information of any proximate accuracy could be obtained as to France's means of continuing the desperate struggle in the East.

Russia is, of course, still more a sealed book; and if by chance a statement appear in any continental organ, that would seem to furnish the desired materials for estimating and comparing her strength, common sense at once suggests that it has been, to use an expressive phrase which the history of Railway stratagies has furnished us with, "cooked" for a purpose and an occasion, and is therefore to be received with all distrust.

Under these circumstances we are driven back, in reference to the two latter Empires, to the accounts and histories that were extant before the War, while Europe was still in profound peace, and dreaming of its being as lasting as profound. We are not, however, absolutely and altogether precluded from making use of some portion of the accounts that ooze out from time to time, where they have circumstances of probability about them, and to a guarded and carefully limited extent we shall proceed so to do, only soliciting the indulgence of the reader, if for the valid reasons before stated, our comparison must necessarily have some imperfections about it.

Having thus premised, we shall proceed at once with our subject in its details, so far as they are procurable and we can verify them, and naturally begin with Great Britain.

Although the mere numerical statement of the troops actually on foot, can of course be considered only as one, and not the most important item in the comparative estimate we are attempting, we yet give it a preference, as being that which is popularly looked upon as the most decisive index of strength, and we propose to take and place in juxta position the proportions voted for England ten years ago, and in the last session, so as incidentally to illustrate the different requirements of a season of Peace, with one of War.

The number of men voted ten years ago in the "Annual Army Estimates" presented to and passed by Parliament for the Financial Year, 1845—46, was 129,677. This force was made up as follows:—114,376 Rank and File, 9,400 Non-Commissioned Officers, Drummers, Trumpeters, &c., and 5,901 Commissioned Officers.

The gross charge for this Force—deducting, however, 29,970 soldiers serving in the East Indies, and who were paid and provided for, by, and at the expense of the East India Company, was £3,535,920. The money charge paid by the East India Company, for the troops serving in their Territories, amounted to £936,906—making altogether an expenditure of £4,472,826 for Cavalry and Infantry in the year mentioned.

The Staff, Military Departments, &c., of the United Kingdom, cost £409,950, in addition to the expenditure mentioned above.

The Royal Engineers, the "Sappers and Miners," Royal Artillery, Royal Horse Artillery, Master-Gunners and Field-Train, which were all at that time under the control and management of the late Board of Ordnance, as a separate Military Establishment distinct from the General Army, cost in the year 1845-46, the sum of £460,000.

Ten years previous, viz.—in the Financial year, 1835-36, the Force of the Line was 29,000 less than in 1845-46. We now come to ten years later, viz.—the year last provided for by Parliament, 1855-56, Commissariat and Barrack Supplies at both periods, cost about £300,000.

The last Army and Ordnance Estimates, viz.—those for the year 1855-56, give the following statements respectively under the various headings before enumerated :—

The total strength of the Army estimated for when the Army Estimates for the service of the year mentioned were laid before the House, by Mr. Frederick Peel, Under Secretary at War, in February last, was 193,595 of all ranks ; exclusive of Artillery, Engineers, and the Troops in India. Of this grand total, 14,950 were to be Foreigners. The charge for the effective Land Force, was estimated to be £7,353,000—for the embodied Militia, £3,813,000, and for the total of effective and non-effective services, £13,721,000—being therefore an excess upon the similar items in 1845-6 of nearly ten millions.

The number of troops in India and their charge—(defrayed as before by the East India Company) stood at pretty much the same as in 1845-46.

The Royal Engineers, Sappers and Miners, Royal Artillery, Royal Horse Artillery, Master Gunners and Field Train, separately estimated for last year, as in 1846, (but by an act of last Session, to be in future provided for in the General Army estimates, and the whole to be under the direct and single control of the Commander in Chief at the Horse Guards, the separate establishment and jurisdiction of the old Board of Ordnance being now done away with,) cost in the financial year just expiring, or more properly were calculated to cost, and had appropriated for them the sum of £1,118,000. The Commissariat and Barrack Supplies, &c., cost still a larger sum, besides the cost of new establishments abroad.

There can be no doubt that the estimates for the current year, will shew a very much increased scale of expenditure, and that there will be a larger requirement of men, as well as of the munitions of War.

The next point to be ascertained in the due course of our subject is, whether these efforts on the part of Great Britain, have brought any great strain as yet upon her resources, and if that be the case, to what extent, and for how long is she likely to be able to endure the further efforts necessary to maintain the War policy to which she has committed herself.

Pursuing the plan already indicated, of taking the most obvious and popular indexes (as so considered) of the ability of the British Empire, we give the following tabular statement from the annual Finance accounts presented to Parliament in the various years set down below—the series beginning with 1792, a year of peace, and going on to embrace and contrast the statements for different periods of the bloody and wasteful war that immediately succeeded. In several Parliamentary Returns, moved for especially within the last seventeen or twenty years, by different members of Parliament, some English or Scotch, and some Irish, to illustrate and bear out their respective opinions on the question, frequently agitated during those years, of the fiscal and financial justice or injustice, as the case may be, with which Ireland has been treated by the Imperial Parliament, the amounts we are about to give as indicating Revenue, or expenditure, are sometimes varied either by addition, or subtraction; but essentially and commonly are the same:—the differences arising merely from the omission in some statements of certain items of no very great importance, yet still sufficient when inserted, as in other cases they are, to raise the general totals. The following then can be depended upon for general accuracy.

Years.	Total Income, both from Taxes & Loans.	Annual Interest paid on Debt.	Total Expenditure in each year.
1792.	£19,258,820.	£9,767,840.	£19,859,130.
year of the } 1793. each War }	£24,723,660.	£9,437,862.	£24,197,100.
1798.	£47,893,870.	£17,585,518.	£51,127,250.
1801.	£61,418,417.	£19,945,630.	£61,536,000.
1805.	£67,748,000.	£22,200,000.	£67,170,000.
1811.	£84,520,600.	£25,000,000.	£83,800,000.
1813.	£108,398,000.	£28,000,000.	£106,000,000.

The Average Annual Income of the British Empire in the 40 years since the war, up to 1855, was £55,000,000, and the average expenditure less by about £800,000 annually. Of course, as in the case of all averages, the statements for individual years comprised in the period mentioned are sometimes much below the amount of fifty-five millions, as in 1832, when the total sum raised for the annual service of the country was only forty-six millions, and in 1835, when it had further declined a million sterling; and sometimes above it, as in 1823, when fifty-eight millions were raised; and in a succeeding year when sixty millions appear in the account of Total Income; but it will be found that the general average is as we have given it above.

The amount of £108,398,000 raised for the service of the year 1813, will appear vast, and yet it is really not the full measure of the financial exertion of that year. The "Income," both from taxes and loans, that we have set down, not only for that year, but for all others mentioned in the preceding table, is only what was actually, "paid into the Exchequer" in those years, and does not include that other item, familiar to those who have studied the Public accounts, which is, or rather was, (for the practice is now abrogated), designated in those accounts annually, as "Payments out of the Income in its Progress to the Exchequer."

Strange as it may appear to the uninitiated, a sum of money in the most piping times of peace and retrenchment never less than six or seven millions, and in time of war often exceeding twelve millions, was annually subtracted from the taxation receipts of the Empire, and disposed of without consulting, or obtaining the consent (save by silence), of the Imperial Parliament, which was not allowed to deal with the Imperial Income till the sum in question had been deducted and paid away, and the remainder after that deduction, formally "paid into the Exchequer." The purposes to which the large sums so deducted were applied, were but very generally and superficially stated, as "Drawbacks, Repayments, Allowances, &c." charges of collection—other payments beyond the charges of collection, &c. &c." and no specification, or detailed statement whatever of this expenditure was vouchsafed to the Representatives of the People, the appointed "Guardians of the Public Money,"

One of the many, and nearly the last, of the most valuable public services rendered during his long life of arduous, persevering, and often and often most discouraging and trying Parliamentary labour, by the late Joseph Hume, was his having at length woke up the House of Commons to the absurdity and monstrosity of such a system, and inducing it to vindicate its own rights and to insist on being enabled to discharge fully its duty to the Nation, by having the system exploded and utterly done away with, and every pound of the Imperial Income brought to account, and its disposition and allocation clearly, fully and particularly detailed. This, however, was only finally accomplished in the Session of 1854, and up to that year, from time immemorial, the custom had been to make the deductions we have stated from the Public Income "in its progress to the Exchequer," and to spend the sums so taken, according as the Government of the day saw fit, without special account or appeal.

In this way something about twelve millions were, in the latter years of the French war, annually, we may say, abstracted, and do not appear in the amounts of Income we have given. If we add this sum to the Income in our table for the year 1813, we find of course that 120 millions, and not merely 108 millions, really represent the financial exertion of the Empire in that year.

Now our Income for the year 1855-6 was £86,400,000, that is to say, less by some 29 millions than we contrived to raise towards the end of a most costly and exhausting war, which had lasted with but a brief and insignificant intermission full 20 years, and if these countries were capable of such an effort at that time under the circumstances alluded to, is it not evident that at the present time, after nearly 40 years of peace and prosperity, with a population increased nearly four-fold, and resources of every kind increased in a very far greater, and in truly an astonishing ratio, they will be found capable of exertions very greatly exceeding those of 1813—the year of the largest money levy during the old war?

We shall have to return to this part of our subject again, for the purpose of supplying materials to enable our readers to form something of an estimate for themselves of the actual extent of the resources of the British Empire, but for the moment we must turn to the other great powers engaged in the present struggle, and endeavor to make a statement for them, as similar in its items to that we have already given for Great Britain, as the greater difficulty we have had in making researches for the purpose, and the variance of form and description, in the public accounts of these countries will permit.

But we are here tempted to interrupt the due course of our paper in order to note down ere they escape us for ever, the differing opinions that have been ventilated and propagated abroad upon the comparative ability to maintain and carry on the war successfully, and the state and prospects respectively, of the three great Belligerent Powers. If the peace which is about to be put in course of negotiation, should happily be accomplished, it will not be without some amusement that we shall look back to these evidences of the efforts made by partizans at both sides to magnify matters in the eyes of their opponents, to explain away or dissemble their own losses, and to embellish and exaggerate their advantages. If on the contrary we are doomed to a continuation of this most bloody and wasting war, every expression of foreign opinion, or evidence of feelings in the public mind abroad, for or against us, is worthy of attention.

The most singular of these "squibs" as they would be called in Election-parlance, is one apparently written to order and carefully copied from the American Journals in which it first appeared, into the pro-Russian organs of our own continent. It is unfortunately not to be denied that our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic have, on the whole, given signs rather of sympathy with Russia than with the allies in the present conflict. Whether it result from commercial jealousy of England—sympathy with a slave-holding state, or a coming true of the old proverb, that extremes—even the extremes of Republicanism and despotic monarchy,—ever tend to meet, the fact of a leaping of America towards the cause of Russia is established not merely by the detected transmission of arms, munitions of war, and machinery for war-steamers, from American to Russian ports, but by the tone of the American Press in the majority of cases, and the demonstrations of her meetings and mobs.

The "squib" we speak of is thus set forth in the American papers.

"Colonel Tal. P. Shaffner, direct from Russia, where he has been travelling for the last six months. While there he travelled over 3000 miles, and visited Cronstadt, Nicolaieff, Sweaborg, and many other most important fortresses. He was all through the northern, central, and southern provinces, and during his travels was in frequent intercourse with the nobility, as well as with the lower classes. He does not consider himself justified as a man of honor, or without compromising his character with the Russian government, to make known the numerical strength of the army, the strength of the forts, and the financial resources of the country; but, without going into specific details, he has given us (New York Herald) sufficient to enable us to form a pretty accurate estimate of their means and resources.

So far from the nobility being tired of the war, on account of the levies made on them for men, they are among its most strenuous supporters, and have signified, again and again, their willingness to sacrifice all their wealth before they consent to yield one inch! * * * Nothing can exceed their devotedness to second the wishes of the Czar, or their indignation at the outrages on the churches at Kertch, &c., by the allied troops. * * * The general feeling, in which the serfs participate, is one of confidence in the ultimate triumph of their country.

Colonel Shaffner says there is no reliance to be placed on the reports of compulsion being necessary to recruit the army—he never heard of a single case. The Russian enters the ranks cheerfully at the command of the Czar, whom he regards as the vicegerent of the deity on earth. If it were left to the free will of the serfs, hundreds of thousands would flock to his standard. The entire force of the Russian army in the Crimea in October last was 250,000. The route from Perekop to Sebastopol is admirably defended by forts, and Perekop itself is so strongly fortified that it would employ the whole of the allied army to reduce it. The means of transport have not been cut off. The grain destroyed in the Sea of Azov by the British and French expedition, was not the property of the Russian government, but of Greek merchants who asked too exorbitant a price. The Russian army never received its supplies from thence, but from Perekop, and has never suffered want of provisions or stores. The days they were on reduced rations (two days in each week) were days of abstinence enjoined by their Church! Provisions are conveyed from the Smolensk and Saratoff countries to the Crimea in waggons, which return loaded with salt. Before the war they went empty, but now are laden both ways, and make double their former profit.

• • • The earthen fortifications (at Sebastopol) had become friable from dry weather, and the Russian cannon were worn out and daily bursting with loss of life. Under these circumstances Gortschakoff wrote to the Emperor, and received his commands to abandon the South side whenever in his judgment the time had arrived. The trophies found by the Allies were the used-up cannon, and piles of their own balls fired into the place, which did not fit the Russian guns. They also found powder, but it was damp powder that would not explode.

The fortifications of Cronstadt have been largely increased. Last year it was fortified on one side alone, but now it is surrounded with forts of iron and stone, and new guns of greater calibre and range have replaced the old. There will next summer be a perfect line of fortifications across the gulf, besides an enormous number of gunboats. This does not look as if the Russian government were straitened for money. • • • Nicolaieff is impregnable! The bombardment of Sveaborg cost the Allies 25,000,000 dollars, and only 150,000 dollars to Russia. The Allies only succeeded in burning a number of old Swedish workshops, which the Russians themselves had intended to remove"!

The foregoing tirade would be simply ludicrous, and read like one of the amazing and mirth-provoking bontades of some Kentucky "half-horse-half-alligator," or "reg'lar down-east Johnny-cake" of Sam Slick's recording, if we did not know that it has been accepted as perfectly reliable, and we regret to add, as very welcome news, by a very large portion of the American community. The previous Munchausenism of the momentarily celebrated "Doctor Da Vega" were eagerly caught up and believed, until the unlucky discovery so maliciously proclaimed by the English agents at Constantinople, that the veracious Doctor had penned his "Sebastopol experiences" not in the leaguered city itself amidst the storm and shock of war, but in all the comforts and quietness of the European quarter in the city of the Crescent. No such discovery, however, has as yet invalidated the pretentious testimony of the gallant Colonel Tal. P. Shaffner, (we wish we could give our readers his name in full,) and accordingly he has met with general credence as well as general applause.

Our next extract is from a pro-Russian journal of the European Continent, the "Abeille du Nord," published in Belgium. It is more serious in its tone and general character, though not more so in its tendency and the state of feeling it indicates. Thus it is worded:—

"No joy has been expressed at the so called victory by the Western Powers; neither by the English, who were completely beaten, as they have been in every action since the commencement of the war; nor by the French, who are now in a condition to quote and apply to themselves the well known words of Pyrrhus.

The sole trophies of England and France are black crape and mourning dresses. The armies of both fought without any reason, and solely by order of their respective sovereigns, who give them no protection or consolation under their misfortunes, by which they are reduced to the very verge of despair! While Russia, on the other hand, attacked without any cause, fought gallantly for honor and self preservation. Such a difference in the moral element of the two contending parties cannot fail to terminate eventually in favor of the Russian arms; which were only at a momentary disadvantage, because the Russian army had not sufficient railroads, nor guns of such extreme range as those of the enemy.

At first it was supposed in the West that by obtaining possession of Sebastopol, that is, of its south side, that they had gained everything, and they are now the more surprised to find out their error, and to see that the war has in reality only just commenced—a war which cannot possibly reflect any glory upon the governments which brought it on, and, in fine, a war which cannot but terminate in their total prostration!"

The article from which the foregoing quotation is made concludes by saying, that the French loans "were only successful by means of the Jews"—that "the alliance between Great Britain and the French Empire may be broken up in a day, by any reverse"—that "the nations of Europe momentarily deceived and estranged, are rapidly resuming their former sympathies with Russia, &c., &c."—"the army of Prince Gortschakoff is unassailable in his new position and admirably circumstanced for offensive operations. The Allies have landed on spots of no real importance," and finally, "whatever vessels of war they may contrive to bring against the fortresses of Russia in the approaching campaign, will be received and satisfactorily disposed of by the Russian gunboats"! !

The reader will no doubt have done justice of himself to the unhesitating and occasionally self-contradictory assertions (as in the two paragraphs about the nobility and serfs of Russia, in which, after telling us, the former would sacrifice their whole wealth to support the war, and immediately afterwards says, their serfs would volunteer, if permitted.) of the veracious Colonel Tal. P. Shaffner, and to those equally unhesitating but more consistent passages, which we have copied from the "Abeille du Nord." But it is only fair to place before him also what is said on the other side of the question, amongst our European neighbours, and allow him to form his judgment upon that.

In the Augsburg Gazette of a few weeks ago, there appeared the following brief and to this hour uncontradicted statement respecting the endeavours of Russia to fill up again in preparation for the Spring Campaign, the terrible gaps made in her armies by the sword and by the ravages of pestilence.

"The present levy is the eighth within the last twenty months. On the 10th of February, 1854, 9 men in the 1,000 were conscribed in the western provinces; and, on the 9th of May, 9 men in the 1,000 in the eastern provinces of Russia. On the 7th of September 10 men in the 1,000 were raised in her western provinces; and, on the 13th of December, the same number in the eastern provinces; thus making, in the single year 1854, 19 men in the 1,000 raised in each of those divisions of her empire.

In the manifesto of the month of February (10th of that month), 1855, it was ordered that a militia, to be composed of 23 men out of every 1,000, should be formed in 18 governments. The 'Ukases' of May the 31st, August the 12th, and October the 7th, ordained that a militia should be raised at the rate of 23 men per 1,000 in the remaining governments, although a levy of 12 men per 1,000 for the standing army had been decreed on the 6th of May. On the 15th of October in this year another 'Ukase' ordered that 10 men per 1,000 should be levied in all the governments excepting seven, 'as a consequence of the losses which our armies have suffered in the field during the present year, and because we consider it absolutely necessary to have them complete, in order that they may be able to resist the future enterprises of the enemy.'

The next and last of these extracts which we shall give, presents a fearful picture of national and individual suffering, and while its details have really never been controverted seriously, they seem about to receive a positive confirmation from Russian sources of intelligence, now that the strengthening hope of peace has given a little more freedom to tongue and pen.

"The Chamber of Public Relief of St. Petersburg has been obliged to sell by auction the property on which it had made advances, but which it was impossible for the borrowers to pay when the moment arrived; and the number of insolvent debtors increases daily. The population itself suffers from this state of things. A census has been taken of the male population, and, though four years have passed since the last, yet the numbers remain still the same. On certain points of the empire it is less than in 1851, owing, doubtless, to the numerous levies since then. It is not the loss on the field of battle which is the only cause of this decrease; the general health of the army has much to do with it, and the last report of General Paniutin on the mortality among the troops is actually frightful. These unhappy wretches are decimated by epidemic diseases which assume every sort of character.

For several years past the Asiatic Cholera has not ceased for a single day in and about the city of St. Petersburg. The number of cases may vary, but the malady never disappears. It is not in Russia alone that it exists. It rages in Finland, in the Baltic provinces, in Poland, in the Crimea, in the Caucasus, and wheresoever Russian troops happen to be assembled in numbers, Asiatic Cholera is sure to be in the midst of them.

One fact which is now entirely beyond dispute, and which has of late particularly attracted attention is, that the female population exceeds the male population in proportions far greater than in any other European country; and the great difference between them is now more remarkable than ever.

Whatever be the sacrifices made by the Allied Powers in carrying on the war, they will never be comparable to those of Russia. She has now eight armies on foot;—the 1st. of Finland, under General Berg; the 2nd. of St. Peterburg, under General Rudiger; the 3rd. of the Baltic, under General Sievers; the 4th of Poland, under General Sonnararakoff; the 5th of the centre, under General Paniutin; the 6th. also of the centre, under General Laders; the 7th. of the Crimea, under General Gortschakoff; and the 8th. of the Caucasus under General Mouravieff. Russia must possess great vitality to meet so many claims; but these violent efforts must produce exhaustion, and that exhaustion her fall.

It would be difficult to give an exact notion of the misery which prevails in several provinces of the empire, and particularly in Poland. I have just traversed the whole southern part of Volhynia; and I have found everywhere the same evils. The most ordinary articles of consumption are so dear that the peasants are deprived of a portion of what is most necessary, and those who can afford to purchase arrive in crowds to empty markets; from which the greatest part return as empty as they came. The harvest has not, however, been bad. Indeed it may be said that we have had an average year, but the corn is taken off for the government, and sent to the South to form immense magazines, which are destined to become the prey of flames and are consequently lost to every one. In certain provinces the grain intended for seed has failed, and I can declare, without fear of contradiction, that, at the very least, one-fourth of the arable land will remain out of cultivation for the want both of seed and of hands.

The peasants are, of course, not the only class that suffer from this state of things. The nobles—even the very richest amongst them—whose fortunes consist of corn, see their revenues reduced to proportions which for most of them the continuance of the war will change into absolute ruin. All classes of industry are in a state of prostration, the national activity is paralysed, and commerce has suffered irreparable evil. Distilleries are the only establishments that continue to be fully at work. As the Russian government supplies the national enthusiasm of its soldiers with the excitement of intoxication, spirituous liquors are made in enormous quantities for the Crimea and Bessarabia, in order to heat up the courage of the troops. All the grain that was ordinarily employed by manufacturers is taken away for consumption, and increases the general misery.

We had counted on the potatoe crop, which at first presented a favorable aspect; but the blight is found to have made terrible ravages, and fully one-third of the whole produce is affected by it.

To these evils is to be added that of the levies, if we can call by that name the brutal press system which in a few hours makes a soldier of a quiet peasant, and hurries him off from his family without the remotest hope of their ever again beholding him dead or alive. The peasants make the most desperate efforts to escape from the recruiting parties, and I could quote to you thousands of instances of the perseverance and audacity displayed in flying from them."

All feeling of exultation in connection with the war passes out of the heart, on reading details like the foregoing, none of which is there any reason for believing to be exaggerated. In respect of the mortality among the troops, we have to some degree a test of the likelihood of the statement from the fact well known and ascertained as to the losses of the Austrian Army last year in Galicia, when without a blow struck, a shot fired, or any of the accidents of war—it being merely an army of precaution and observation, with of course no enemy at any side and all its communications uninterrupted, no less than 30,000 are positively known and declared to have perished!

Turning back from this digression (which we trust has not been altogether without interest, and will be found to have much more in a little time hence, when in the calmness of the peaceful times which there is good hope are approaching, we recall to memory the varied hopes, feelings, emotions and incidents that marked the bye-gone struggle in its turbid course,) we come to the promised estimate of the military force of France, as the next to be considered after our own country.

The establishment of the French army ten years ago, stood as follows, viz :—

One hundred Regiments of Infantry of the line, each Regiment having three Battalions, and each Battalion seven companies—differing from the practice in the British Army, where the number of companies is generally even. Ten Battalions of Chasseurs, each Battalion having eight companies. One Regiment of Zouaves, of three Battalions and nine companies—three battalions of Light Infantry of Africa, a Foreign Legion serving in Algeria, and twelve condemned Companies for Military Criminals—making in all about 210,800 Infantry. Fifty-four Regiments of Cavalry of various descriptions, inclusive of ten Cuirassier Regiments and four Regiments of African Chasseurs à Cheval, making a cavalry total of 58,290. Artillery 29,624—Engineers and Artificers, including Sappers and Miners, 8,400 and 6,593 baggage-train. The whole effective force of France was estimated for the year 1845, to be about 342,000, costing £11,836,400, but for the service of the year 1846, there was an increase of 100,000, of which two-fifths were native troops raised in Algeria.

The establishment for the year just elapsed was as follows, according to the annual report of the Bureau de la Guerre.

One-hundred-and-two Regiments of the line, each having three Battalions. Twenty Battalions of Chasseurs à pied, being exactly double the force ten years ago on foot. Three Regiments of Zouaves of three Battalions each,—three Battalions of African Light Infantry—nine companies of “Fusiliers de discipline”—three companies of Pioneers—four Regiments or the Foreign Legion having four battalions each. One Battalion of Foreign Rifles, seven Battalions of Algerian sharp-shooters. Six companies of veterans—making a force of about 260,000 infantry.

Sixty-two Regiments of Cavalry of various descriptions, making a total of about 67,000 men. Artillery 35,000, Engineers and Artificers including Sappers and Miners 16,500, and 10,000 baggage-train,—making a grand total of 390,000 men, exclusive as in the former case of twenty-six Legions of Gendarmerie and of Colonial Corps.

But in addition to this large augmentation of her ordinary force, France has had on foot during the last year her "Garde Impériale," which is in fact a separate little army in itself thoroughly organized and complete as such in all its departments and in its organization.

It consisted in the last year of two Divisions of Infantry, one division of Cavalry, a Regiment of Horse Artillery and a Regiment of Foot Artillery,—two companies of Engineers, and a baggage train composed of a squadron of three troops or companies.

In the first division of "Infanterie de la Garde" there were two Brigades and sixteen Battalions. In the second, also two Brigades, but with seventeen Battalions. The Cavalry division was in three Brigades, numbering altogether thirty-seven squadrons. Each of the Artillery corps had one battalion with eighteen Batteries between them. The whole number of men was over 40,000, and at this moment two additional regiments of Infantry each of three Battalions are about to be formed from the Line Regiments most distinguished in the capture of Southern Sebastopol.

The charge of the French army for the year 1855-6, was £16,000,000 in round numbers. This includes the cost of the newly raised Garde Impériale.

We have found it impossible to fashion into a statement similar to that already given for Great Britain, the materials that we have for estimating the financial ability of France; and must therefore only give them in the comparatively undigested and unarranged form that we possess them ourselves.

The average of the Revenue of France ten years ago was about forty-two millions sterling—of which her direct taxes produced twenty-four millions, and her indirect taxation seventeen—the balance being made up by several casual items.

The average expenditure at the same period, exceeded the revenue by a few hundred thousand pounds.

Of this expenditure £9,770,000 was for the interest of the public debt, funded and floating annuities and sinking fund.

The customs duties produced at the period mentioned, the sum of 120,000,000 francs, or £4,800,000. From the recent trade tables of France, published by authority, we find the following as the amount of receipt on those duties in the last three years, viz.—

1853. 141,607,552 francs, or £5,664,802

There can be no doubt at all that the material prosperity of France has received a very considerable, nay a very extraordinary impulse under her present government. The ratio of increase in her demand for articles of primary consequence for nourishment and manufactures, such as live and dead meat, sugar, coffee, wines, brandy, &c., under the first head, and coals, iron, lead, zinc, &c., under the second, illustrates and incontestably demonstrates this. The following is the authenticated official statement as regard these articles, a comparison of the last three years.

The larger proportion of the “coals,” viz. twenty-five millions out of the 40 millions of metrical quintals mentioned in the foregoing table, were imported from Belgium, and the remainder from England. The increase throughout shewn, indicates, as we have before remarked, a considerable advance in prosperity; and there is fair ground for concluding that the largely extended consumption of luxuries and demand for raw materials, has legitimately and naturally resulted from the increased and increasing production of manufactures.

Meantime her exports also manifest a considerable increase, as will be seen by the subjoined table. It is to be remembered in reading it, that a small increase in the number of metrical quintals on the articles of books, silks and merinoes exported, implies a very considerable increase in value. The order of the years in this table will be seen to be inverted.

Not to weary the reader with too many statistics in detail, we shall not give the particular statements for each year of the tonnage, both foreign and domestic, employed in the French trade in each. The results shew, that between 1853 and 1855 the aggregate tonnage so employed, increased more than sixteen per cent., and the tonnage, exclusively French, increased seventeen per cent.

We cannot but think that the reader is now in possession of sufficient materials to enable him to estimate the advance that France is making in all that constitutes the material prosperity and strength of a country; and when it is recollected that the years taken in those tables have been years of war, (for although hostilities were not actually declared in 1853, a very large proportion of their cost was incurred in preparing for war, then known to be imminent), and that during the last year especially, France has made such prodigious and prodigal efforts to carry out her part in the tremendous struggle in the East, we cannot but conclude, not only that her progress has been wonderful, but that it proceeds from an inherent vitality and soundness of enterprize and successful industry almost unexampled, and certainly not what would have been dreamed of for her but a few short years ago; and furthermore of course it is plain that she is in even a better condition for war in this the third year, after all the sacrifices and losses of the preceding, than she was before its commencement.

The total value of French imports from Russia in 1853, was sixty-seven millions of francs, and that of her exports to the same country, sixteen millions of francs—respectively in English money £2,680,000 and £640,000.

It may be remarked that we have said nothing of the naval efforts and capabilities of France and England respectively, We are unable to give a statement as to the former country, not having succeeded in obtaining the necessary data. The naval efforts of Great Britain for the year 1855-56 are represented by the sum of £19, 014,700.

Coming now to Russia, we find the following. In Fonblanque's Statistical Tables, published by the Board of Trade, her total exports of all kinds are set down on a comparison of the year 1842 with 1851, as in value £13,300,000 and £15,075,000, respectively, and the value of her imports in those years as £13,400,000 and £16,321,000 respectively. Neither the actual amounts nor the ratio of increase betoken any very formidable accumulation of resources during those years of profound peace and uninterrupted opportunity of extending her commercial operations; and the last two years of war have utterly annihilated for the present at least her sea-borne commerce. The overland trade which she has driven through the connivance of Prussia must have been but scantily profitable, owing to the enormous expenses of transit, and certainly cannot by any means whatever, compensate to her for the loss of the freedom of her trade on the comparatively inexpensive "highway of nations," the ocean.

The whole Revenue of Russia ten years ago, was under fifteen millions sterling, as paid into her Treasury. What amount was lost on the way to it is a question for the curious in the history of official peculation; but the sum realised was about what we state. The latest account of her Revenue we have been able to make out is for the year 1850, when there had been an increase of about two millions and a-half sterling. This sum is also stated clear of the peculations so flagrantly rife at all periods of her financial history.

The Army of Russia previous to the war was generally reputed to exceed considerably six hundred thousand men. But this is a statement liable to suspicion upon several grounds. In the first place it was always the policy of the Russian Government to magnify its resources in the eyes of foreign powers, by exaggerated statements upon all points connected with them. In the next place, there were frontier and colonized regiments, which were more settlers than soldiers, besides irregular troops of the very lowest and least effective degree of organisation. In the third place, multitudes of men figured in the papers returned from officials in distant provinces, with no existence save on paper; the funds for them being however duly drawn and made away with. Finally, no inconsiderable proportion of men enrolled and regimented as soldiers, were in fact only employed as labourers on public works, and others were veterans past their efficiency.

Without attempting the impossible task of estimating these deductions, we give the nominal strength of the different Armies, as about 470,000 Infantry, 90,000 Cavalry, including Irregulars; and the remainder in Artillery, Engineers, Artificers, &c., &c.

The population of Russia is estimated at about fifty-seven millions;—that of France thirty-five millions,—and that of Great Britain and Ireland, twenty-six millions. But in point of density, and to use an awkward but expressive word, in point of availability of their population for warlike and commercial purposes, both France and England have very far the advantage of their great antagonist.

An article in the number that has just appeared of the Westminster Review gives additional particulars of great value to our subject, and like the generality of articles in that Review is doubtless carefully compiled and ably written. But we must refer the reader to itself, if he desire to be acquainted with its contents; as we have purposely confined ourselves to a most cursory perusal of it; being desirous not to incur either the charge of having made use of its labours should our statements correspond, nor in case they be found to differ, the ungracious labour of quarrelling with statements, no doubt the fruit of considerable research on the part of the Reviewer. For what ourselves advanced we have, whether in general matters, or in particulars, amply sufficient justification and authority.

Just as we are writing these lines a parliamentary paper of considerable interest has issued from the official press and got into the hands of the public. It gives the statement of revenue and expenditure of the United Kingdom down to the 31st day of December, 1855, including the balances in the Exchequer upon that day. The details cannot but be of general interest.

It will be seen that there is an apparent deficiency in the Income to cover the Expenditure, the former being sixty-three millions, and the latter eighty-four millions; leaving twenty-one millions unprovided for by the produce of taxation. But those twenty-one millions were met by the proceeds of the loans raised by direct borrowing, and the issue of Exchequer bills and bonds—sixteen millions of the amount being derived from a fresh creation of consols; and the rest being raised on Exchequer Securities, as just mentioned; and for which the permission of Parliament was obtained in the last month of the session, and to an extent exceeding what has been required, viz., five millions (in addition to the sixteen millions consols,) whereas the government were empowered to issue Exchequer bills to the extent of seven millions. But we must not be betrayed into too much detail. Suffice it that nothing can be more evident than the fact, that the resources of the United Kingdom have by no means been strained by all the enormous expenditure of the war.

The imports of the United Kingdom in the year just expired, were of the value of $152,591,513, and the exports of the value of £97,298,900. The united exports and imports of France for the year 1854, which is the latest we have been able to procure a specification for, were of the value of £140,000,000, being an increase of from two to three millions upon the return for the preceding year, 1853.

Regarding the subject of Russia and her resources, we have to observe, that a singularly fallacious argument has been occasionally urged by alarmists among our public writers and speakers, to the effect that she has not as yet put forth her real strength, nor by any means strained her finances, inasmuch as on a calculation of the proportion between her taxation and the number of her population, she pays annually a far less sum per head of that population than any other country in Europe, and in particular infinitely less than France or England. Thus it is computed, that the whole of the taxation of all kinds borne by the Russians does not amount, per individual, to more than seven or eight shillings a-head. Whereas, it is said, Austria pays in the proportion of thirteen shillings per head—Sardinia sixteen shillings and upwards, Prussia nearly twenty shillings, France no less than forty-five shillings, and England at the rate, exclusive of her enormous local taxation of every kind, of fifty-three shillings per head.

Instead of this being an argument for supposing that Russia has great strength in reserve, it is in truth and effect, an argument the other way, and simply demonstrates inability to bear further taxation, or to consume a larger proportion of taxed articles. The fact, that a tradesman on weekly wages consumes but little wine, if he ever taste it, while a gentleman of good means has a heavy account with the wine merchant, is not a proof that the tradesman is richer, but of course, that he is very much poorer than his gentleman neighbour. The £14 or £15 income tax paid by a small annuitant is not, when contrasted with the £400 or £500 paid by the man of large annual revenues, an evidence of more abundant resources in the former than in the latter, but very directly the contrary. But the fallacy exists not only in reference to a comparison between states—it prevents a real estimate being formed even of a particular state, as in every country there must be, while there are everywhere poor classes as well as rich classes, an inequality of the produce of taxation per head; some individuals in effect paying ten, twenty, fifty shillings or upwards of taxation, while others in effect pay but five or ten.

Not wasting any more time with so valueless and substanceless an argument, we proceed to notice a few statistics, useful to our subject, bearing upon the condition and ability of other European Countries besides those of which we have been already treating.

Prussia, including her Polish and Rhenish provinces, is estimated to have a population of about nineteen millions, or a little upwards. Her annual Revenue may be taken to be twelve millions; and her Army at present numbers some 135,000 men. This is the Line, besides which there are two large corps de reserve, answering in some degree to what was known in the last War, as the "Regular Militia," and the "Local Militia," of these countries. The first of these reserves is always on foot, and the period of compulsory service in it, (compulsory upon all classes, as in the French conscription, with something of similar exceptions,) is about three years. This reserve is called the "Land-wehr," and is divided into two "bans," or corps, the second of which is only occasionally called out. The first reserve supplies nearly 240,000 men, and the second, including the levy en masse, is supposed to hold in readiness in case of invasion an additional force of 200,000.

The importance of Prussia as one of the "Great Powers" of Europe is a good deal factitious, her Empire being made up of very incongruous materials, brought together by the genius of Frederic, and greatly maintained since by the jealousy amongst themselves of the other "Great Powers," and the anxiety of England to sustain what is called the "Protestant interest" in their councils: although her people generally are well to do, yet she is not believed to be capable of any very extended financial exertion; and certainly was enabled in the last war to accomplish what she did, only by means of extensive loans and supplies from England.

Sardinia, our active little ally, has a population of five millions, and a yearly revenue, including the present heavy war-taxation, of about £5,250,000. She has already received a considerable loan from England to enable her to furnish forth her contingent to the Eastern struggle; and by the recent debates in the Sardinian Parliament, it appears that she is under the necessity of immediately contracting another engagement of the same kind. Her army on its present war-footing, amounts to about 155,000 men of whom perhaps 70,000 are available for active service, or were so previous to the losses of her Crimean expedition. It is much to be feared that Sardinia has seriously over-tasked her strength by the part she has taken; and the hope which her government now all but openly confesses to have entertained, when committing the country actively to the War, namely,—that of profiting in territorial acquisition in Northern Italy, on the re-constitution of Europe after the apparently inevitable contingency of a general war, is destroyed by the near prospect of peace. Discontent and dangerous internal dissensions and perhaps revolutionary movements are beginning to be anticipated; especially when the inevitable increase of taxes this year shall come to be felt; and the gloomy prospect is still further deepened by the losses which the Army—the only support of order and authority in the troublous times immediately succeeding the battle of Novara in 1849,—has sustained, and the certainty of the absence for yet several months to come, of that portion of it which has been engaged in the Crimea.

In the Times of the 9th February, we find the following exposition (by authority, as is pretty plainly intimated) of the views and sentiments of the Sardinian ruling classes upon what to us at least, if not to them, are the brightening prospects of peace.

“On the first invitation from the Western Powers, the Government of Sardinia willingly and heartily agreed to put on foot such a force as her limited territory and crippled finance would permit; but as she, more than any other Power in the alliance, had an immediate interest in the amelioration of the state of the people of Italy, it was not unnatural that both her Government and the country herself should hope that their promptitude in aiding in this distant war would ensure them friends in the settlement of disputes nearer home. . . . It was indeed most honourable to the Sardinian Parliament that on that occasion it discussed the proposed treaty and disposed of it, more as a question of Italian than of Piedmontese policy; for had the old leaven of municipalism been allowed to predominate, a small kingdom of five millions only of inhabitants, with a heavy debt, might have been well content to enjoy her own free institutions unobtrusively, and left the great powers to undertake distant contests on the confines of Europe. It was undoubtedly, therefore, with a hope—a hope openly expressed and recognized—of gaining friends to the emancipation of Italy, that Sardinia agreed to send a force to the Crimea; and it is because the course of events hitherto, so far from giving promise of such a consummation should peace be made at present, has tended rather to confirm foreign rule in the Peninsula, that the termination of hostilities is not looked forward to with pleasure. In fact the Sardinians feel much as one who has made great exertions to bail a friend, and after paying half the sum, is told his friend must remain in limbo!”

The communication from which we have abbreviated the foregoing quotation, goes on to speak with fully equal distinctness of the dangers to which we have before alluded, of popular discontents in Sardinia and possible republican movements. Undoubtedly it is a most serious consideration for the Sardinians and not without a considerable deal of interest for the European States; as once the flames of Revolution are re-lighted, no one can say where the conflagration will stop. Their wide wasting ravages in 1848 cannot easily be forgotten. Still the putting an end to the present War cannot be postponed for the avoidance of a merely contingent danger; which after all may not occur, or if it do occur, can in all probability be restrained within something like bounds by the large military force which the great powers at least must for sometime to come keep up, in order to preserve their due weight in the re-arrangements of Europe that must follow from the general result of the struggle now about to be concluded.

We have taken no account of Turkey in our summary estimate of the ability of the various states most interested in the Eastern War. As an effective participator in it she has nearly disappeared. Her revenues are plundered and exhausted, the flower of her troops have either perished miserably in the swamps and pestifential filth about Balaklava harbour, or thanks to the unaccountable and most extraordinary apathy of our diplomatists and generals in the East, have, after a most gallant display of valour and an even more admirable exhibition of fortitude and patient endurance of cruel privation, become prisoners to the Russians. In fact, instead of endeavouring to estimate what Turkey can, or could do, now, or at any coming emergency of Europe, the real question and one of tremendous and very dangerous difficulty is, what is to be done with her!

The French have no less than forty-five thousand men echeloned along the banks of the Bosphorus, but in easy propinquity to Constantinople, besides their large expeditionary Army in the Crimea, an army nearly double our effective force there. We have but a few thousand soldiers in and about the city mentioned, with the single advantage of holding one fort, not large in itself but advantageously placed, and with heavy guns in position. The question of the future arrangements for Turkey has to be discussed with these "good lookers-on," as Lord Deputy Strafford in Elizabeth's reign said of the troops with which he overawed judges and juries in the inquisitions held at Athlone into the tenures of Irish Estates. Like to the ancient proprietors of the latter, the Turks themselves will be permitted little interference in or protest against, the decisions that are to affect their condition and fortunes; unless—what to judge from the accounts that are gradually getting strength of the increasing bitterness of feeling between the armies of the two protecting Powers, the latter should come to a quarrel between themselves.

Be the result of the Peace Negotiations now pending what it may, be the discouraging and gloomy predictions of some parties realized, or let events of a more cheering and favourable aspect ensue,—be the relative strength and extent of resources of the great powers of Europe, especially of those which have participated in the Eastern struggle estimated encouragingly for our interests or otherwise, there is one thing most earnestly to be hoped for, and clamoured for, and laboured for by every friend to the strength, honour and reputation of the Empire, and that is, that the bitter and terrible experience of the War, in illustrating and exposing, the defects, blunders and mischiefs of our Military Administration, shall be made use of and turned to speedy and thoroughly practical account. The report just now at last made public of Sir John M'Neill and Colonel Tulloch, the Commissioners sent last year by government to inquire into and ascertain the facts concerning the state, condition and treatment of the troops in the Crimea, is a document of the most astounding nature, and indelibly stamps condemnation upon the system, or no system, which it so fearfully exposes. We feel that we want words adequately to characterize the disclosures that have been made. The "Times" Newspaper has indeed abundant and more than abundant justification for its boast that all the statements of its talented and distinguished correspondent, Mr. Russell, have been borne out and supported—nay in not a few points even surpassed by the tremendous revelations of this Commission.

The latter was sent out early in February of last year, under a letter of instructions from Lord Panmure, Secretary of State for War, in which he directs the officers composing it, Sir John M'Neill and Colonel Tulloch, to enquire into the whole arrangement and management of the commissariat department; to acquaint themselves with the mode in which the various supplies of the Army in the Crimea were regulated, the causes of any irregularity, want or insufficiency, if such should be detected—to examine if the "system" on the whole was, or was not unnecessarily complicated for a period of actual warfare, &c. &c. and for the purpose of helping their labours for these important ends, they were given the amplest powers of summoning and examining witnesses.

Their Report was drawn up on the 10th June, and duly forwarded with the evidence when ready to Lord Panmure.

It is now for the first time made public and distributed to both Houses of Parliament.

One fact alone, did we confine ourselves to it—which is most clearly and precisely established by this Report, will speak its character, and almost obviate the necessity of going into its revelations in any detail. Of the splendid Army that Great Britain sent to the Crimea, in seven months after its first landing, not less than thirty-five per cent had perished from overwork, exposure to wet and cold, improper food, bad and insufficient clothing and insufficient shelter!

To give the reader as briefly and summarily as possible, an idea how this most awful, and as the Report proves, in a great degree avoidable, calamity was brought about, we will generalize as much as possible the results brought out by the Report and evidence, before attempting to touch upon any matter in detail.

Salt meat was supplied to the soldiers almost exclusively, when fresh meat could at least upon a multitude of occasions have been procured with comparatively little difficulty, and on some occasions, even at a lesser cost to government. From being thus a long time kept upon this salt meat, the men became scorbutic in vast numbers, and began to loathe the very sight of their food, and not unfrequently reject it altogether. Neither vegetables nor farinaceous articles were supplied to them, although rice, preserved potatoes, and Scotch barley were lying in the stores at Balaklava and Scutari in very large, and constantly increasing quantities. Under these circumstances the scorbutic affections quickly spread still more and became malignant, and the Inspector-General of Hospitals urgently demanded a large supply of lime-juice, a prophylactic in common and regular use in the Royal Navy, as indeed in all foreign Navies and well appointed merchant ships upon voyages of any length. Fully 20,000 pounds of it were lying in the commissariat stores at Balaklava from the beginning of December until the first or second week in February, and the Inspector-General was left, perhaps we should say, kept, in ignorance of the fact!

Mr. Commissary-General Filder appears to be the person looked upon as the party responsible on this score; and accordingly he is blamed, and in some degree sought to be made a scape-goat of by Colonel Gordon, the Quartermaster-General, in his evidence—himself being one of the parties most liable to charges of neglect of duty, as we shall presently see. There is no attempt made by any of the witnesses to account for the fact that the commander in chief permitted this to occur without bringing the Commissary-General to a court martial, or for the faineance of the Quartermaster-General in not having at once reported the matter to him.

The French Army throughout the siege were supplied with soft bread which they baked themselves. There were perfectly the same facilities for doing this in the English Army, but instead of it the men were compelled to be content with hard sea biscuit; which their gums and teeth affected by scorbutic attacks, were often unable to manage. And even of this biscuit the supply was occasionally very defective without any adequate cause.

The men were landed in the Crimea without their knapsacks, and from want of arrangement were left without them for six or eight weeks, when such of them as were recovered were found to be more or less plundered of their contents. During the tremendous weather of December and January, they were left without adequate clothing, at a time when although the melancholy wreck of the Prince in the hurricane of the 14th of November, had involved the loss of great coats and other such necessities to a most disastrous extent, there were at Balaklava, ten thousand rugs in December, more than double that number in January, out of which but eight hundred were after much difficulty served out to the shivering wretches! On the 24th and 27th of December, twenty-five thousand warm blankets arrived at Balaklava, but were not issued: and of 12,000 palliasses not one was issued, nor any attempt made to stuff and prepare them for issue. At this time the men were lying in their one old blanket each, on the wet ground in their tents! Twelve thousand great coats arrived also in December, and there was a reserve of two-thirds of that amount in Scutari, but neither were the latter sent for, nor the former issued!

Mr. Commissary General Filder, on being questioned as to the cause of this retention of articles that would have saved so many most valuable lives, replied:—that the Regulation of the “Service as established by the Queen’s Warrant, did not authorize such issue more frequently than once in three years”!!!

Six thousand regimental coatees and a corresponding number of trousers lay in store at Balaklava from November until April, and at the end of those six months were still in store, while the men were in rags !

The Commissioners naively remark (page 6 of their Report)—
“The deficiencies the Army upon the heights of Sebastopol suffered most from were, a deficiency of fresh meat, a deficiency of vegetables, a deficiency of fresh bread, particularly for the sick, and for those whose gums were affected with scurvy, a deficiency of fuel, a deficiency of hay and straw, to fill the palllasses of the sick, and above all, a deficiency of land-transport.”

“From the month of October (they say, same page) until the month of March, the supply of fresh meat was not sufficient to maintain the health of the troops. They suffered to an alarming extent from diseases of the bowels; to which there was a general pre-disposition, and the medical officers of all ranks are of opinion, with hardly one exception, that the continued use of salt meat aggravated those diseases, and increased that predisposition !”

“It appears from the evidence of the Commissary-General, that it has not been the practice to keep the General Commanding informed of the amount of provisions in depot or available for the use of the troops. It was not till the latter end of January when circumstances forced upon Lord Raglan's attention the necessity for his being kept personally informed of the actual amount of the supplies on which he could rely for the maintenance of his troops, that periodical returns of the quantities in store at Balaklava, were ordered to be submitted to him !” (page 7.)

The deficiency in the supply of vegetables is even more objectionable and more “unaccountable” than that of fresh meat. A sufficient supply of vegetables was known to be indispensable to the maintenance of the health of the Army. The Turkish provinces could have furnished, and at a later and more unfavorable season did furnish a considerable amount. There are several varieties which can be safely carried at sea and will keep several months, of which potatoes and onions are perhaps the best; and the different varieties of preserved vegetables are available at all seasons at a moderate cost.” (Page 13.)

The Report from which we have hurriedly and almost at random, taken the foregoing extracts and facts, is worded most cautiously, and with even an excess of consideration for the parties and the system, which its statements inevitably tend to criminate. The consideration we speak of is indeed pushed to an excess that almost would suggest thoughts of most weak, if not altogether wilful and designed connivance. But we must not be understood as at all adopting or favoring such a suggestion, and on the contrary believe the Report to have been drawn up in good faith; we only wish to put to the Reader this position, that the actual state of things must have been very monstrous indeed, when through all their evident réticence, the Commissioners have been compelled to speak as they have done. We could add infinitely both in strength and number to the extracts we have given, but it would lengthen out this paper beyond all reasonable limits. We cannot however leave this subject without one or two very brief quotations relative to the medical supplies.

The Returns of sickness and mortality, furnished by the Medical Officers, relate to matters which are beyond our limits; but the Morality in the Crimea has been too remarkable not to excite a strong desire to ascertain if possible its causes. The Medical Evidence is CONCLUSIVE against attributing it to anything peculiarly unfavorably in the climate.

The Commissioners then go on to speak of the unanimous concurrence of all officers of every rank and class in attributing it to the deficiencies before mentioned—deficiencies of supply on the spot, but not deficiencies in the stores at Balaklava, and Scutari. One medical witness, at page 334, has in fact epitomized the whole evidence in these striking and all-sufficient words—

“Every thing required was either wanting, or came too late! Here is the secret of our sufferings!”*

Unless the “System,” so terribly exposed in this Report, and exposed on official and the most incontestable authority, be altogether changed, the abounding resources of Great Britain will, as they have been in the Crimean struggle, avail her little to the assertion and maintenance of the position she desires to occupy as a great military nation. There is no doubt whatever that on the whole her prestige has been lowered by the occurrences of the present war, and that although our soldiers have shewn as they ever have, and ever will shew, a brilliancy of valor and a heroism of endurance that no army in the world could surpass, if any could equal, yet their achievements have not been such as to add very largely to the military fame of the Empire. Europe attributes to the French the larger portion by far of the glory of quelling the pride of Russia in the Crimea.

There should be a change in every part of our military system. In the recruitment of soldiers, in the treatment of soldiers, in their supply, and food, and nourishment in the field—in the system of promotion, so as to add the stimulus of honorable ambition to that of mere increase of ordinary comforts; and above all, and before all, there should be a change in the system as regards the officering of our Army, in respect of which we so disadvantageously contrast with our neighbours, and allies at the opposite side of the Channel.

The most extraordinary gallantry in the field is in the vast and nearly overwhelming majority of instances, the only real military quality that our officers have displayed in the present War. In the higher grades, where there are not always the same opportunities for personal exposure and daring, but much more occasions for showing military aptitude, knowledge, and high talent, our failure has been lamentable. The cause is plainly the system that up to the present time has prevailed and unluckily still prevails, of allowing the force of money, or family interest, or both combined, to sway as a general rule the appointments and promotions, especially in the higher grades of our Army.

The British Officer is supposed to be subjected to an examination prior to entering the service, but during the present War that practice has had to be suspended in so many instances as to become all but nugatory; and even when it was enforced, it was not found at all difficult to meet and satisfy; the more especially as it really had scarcely more to do with military matters than with those of any of the civil professions: with the exception of these examinations, for which at any time three months of tolerably attentive study with a private tutor, would qualify any young man of ordinary education, the various steps of rank were open without difficulty to the man of wealth, and of good connexion and interest. In our Staff Officers the two latter requisites are of pre-eminent and nearly exclusive consequence; whereas in France, the system is widely different indeed as regards all officers of the Army; but most strikingly so as regards the officer of the important branch of the service just mentioned.

The French Government opens the following list of schools to the young aspirant for military honors, or indeed for any military rank whatever, and requires his attendance for specified periods at one or more of them, according as he seeks to qualify himself for promotion—

"Ecole Polytechnique," at Paris—"Ecole Spéciale Militaire," at St. Cyr—"Prytanée Impériale Militaire," at the town of La Flèche—"Ecole Normale de Tir," at Vincennes—"Ecole Normale de Gymnastique," in the same locality—"Ecole d'Application du Génie et de l'Artillerie," at Metz—"Ecole d'Application d'Etat-Major," at Paris—"Ecole de Cavalerie," at Saumur—"Ecole d'Application de Médecine et de Pharmacie Militaire," at the same place—"Ecoles Régimentaires du Génie," at Metz, at Arras, and at Montpellier.—Twelve Schools of Artillery at various places.

The embryo Staff Officer in France, must at outset of his career, pass three years at the "Ecole Polytechnique," or the "Ecole Spéciale Militaire de St. Cyr." He is then eligible for the "Ecole Impériale d'Application d'Etat Major," at Paris. Meantime he may have passed the ordinary military examination, and got his commission in the Line.

In the "Ecole d'Etat Major," he passes two years of severe study and strict discipline—learning all the higher branches of mathematics, topography, geography, fortification, statistics of various kinds, military history, three or four languages, including English, drawing, and the theory of military manœuvres for troops of all arms of the service. To military surveying a special attention is given.

Supposing him to pass successfully the rigid examinations he is subject to, he is then attached for one year as a company officer to a regiment of infantry—for another year to the same as a second or supernumerary adjutant—for two years more similarly to a cavalry regiment, and for one year to a battery of Artillery. During these five years he has continually to remit to the heads of the "Etat Major," maps, papers, drawings and surveys.

After these ten years of education, theoretic and practical, and not till they are completed to the entire satisfaction of his superiors, he becomes eligible for a Staff appointment, and in due time may be sure of getting it, without seeking the aid of a military patron, or being indebted to any favoritism or interest.

In Great Britain, on the contrary, there is no special education, no special examination, no probationary period. The raw subaltern just fudged through his drill by the well-see'd serjeant-major of his regiment, may be appointed on the Staff if he have friends powerful enough at the Horse Guards, and under the same single condition may continue on it all his life, as well as rise to high command! Can it be wondered at then, that our staff-officers should have shewn themselves so disastrously incompetent in the Crimea!

We had hoped ere concluding this article to have been able to announce and comment upon the final terms of Peace. But up to this moment nothing further is known, at least by the general public, than was known three or four weeks ago. It is still left to conjecture whether there is, or is not, more sincerity in the Russian acceptance of "bases" this year, than when they excited and disappointed our hopes this time twelve months. We know not what concession or surrender of ill-acquired territory Russia is prepared to make, or what guarantee will be exacted from her against future aggressions. Judging from the past she will, unless effectively bound down and restrained by some permanent and well guaranteed arrangements, only bide her time, and wait for some period of European distractions, to resume her course of rapine, and unjust acquisition.

She took advantage of the beginnings of the American Revolution to secure a lion's share in the first partition of unhappy Poland, and subsequently advanced her Southern Armies till they occupied the Northern Shores of the sea of Azov, and secured the course of the Dnieper. When England and France were alike nearly exhausted by War in 1783, she annexed the territory of the Don Cossacks to the shores of the Caspian, and entered the Crimea. In 1792, in the first wild throes of the French Revolution, she seized the country between the Dniester and the Boug and completed the second partition of Poland. In 1795, the War of the French Revolution being then hot in Europe and all attention engaged by it, she effected the third and final partition of Poland. In 1802, she seized upon Mingrelia. In 1843, she invaded Georgia. In 1805 she seized the territories of Karabagh and Mongatchon, and in 1806 Shamaki on the Caspian Sea. In 1807 and the subsequent years till the conclusion of the War, Russia continued her advances in the East, taking advantage of the distractions of Europe ; and marking each successive year with a fresh achievement of rapine. These her unjust acquisitions received a tacit sanction from the "Holy Alliance" in 1815 ; and an active addition to them in permitting her to absorb the Duchy of Warsaw ; and finally shut Sweden out from her plundered province of Finland.

Reluctantly she now found herself compelled to hold her hand, the other powers of Europe having at length time to look around them and beginning to manifest no little wonder and anxiety at what she had been doing while their attention was engaged in their own struggle for existence. And it was not till 1829 that her statesmen ventured to move forward again when suspicion had been lulled to sleep, and France and England for purposes of their own were courting Russia, and had but a year or two before in conjunction with Russia annihilated for the time the naval power of Turkey, and dismembered her territory. The treaty of Adrianople and of Unkiar-Skeless, attest that Russia and Russia alone profited in the end by the alliance.

It is to be hoped that in the Conference now about to meet at Paris, if it be judged impossible to insist upon a giving up of many of these ill gotten acquisitions and advantages, adequate guarantees will at any rate be insisted upon as to desisting from future aggression, and such arrangements made for the Danubian provinces and Asiatic Turkey, as will make those countries bulwarks as it were against Russia, should she attempt hereafter to violate her engagements.

As we write, the unwelcome intelligence has reached us of the increasing difficulties between Great Britain and the United States. It is a matter we need not say of the deepest concernment and the gravest moment. It is so whether we look at the physical or the moral results likely to follow from the breaking out of hostilities between these countries and our transatlantic brethren ; as to its physical results, the United States will no doubt suffer deeply all along her exposed and nearly defenceless seaboard ; which her small regular army of some 12 or 14,000 men and her undisciplined and in many cases unarmed militia cannot effectively defend. But the wide-spread commerce of England must suffer the most enormous losses from the cloud of American privateers that will quickly cover every sea ; and it is well to recollect that the United States in 1812 were far less strong in military and naval resources than at present, and yet were able to maintain a war of three years against us, with heavy loss to us in treasure and in blood.

But the moral results would be still worse in the evil feelings that would be perpetuated between the mother country and her former children and dependants, and above all in the check to that spreading of civilization in the other hemisphere which is the mission of the United States, however ill and imperfectly that mission has as yet been attempted.

One word for Ireland in conclusion. What is to be the result to her of the War, which we are happy to have reason to consider is on the point of termination. How is she to be repaid her sacrifices? The blood of her children has been poured out like water in this struggle; as it always has been whenever England needed her aid. Nay, we believe that in proportion to her population it will undoubtedly be found that she has furnished more victims to the Demon of War than either of the sister countries. It would have been easy for her also to have distracted and divided the energies of England by menacing political demonstrations, and nothing of this kind has she done. With exceptions so few as to be utterly insignificant, her People and her Press have approved of the War, cheered on their countrymen to join in the strife, and freely pledged every effort of our Nation to support the part taken in it by Great Britain. And now having lost so many of our youth, suffering from the severe taxation which presses so much more in proportion upon our impoverished country than upon Great Britain, have we not a right to ask for some recognition of our services and sacrifices, some amelioration of our condition, some concession of advantages and privileges, some practical proof that we are at length recognised as entitled to be placed on an equality in all respects with the more favored people of England and of Scotland.

We could markedly indicate the direction in which an honest effort for this end should be made; but it would be foreign to the purpose of this paper to enter upon such a discussion; especially when we have already reached our limits. We can however confidently leave it to our Irish readers to supply for themselves the suggestions and claims the Irish community is now so amply entitled to make and to demand.

ART. VI.—AN ADDITION TO THE CURRENCY.

Principles of Currency—Means of Ensuring Uniformity of Value and Adequacy of Supply. By Edwin Hill. London : Longman, Brown, Green, and Longman. 1856.

It would be idle to speak of the importance of the Science of Political Economy in each and every of its wide and difficult departments. There is hardly any science concerning which there has been until of late years such gross ignorance, and it must be confessed that even to the present it labours under a serious defect, it is involved in a certain amount of obscurity which presents difficulties quite sufficient to deter from its study most men; and, capable as it is in most of its great truths and principles, of popular illustration, it must be a matter of considerable regret that those who have written on the subject, have rather addressed themselves to adepts in the science, than to the great mass of readers with ordinary information and ordinary intelligence. Beyond question, in its higher branches and its more serious and intricate calculations, it is involved in such difficulty and complication, that it would be impossible in writing upon these, to address any but men who have long and carefully studied the science in its higher parts; but, at the same time, many, if not most of its great truths, are susceptible of proof by an easy and popular illustration, which would enable all to judge for themselves of the accuracy of reasoning of those who advance the propositions, and which would be more effectual than is generally imagined, in testing strange or absurd theories, and seizing upon the fallacies involved in apparently reasonable plans for remedying existing defects and evils, obscure and metaphysical disquisitions on value, currency, gold, exchange, such as most writers on this subject continue to fill their pages, or rather to enter upon their subject with, are quite sufficient to deter the great mass of readers. In this respect we think Mr. Hill is deserving of much credit, and though we differ with him as to the efficacy of his proposed plan, and as to portions of the reasoning by which he seeks to support it, we thank him for the clearness with which he proposes his views; a clearness not alone desirable for enabling general readers to understand the subject, but a clearness which shews his honesty of purpose. Advocates of a theory which they have reason to suspect to be erroneous, or to which being wedded from any particular reason they seek to support — per fas aut nefas, take care to use such obscure language, and to strain so unfairly, not to say improperly, facts as well as arguments, that it is somewhat difficult to detect their errors, and still more difficult to render that detection manifest to others. Mr. Hill enters on this subject in the spirit of one who seeks to investigate the truth, and to suggest what is useful. He does not desire to force a pet theory on us, or to magnify himself at the general expense, either by creating a sect or by effecting a change, unless he is right. Again, we think that this gentleman is entitled to consideration for devoting, with the best intentions, and with a singular honesty of purpose, much time and trouble in propounding a plan, no matter whether it may be considered effective or not, for remedying one of the most serious evils to which a country could be exposed. Compelled as we are to differ from Mr. Hill, we think these remarks due to him, and that we should enter on the consideration of his suggestions rather as one discussing a plan with a friend, when both have a common object, than as a severe critic or a sectarian partizan. In our remarks on this subject we shall rather address ourselves to general readers, as it is quite possible to do, at the same time that we communicate our views to those who have made the subject their study, although in so doing we may depart from the general rule, and subject ourselves to the charge of writing inaccurately and carelessly on the matter.

Before proceeding to discuss the reasoning of Mr. Hill on particular evils and the sources to which he attributes them, it would be desirable to state a few of the principal propositions connected with currency, the truth of which all concur in admitting.

The object of currency is to furnish a medium, by which exchanges may be effected. The farmer can consume but a small portion of his own crops, he cannot very well take a portion of his corn in kind to his landlord to pay the rent, nor to tradespeople with whom he deals for the different necessaries and luxuries of life. For this purpose it is necessary to select some produce having as nearly as possible an invariable value, or some token representing Land Produce. The principal requirement of such a medium, a requirement in comparison with which all other considerations must sink into insignificance, is a fixedness of value. Gold, which has generally been selected for the purpose of discharging this duty of exchange, has been ascertained to be subject to less fluctuations than any other possible metal. And for purposes of utility, gold is worth little or nothing. Value is however ascertained by the cost of production, and it is not because the gold in a sovereign is intrinsically worth the measure of corn which may be bought for it that it is considered an equivalent, but because the quantity of gold and corn mutually exchangeable, cost for their production the same amount of labor.

Gold then being, without the intervention of Government or legislative provision of any kind, what may be called the natural currency of every country, independently of its fixedness of value and portability, as compared with other metals or commodities, it has been taken as the basis of our currency. The same object of supplying a currency may be effected by the Government issuing a certain number of counters, and providing that they should be a legal tender for a particular sum, because the different exchanges required by the community require only a token, which token however, while it may be valueless in itself, must have a reference to a fixed standard as gold, that is a fictitious, by its purporting to represent a certain quantity of gold. It matters not to the farmer whether he is paid by his factor in tokens or sovereigns for his corn, provided those tokens being made legal tender and kept as before said at a fixed value, he can pay his rent with them, and procure everything that he could have procured with sovereigns. If the amount of these tokens or notes should be greater than is required for the purpose for which they were intended, that is for the necessary exchanges, the result will be that there being more tokens than are necessary, more of them will be given for the same quantity of produce than before, consequently a higher price will be paid for commodities. On the contrary, if the tokens are not sufficient to discharge their required function of fully supplying the media of exchange on the country, a smaller number of tokens must suffice to purchase the same quantity of corn than would suffice under a perfectly regulated and adapted supply.

At such a time prices are low, that is, commodities will not command in exchange as large a quantity of currency as at other times. The object of supplying a community with the required amount of currency might be effected without the circulation of a single sovereign or coin of any kind, by the issue of tokens to which the attribute of currency is given, by Government providing that such shall be legal tender. This, as regards economy, is by far the most desirable currency medium, as there is neither the waste occasioned by the circulation nor the loss of interest by keeping up a valuable product like gold, when the same object might be effected by bundles of paper. An insuperable objection however presents itself to issuing tokens without some provision being made as to securing a fixedness of value, a fact only to be ascertained by a reference to the least variable in value of all products, namely gold. In an arbitrary government this object might be effected without having a single coin in circulation, by the managers of that branch of the state direction, ascertaining from time to time, as might be convenient or necessary, whether the amount of gold which the note or token purports to represent can be bought for such note. If this be so and the note and the gold coin should be of equal value, the currency will be at its true level neither more nor less than the business transactions of the country require. If the note can purchase more gold than it purports to represent, there is a deficiency of currency because the currency not being sufficient for business demands prices are lower—that is a larger quantity of material value may be obtained for the note than under ordinary circumstances, and hence a larger quantity of gold which may be bought and sold as corn, manufactured or any other marketable articles. On the other hand, if the currency be in excess, by the same process the note will not be able to purchase the quantity of gold which it purports to represent.

Such a power even if it could be satisfactorily and successfully exercised is so inconsistent with our constitutional ideas, that it may be put aside as one which could not safely be confided to any government or body of men. This being so, the meanest approximation to a purely paper currency, consistently with securing the fixedness of value of such currency, must be the most desirable. We object to placing the control of the currency, that is the exercise of an arbitrary discretion, as to the issue of paper or creation of currency, in any body in the State. This object therefore to be effected, is in our opinion more effectually and simply secured by our present currency laws than by any other scheme which has been either tested or devised. The general plan of our present currency system does not require any minute particulars or details, and may be stated in a few lines. The Bank of England having lent to Government eleven million, and holding Government securities for three million in addition, are authorised to issue Notes to the amount of fourteen million of pounds, which notes are constituted by the legislature legal tender, and may be called, from not being based on any material value, unrepresented notes : beyond this, the Bank is at liberty to issue to any amount they please, but on condition of holding bullion in their coffers, to the amount of such issue, that is having a sovereign for every pound note they put into circulation. Country banks are confined to a certain amount of issue, being an average of what their actual issue had been for some years before the passing of the First Bank Charter Act. Those minor auxiliaries to the Bank of England, although in many respects their existence and powers are to be taken into consideration in discussing various questions connected with the currency, it will not be necessary to refer to them in any of the observations we shall consider necessary to make on the suggestions of Mr. Hill. We shall not therefore more particularly refer to them.

By our present system, it would seem the desired object of fixedness of value and the greatest possible economy of gold, consistently with securing that fixedness is, by a simple self-adjusting process, more nearly approached than it possibly can be by any other currency, which, as already observed, is not the creation of an arbitrary power. Gold, entering into our currency,—but a very small portion indeed by actual circulation, though a very considerable sum is, it must be admitted, lying idle in the bank coffers,—like the rest of the currency, when in excess, becomes depreciated in value. If nineteen million of currency suffice for the demands of the community, and there should be in actual circulation twenty million, every note or sovereign, which, when the supply was properly adjusted, was worth twenty shillings is reduced in value to nineteen ; that is, will purchase only the same amount of commodity as nineteen would have done. The result is, other countries, in which there is at the same time either a deficiency of currency, or an exact supply, will begin to absorb our gold, being able to get twenty shillings worth for nineteen, and then commences a drain of gold on account of the exchange in gold being, as it is called, against this country. Under these circumstances, an unmistakeable index is furnished as to the adaptation of the amount of currency to the necessary supply. When the exchange is against us the bank begins to contract its issues and diminish its discounts, by which means the value of the note is brought to its proper level with gold, the result of which is to leave gold at par in England, or as near par as other disturbing influences outside of an excess or deficiency of currency will permit. The bank does this not on public grounds, but for their own security. Their very existence depends on being able to pay all comers gold for their notes, and if they allow a drain of gold out of the country to go on, they are preparing for themselves a run, it being more for the interest of holders of notes to get bullion from the bank, and export it at a profit, than to hold and turn in their business depreciated notes. Bound as they are to hold gold for every note beyond the fourteen million, the rule it seems upon which the directors act is, to have as much coin and bullion in their coffers as may in the aggregate amount, when the exchange is at par, to a third part of the bank's liabilities, including deposits as well as issues; that is, when in addition to the fourteen million of unrepresented notes, they have, between their represented notes and the sums lodged by depositors, thirteen or sixteen million of liabilities, in all twenty-seven, or thirty million of liabilities, which they may be called on to make good in gold, they hold nine million or ten million; it being calculated that this sum is sufficient for all probable and ordinary demands. Hence we may see the absolute necessity for the bank to watch jealously and closely the value of gold and the state of our exchanges, in order to make ready against an imminent danger. It is said that there is a terrible waste in allowing to lie idle in the cellars of the bank so large a quantity of bullion, valuable in itself and capable of bearing interest. This, however, is a necessary evil, as by no other means could the test be applied or enforced as to whether or not our notes are at par, and our currency accurately adapted to the wants of the community. True, the Government might say to the bank, we will allow you to issue, not as at present, with a sovereign in your chest for every pound of paper money, but to issue as to you seems wise, paying to us the average rate of interest which shall go to meet the present expenses of the state, and with a liability of being called on at a moment to pay in gold. It may be doubted, however, if this would be productive of any change for the better, in dispensing with the presence of gold ; as acting on the rule which, as we have mentioned, is considered necessary by the directors for their own protection, they would continue to hold as large an amount of bullion lying idle in their coffers as they do at present.

The suggestion which Mr. Hill offers, is that there should be an addition made to our present currency by issuing a species of Exchequer bill, bearing the usual market rate of interest, bearing on the face of it the amount, due for principal and interest, each day of its existence ; and, that thus, that large portion of our necessary currency which is supplied by bills of exchange, might be substituted by those bills which would have all the advantage of bills of exchange, of adapting themselves to the currency. They would, says Mr. Hill, become investments when money was easy, because holders would get higher interest on the money sunk, by keeping them, than by passing them as money ; that is, they could get money at a lower rate of interest than the Government were to pay them, and therefore, it would be their interest to hold these and pay money. On the other hand, as he reasons, when money should be scarce and interest consequently high, the holders of such bills would find it more to their advantage to employ them as currency than to hold them, as thus they could make use of the money represented by those bills at a cheaper rate than they could find, substitutes for them, by going into the money market to raise the necessary sums for carrying on their business. The futility of this proposal in effecting its intended object, that of giving relief from panic, we shall consider after discussing the reasons which induce Mr. Hill to conclude it would have this effect.

It is worthy of remark, that while most of the propositions connected with this subject are correctly stated in some one place or other through the pages of this book, they are, nevertheless, from time to time, lost sight of entirely in observations upon causes and effects, and deductions from premises. It would be more curious than instructive to go seriatim through these inconsistencies, and confining ourselves to showing that Mr. Hill's currency device cannot effect its object in any way or produce the least influence on the condition of the currency, we shall take, as they present themselves, the different statements and deductions to which we object.

In approaching the subject the objection is made to the present system, that under it gold is at the same time a standard of value and medium of payment, and that in this way disturbing influences are brought to bear which cause gold to fluctuate in value. In this he is perfectly correct, but the objection is one to which every human regulation is subject, namely, that it has its imperfections, and until some mode can be devised which neither Mr. Hill nor any other writer has ever yet put forward, we must submit to this imperfection.

It is necessary, as before mentioned, since we will not consent to leave to the direction either of a government or a board, the entire irresponsible management of the currency, putting gold entirely out of circulation, that we should have a self-acting regulator of our currency. The quantity of gold as compared with general currency of the country is indeed small, and how by any other machinery than that now in use the great object of regulating the demand to the supply could be effected, seems to us one of those problems beyond human intelligence to solve.

Neither is there so much in this objection as appears at first sight; for though a temporary demand may for a time raise the price of gold in a particular country, or an excess of currency depreciate its value in that country, such causes will but slightly affect the value of the total quantity of bullion in circulation in the entire commercial world, and while, at the same time, we may find that gold is either dear or cheap in our country, that very statement shews that, as a general standard furnished by all the gold in use, these temporary rises and falls in particular communities affect little if at all the utility of gold as a standard of value.

What is the cause of those commercial crises which from time to time paralyze the energies of the country and bring ruin to thousands and want to hundreds of thousands? Mr. Hill says, want of currency, and to establish this proposition he argues at some length that it cannot be from those causes by which they are created in other countries as famine, domestic disturbances, earthquakes, and similar national calamities; hence he rushes to the conclusion, that an insufficient or ill-regulated currency is at the root of the evil. Into the many ingredients which constitute a crisis, and how far each bears a part in bringing about a panic, it would be difficult to speak definitely. Mr. Hill says they are mainly caused by a defect of currency, and that under present regulations the evil aggravates itself, and the greater the want of currency the more does the currency contract. We say want of credit. It is asked, why is England more exposed to panics than other countries? Because she has larger business transactions, and there is more credit in England than in other countries. For the same reason that a wholesale merchant who gives credit largely and speculates extensively is more liable to stop payment from some accident or rumour, than the small huxter who neither gets nor gives credit. Mr. Hill attacks the bullionists in Mr. Norman, when the latter gentleman ascribes these commercial panics to their proper causes, namely, presumption, ignorance, and the defect of human intelligence. England, argues Mr. Hill, is as intelligent, as shrewd, and as well educated, if not much more so, than any of her neighbours. So is the wholesale merchant as compared with the small shopkeeper. It is credit which is at the root of the evil, and as long as a country engages largely in business transactions in which success engenders an over conceit and spirit of rash speculation, so long must she be prepared for those panics and reactions. The only effect which a system of currency can have upon the evil is to bring it to a stop in time, while at the same time, by a temporary relaxation of its rules, it may assist bona fide holders of material wealth, while it leaves speculators trading upon credit only to their fate. This, as we shall shew, is the operation of our present system of currency, and anything further would be as entirely beyond the power of any currency system that could be devised, as to make bank notes intrinsically worth what they purported to represent, or transmute paper into material wealth.

We must do this writer the justice of not confounding him with the paper currency theorists. He admits the utility of gold, although he unfairly urges, as we have already said, the objection to the use of it; nay more, he would as regards the employment of gold have it as it is, introducing, however, a supplemental paper currency. Before coming to his plan, however, it will be better to observe on the different errors upon which he builds his theory for the purpose of establishing our two propositions—that he is erroneous as to the cause of these panics, and that even if he were right, the object which he proposes for his new medium of currency could not be affected by it. Curiously enough Mr. Hill, after attributing to a deficient currency these crises, lets slip on the subject the following opinion, at page 83.

"My own impression is, that our liability to commercial convulsion is traceable to the very extensive, and at the same time very unguarded, use we make of credit—unguarded, that is by due precaution against its misuse or abuse."

That the condition of the country is healthy from a supply of currency neither above nor below the wants of the community, is shown, according to Mr. Hill, by negatives. 1st. If there be no desire to export gold. 2nd. If there be no want of reasonable confidence, and an absence of speculative excitement. In offering these reasons, he abandons every objection to the present system of regulating the currency. The second test may be put aside entirely, because as to pronouncing upon whether or not there was generally prevailing speculative excitement and want of reasonable confidence, would be entirely too difficult and blind a task, and one which no sensible man could offer as affording an ascertainable criterion. We come then to the first—if there be no desire to export gold—and what do we find; that here, in obedience to the existing regulation, and the interest of that Bank which may be said in truth to regulate the currency, the exportation, or importation of gold, is the test always acted on by them as to whether they should contract or enlarge the currency issue.

Although Mr. Hill admits that a mixed currency, such as ours is at present, is the best, and that it only requires the addition which he proposes, yet in order to establish his proposition, that the sufferings of the community at times of panic, if not brought about are aggravated by a want of currency, he finds it necessary to quarrel more or less with the rule which requires the Bank to hold gold for their issue of notes in addition to the unrepresented fourteen million. As he argues, the effect of this is, that when the panic comes on the currency is contracting, and thus the evil is aggravated, seeking to deduce therefrom, that because the evil is aggravated, because there is not an extension of currency, that therefore the evil has been brought about by some defect in the currency. Now, as this is one of the principal errors on which he seeks to support his theory, we must ascertain how far the fact is so. When the panic is coming on we really want more currency, yet this is the very time the currency is contracting, says Mr. Hill. True, the currency is contracting in obedience to the only true indicator, namely, the condition of the gold exchange. If, he continues, the currency were enlarged at this particular time, people would be able to go on and get over their difficulties, and the country would be saved from the horrors of a panic, and for proof of this he refers to the period when cash payments were suspended by the Bank, who were thus enabled to issue an unlimited supply of notes. Now it must be borne in mind that upon these different occasions, and especially in 1847, (when the mere fact of giving authority to the Bank to suspend cash payments without any actual issue consequent on the authority, had the effect of restoring confidence,) that on each of these occasions the panic had gone a particular length, and pulled up most of the mere speculators, although unfortunately with them a few able to pay twenty shillings in the pound, and that therefore the time had come for applying an unusual remedy, or, to take a very apt illustration from the medical men, the evil humours of the community, which should sooner or later be discharged, had been brought more quickly to a head by one class of treatment, while after the discharge a totally different mode was adopted for restoring the patient. The contracting of the issues, at the same time that it did its great duty of adapting the supply to the demand, and keeping the currency of the country at its proper value, had the effect of forcing steadily to a wind-up those who were not worth what they owed, or, in other words, did not possess one pounds worth of material value. The issuing, or the authorizing of the issue, of additional notes had then this effect, that men of material wealth could get their bills cashed, which in the state of public credit the Bank dared not do while they were open to a run upon their coffers. Those who had thus gotten that money which they required, and which from their solvency they were entitled to get, were in a position to assist others; holders of currency which during the panic had ceased to discharge its duties as currency from having been hoarded, began to find that confidence was returning, and in proportion as they found that their assistance could be dispensed with, became ready to accommodate and less jealous of parting with their money. Deposits which, as it is estimated, cause every thousand pounds to do the duty of three thousand in the way of currency, are again made and discounts are resumed, until again the monetary affairs of the country are restored to a satisfactory condition. Want of credit, and not of currency, is the cause of the evil, much harm being done, nevertheless, to those who are really deserving of credit by the temporary panic.

An attempt, however, by an unlimited issue of notes to entirely arrest a commercial crisis would be perfectly futile; an illustration of this fact would be perhaps the most satisfactory mode of causing its truth to be recognized by the great mass of readers. If in a community there should be say a dozen of merchants, four of whom, with a capital of £20,000, are engaged in enterprises which require either money or credit to the extent of £200,000, while the remaining eight are possessed of capital or material wealth of the value of the £200,000 which is the extent of their trade. From over trading and rash speculation the men of small capital find that from the turn of the markets those engagements which they have entered into when wound up, will leave them penniless if not worse. They are naturally anxious to go on, like gamblers, in the hope that some lucky chance will extricate them from their difficulty. In substance paupers, they require money to carry on, which if they get, it can only be to plunge into still wilder speculations, as the regular and fair profits of trade could be of little or no use to them. The longer this is allowed to go on the more deeply do they become embarrassed, and the most disastrous to the community of which they are members must their fall be. Now the only effect of increasing the currency would be to enable such men to continue a short time longer in trade, and the farther the evil day is postponed the more terrible the reckoning. Can it be said that it is not for the benefit of such persons, or rather for the benefit of the community (for the former have nothing to lose) that those men of straw should be stopped? According to our present system the screw is put on more or less according as the necessity is indicated, although it is sad to consider that in bringing those men to a stand still, public credit becomes so much shaken that many men of substance, who would at the time under any circumstances be enable to continue and satisfy every demand upon them, are obliged to stop. This state of things is inseparable from our imperfect human nature, and until communities can be depended on, and are not liable to run into excesses of fear, such mishaps must be expected, and cannot be satisfactorily met or guarded against. An attempt by increasing of issues to meet such calamities would be similar to a physician trying to drive back into the system lurking humours, and to prevent them drawing to a head, a protraction of the disease which might involve mortal consequences to the patient.

Admitting, however, for the moment that the evils of commercial crises and panics, such as those which from time to time disturb our community and involve us in such ruinous confusion, are caused by an insufficient supply of currency, and not by a want of credit and public confidence, it yet remains to be considered how this species of exchequer bill which Mr. Hill proposes to issue would supply the defect. It is beyond all question that the greater portion of our large business transactions are carried on by means of bills of exchange, a medium which, though it effects the object of currency, does not come properly within the definition of currency, which is a token upon which the state has conferred a certain privilege, that is, that it must get credit for what it purports to be worth. For this purpose the credit of the state is pledged, and, as we have already shewn, it has fenced round with safeguards these tokens for the purpose of preserving their value, and insuring as far as human wisdom can provide, the security of these tokens. Bills of exchange, however, are entirely the creatures of credit, with nothing to secure in the least their value, or any guarantee that they should be paid at maturity but the names of their acceptors, drawers or indorsers. If public confidence be once shaken, these instruments lose more or less of their efficiency, as men have no reason to know that those bills, although perfectly safe, can be made available, either by passing from hand to hand or by being cashed at the bank, which requires to protect itself, and has to depend on that very public credit the absence of which throws to a certain extent those securities out of circulation. Let us see, however, would these exchequer bills supply the currency, granting that a defective currency causes and aggravates the evil. The exchequer bills, when issued, would be bought up by holders of stock, by men who wish to invest in the funds, and not men of business, who would little think of investing in securities which would pay them only three or four per cent. for money, which by turning with ordinary care they may make pay them a yearly interest of perhaps twelve or fifteen per cent. No matter, however, whether it is found in the hands of the merchant or the capitalist, when the evil hour comes, when high rates of interest and discount will not induce bankers to cash bills, when the sovereigns are tied up by them ready to hand to their customers when called on, and men permit bank notes and gold to lie idle and utterly unproductive rather than run any risk, what likelihood is there that those exchequer bills bearing interest as they should from day to day would come forth to meet the demand, not for cash, of which there is enough with reasonable confidence, but for credit, which, if it existed, there would be cash enough found to effect all that might be required. If a shopkeeper in a remote town, a man of substance and means, who expects to be paid on the morrow a sum of £100, borrow from his neighbour for twenty-four hours this sum which he forthwith pays away, what a number of hands may not that money pass through backwards and forwards within these twenty-four hours, helping to make up the payment of the original £100; what an amount of transactions will this small sum have effected, none of which could have taken place had the £100 been unreasonably refused in the first instance. In this way we may perceive how impossible it would be in a panic which prevents every man from trusting his neighbour for one hour, to remedy the evil by any possible issue of currency; the most that can be done is, by a judicious relaxation at the right time of the rule, the habitual observance of which has been found to be so essentially necessary, to turn the stream and check the unreasonable fears of the public. It should by no means be overlooked either that any considerable extension of the currency beyond that which the bullion index marks as correct must do a great injustice to all debtors, as they are paid in a coin or rather notes depreciated in value by an over issue. Though for a time depreciated notes may gladly be accepted at a considerable sacrifice by those whose very existence is depending on their obtaining either credit or legal tender, and may be thus kept by a feverish and unnatural state of affairs about par, they must nevertheless, when credit is restored, sink to that level to which every excess in currency necessarily subsides, with more or less of loss to the holders of notes in the interval between such unlimited issue, and the time when from the operation of the usual banking laws, the restriction of the currency commences to take effect.

The only statement which could at all support Mr. Hill's theory is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the purpose of supplying the currency and giving relief, has, from time to time, raised the rate of interest on exchequer bills when money was scarce. If this were so, and that it has such an effect, it should, as being the only strong support of Mr. Hill's plan, have been proved either by facts or reasoning that raising the interest on exchequer bills assisted to relieve the general want. It seems much more likely that the Chancellor found it necessary to do so in order to get those bills cashed and raise the necessary funds, and how Mr. Hill is justified in stating what the views of the Chancellor have been in so doing, or that its effects have been such, we are equally at a loss to know.

Although we have pointed out many errors in Mr. Hill's reasoning on this subject, and although we quarrel with several of the propositions which he advances in support of his theory, we must grant him this much, that, unlike most of the opinions on this varied question of currency, there is not as far as we can see anything vicious in Mr. Hill's plan. We have given our reasons for concluding that these legal-tender exchequer bills would not effect what he thinks they could in times of panic and distress; we have pointed to the true cause of those pernicious evils which we fear are as much beyond human wisdom to provide against, as to insure that in every family in the kingdom there should be comfortable means and a prosperous condition. At the same time with our currency regulated as it is at present,—a system which Mr. Hill does not seek to disturb—we cannot see any harm that would ensue from the introduction of such bills, and must say that much convenience and even tendency to economise might be the result. The mistake he has made with regard to this new mixed medium is proposing too much for it, the result of which is that when we perceive that it must fall entirely short of the originator's notion, and utterly disappoint all who expect it to effect what he proposes for it, few will take the trouble to point out the minor advantages of which it might be productive. We should, however, go the length of saying that free from any dangerous consequences as such a medium of currency would be, that it should receive a trial, and we would suggest that, as Mr. Hill has originated a very ingenious although simple theory, that he should return to the subject, and taking lower ground than he has done, should consider and point to the convenience and general utility of such a medium.

Conscious as we are of the vast importance of the subject, and desirous as we should be to have it enlightened by suggestion and discussion, we trust that in differing with this writer as we have done, our task has been discharged with courtesy and no unnecessary severity, and that in pointing to errors we may not turn from the good work an earnest and well-disposed man, or damp the courage of those who either can or think they can suggest what may be useful, or point out what may be defective.

We had almost forgotten to notice some remarks of Mr. Hill's as to the subject of engaging in extensive public works in times of difficulty and distress for the purpose giving employment. As far as we know this view is original, and is fraught with the highest practical importance. It is one to which we give our entire assent, and to which we think the attentive consideration of those whose duty it is to legislate for us should be drawn. As we have not hitherto extracted much from Mr. Hill's book we shall allow him on this subject to speak for himself:—

"Although the changes which material capital undergoes, either in its total quantity, or in the proportions in which it continues floating or becomes fixed, may not have much concern with the commercial derangements under consideration, there can be no doubt whatever of their great influence upon our national prosperity and happiness; as witness the great potato failure in Ireland. And although it is but seldom that government can safely interfere to counteract the influence of these changes (in capital) upon the prosperity and happiness of society, yet it is obviously important, that in those exceptional cases in which it does interfere, government should throw its weight into the right scale.

For instance:—in times when an unusual abundance of material capital excites men to throw off the ordinary restraints of prudence, and to embark in unwise and perilous enterprises, the government may wisely remove some of the stimulating excess, by applying it in the vigorous prosecution, upon a large scale, of works of national defence and convenience.

Thus the construction of ships of war, the formation of harbours, the erection of fortresses, lighthouses, and public buildings in general, the making of roads and the fitting out of exploratory expeditions, &c., if judiciously timed, might absorb much capital just when it could well be spared; when, indeed, its useful absorption would moderate the effect upon the public mind of sudden and unusual prosperity.

Further, by this forethought in securing the execution of its great works in times when the means were abundant, the government would obtain the power of avoiding such expenditure in times when the means are scanty; when, indeed, the pressing duty of reproduction, wants all the means, and all the energy, that could possibly be devoted thereto.

Every prudent man, in the management of his individual concerns, will thus, in times of prosperity, take advantage of his increased means, to extend and improve his lands, to enlarge his premises, and to increase his working stock and implements, &c. ; whilst in times of adversity, on the contrary, he will husband his resources, by avoiding all expenditure which can be safely deferred.

By a strange perversity, however, the cause of which demands a close investigation, our national concerns are managed in a precisely opposite way ; for we pay no particular attention to our public works in times of unusual abundance, when it might even be an advantage to us to spare the means ; but in times of unusual insufficiency, we actually abstract a serious portion of the then already too scanty means, and apply them to the construction of works of no pressing necessity whatever.

That we have not, in times of high abundance, taken the course herein pointed out, as appropriate thereto, must, admitting the advantages of such course, be attributed to inadvertence ; indeed, the necessity for precautionary measures is but seldom forced upon the attention in times of prosperity, nor is there then anything to mark particularly the advantage of the measures herein recommended.

But when we are in a state of famine, it seems obvious and indisputable, that, on the one hand, our manufacturing energy—stimulated to its utmost exertion—should be directed to the production of those commodities which will best avail us in the purchase of supplies abroad ; and that our commercial energy should put forth its utmost power, in exporting such commodities as fast as they are produced, and in procuring and bringing home food in return ; whilst, on the other hand, our agricultural energies should be tasked to their utmost, in carrying on that tillage of the earth, upon the extent, efficiency, and success of which, under Providence, the replenishment of our empty garners at the return of harvest then mainly depends. Nor can the danger and suffering by which we are at such time surrounded, fail, one would think, to force these truths upon the attention of all reflecting men.

With so plain a course before our eyes, and incurring such fearful responsibilities if we go wrong, how do we really proceed ?—Why, just when every loom and every hammer, every plough and every spade, throughout the whole country, ought to be worked without intermission, we find the workshops and the fields alike deserted : men able, willing, and even anxious to labour, are seen loitering in crowds about our streets in a state of enforced idleness, menacing the public peace. Or, if the government interfere, as it did in Ireland a few years ago, then are these men set to work, not upon the task (at such time urgent beyond all others) of producing something wherewith to procure food from other countries in exchange, nor upon the scarcely less pressing duty of cultivating the land to the utmost, in order that the famine may at least end with the next harvest ; but they are employed upon tasks that have no relation whatever to the urgent necessities of the case,—tasks, indeed, sometimes useless altogether."

ART. VII.—FEMALE ADULT EDUCATION.

Adult Schools, A Letter addressed to the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland. By J. P. Organ, author of "A Plea for the Education of the Working Classes Through the Medium of Evening Schools and Educational Mechanics' Institutes." Dublin: M. and J. Sullivan. 1856.

In the twentieth number of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW we announced to our readers that a history of the industrial phases of the National System of Education in Ireland, together with a notice of the industrial branches of the system of education promoted by her Majesty's Council of Education in England, should appear in the current number of the REVIEW. The subject is so comprehensive a one, and has involved not only the attentive perusal of multitudinous reports and books, but an actual inspection of the leading schools in this and the sister country at rather an inclement season of the year, that we are obliged to postpone the article we have in preparation until the publication of our next, the June number. Amongst the schools which we visited is one very intimately connected with Industrial Schools; for it offers to those who are ignorant of book learning and industriously employed during the day an opportunity of obtaining a literary education. In this respect it may be regarded as the complement and converse of ordinary industrial schools. There are other points in the working of the school in question that attach a public importance to it as a type of schools under similar management; a system of management not only little understood but grossly misrepresented, and we accordingly anticipate our regular paper on the subject of National Industrial Education by laying before our readers at once the following notes of our visit.

Few institutions which we have inspected afforded us anything like the pleasure and satisfaction we derived from a visit we made to the Evening School for Female Adults conducted by the Sisters of Mercy, in the Callender-street National School, Belfast. This school was established for the purpose of extending the blessings of education to grown females, especially to those who are employed in the mills of the town.

There are thirty-three mills in Belfast and its neighbourhood, giving employment to upwards of 32,000 persons, and as Macaulay and others have written the panegyrics of the great mill proprietors, and conferred wreaths of commercial immortality upon the town and its people generally, we shall permit the historian, the traveller, and the economist to tell each his own tale and shall add nothing to it; but there is a phase in the story as yet untold. There are within those leviathan mills, from half past five o'clock in the early morning till six o'clock at night, thousands of youthful females who have never played at the apron strings of a mother, or heard their names called over by a father's voice; and there they are with wan countenances and sickly faces; and they have grown up in their ignorance and the moral helplessness of their orphanage. Besides those who are orphans, there will also be found a large number of others in the mills who are ignorant of the simplest rudiments of knowledge. Yet these are the people who have most need of the firmness of mind and protecting influences acquired by a sound education. Where there is an aggregation of numbers—particularly if there be a lack of education amongst them—there is sure to be moral danger.

The nature of an employment is often favorable or otherwise to virtue. The labor of the field, every body knows, is favorable to simplicity of manners and godliness; whilst, on the contrary, mill operations exercise the worst influences, vitiate the feelings, poison the affections, and give gloominess to the passions. "Private vice," says Thomas Wyse, "has but to make a few steps and a few proselytes and it becomes public corruption;" it is not difficult to appreciate the awful calamities a few vicious wretches in a mill can bring upon their ignorant fellow workers, whilst at the same time they are leading society into confusion and immorality. When we find an uneducated woman in one of those immense mills, we find the weakest and most destitute of human creatures in the weakest and most dangerous of places. We see her, the poor mill girl, young in years, mature in the strategies of the world, old in physical conformation and decay, and surrounded by those who are subtle in words, crafty in adventure, loose in principle, and thoughtless in conduct. Her face is always pale and haggard, her eyes are always moist, her brow is ever knitted, her cheeks become more hollow and hectic day by day, her hair grows unnaturally dry, and she saturates it with the foul smelling oil of the machinery ; her lips are thin, pale, and pressed together, a smile seldom brightens her countenance, and when it does it travels so gloomily over it that it is like one of those light clouds that of an autumn evening glide past a waning moon, shewing that there is radiance beneath, but with mist and shadow checking its display. Her features were pretty when she was a child, but now they are irregular, rough, and sinewy ; her neck is short, her hands are hard and feverish, her figure is growing uncouth, her feet are uncovered and her inner ankles touch the ground : a tattered shawl makes a hood for her head, and her dress is bare. Her whole look is that of anguish ; her mind is uninformed, and her ignorance leads her to an unnatural contentment with her lot and submission to its penalties ; but it is absurd, and opposed to every social and ethical truth, to applaud the contentment that springs from ignorance. Physical hardship and moral peril are the conditions of the poor mill girl's life—is there any succour for her, is there any anchor to cast into the dark sea of life in which she sails that will secure her against misfortune when virtue is assailed or faith begins to totter ?

We find by the 21st Report of the Commissioners of National Education that there were forty-six Evening Schools in connexion with the Board on the 31st of December, 1854 ; and included in that number were seven schools for females. We have learned that very few adult females ever attended the latter schools, and that the number of junior girls in attendance was even very inconsiderable. They were evening schools for female children rather than for female adults. No one was heard to repine at this state of things ; there were no remonstrances made through Parliament or the Press against Government or Board, or any body else, for neglect or inaction ; indeed, adult female education on a large scale had been, in fact hitherto regarded by educationists as impracticable.

There were objections, natural enough in their way, raised to any scheme that would lead females from their homes at night and expose them to the dangers and temptations of the streets. "Ignorance and innocence were thought more precious than knowledge and vice." This was a soothing and philanthropic fallacy for those to rely upon who thought female adult education a hopeless, undesirable, and unrealizable project. It was reserved for woman to ameliorate the condition in this respect of the forsaken and ignorant of her own sex, and to declare the difficult and protracted problem solvable. The Sisters of Mercy, in Belfast, are the first who, on a scale of greatness and national efficiency, conceived the idea of educating adult females. They saw the mill girls in the state we have just depicted them, they saw them frightfully ignorant in the presence of the great commercial Mammon, and, with a courage and devotion akin to that which led so many of their order to eastern lands to comfort and console their noble compatriot soldiers, they tried an experiment which civilization had been so slow to attempt, and statesmen and economists so reluctant to approve.

The school was opened in the beginning of March, 1854. The crowd of grown females that sought admission on the first night, amounted to about twice the number the school could conveniently accommodate. The sisters made every exertion to reduce the number, by excluding those who could read or write, no matter how imperfectly; but the attempt was ineffectual on account of the persevering eagerness of all to remain. They rushed, and pushed, and cried, and begged, to be permitted to stay in the school. Organization, classification, arrangement of any kind were accordingly out of the question, and at the end of the first week, the sisters thought it the safest and most prudent course to close their doors altogether for a time. They hoped that the temporary closing of the school would allay the ardour of some of those who fought so hard to be admitted; and that the novelty of the thing would soon in a measure pass away. The school was, however, re-opened in a month, (in April), and the same old applicants with new and impetuous recruits in addition made their appearance. The sisters were then constrained to make such arrangements as would secure admission to all who came. They divided them into two classes. One class consisted of 250, who could read tolerably, and who were anxious to learn writing, arithmetic, &c.; and the other class was composed of 300 who could not read at all, and the greater number of whom did not know their letters. The former class attended on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and the latter class on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. The pupils of both classes were adults and very many of them were married women. This plan prevailed for a year, and in April, 1855, the school being then in perfect working order, the sisters determined to place their evening department in connexion with the Board of National Education. Previously, however, to their doing so, they sent away 150 of those who were most advanced, and reduced the school to 300, that all might attend the five nights of the week, and learn geography and arithmetic, as well as reading and writing. The Board of Education, oddly enough, was slow to recognise the claims of the school, and their grant, to which we shall refer hereafter, only dates as far back as June last.

We may now conduct the reader to the school and describe its operations. We visited it on a cold, rainy, cheerless evening in the early part of January. As we made our way towards the building, we found the streets empty, for the wind was biting, the rain cold and incessant, the footpaths heavy, the lamps flickering, and the atmosphere dark, thick, and sickening. Is there anything in the world, we thought, so attractive as to draw women who have been for twelve hours pent up in a mill to-day from their homes and firesides, and make them indifferent to the inclement blast of to-night? In all seriousness it was a dreadful night, and we were prepared to find the school-room empty. In this we were agreeably disappointed. When we entered the room at seven o'clock, there were 205 young persons there assembled; their work in the mills had ceased at six o'clock, and in the meantime, they had gone home, washed themselves, arranged their hair, and dress, and then made their way dark, and stormy as it was, from various and remote parts of the town in all comeliness, and cleanliness to school. There are two school-rooms in the establishment, a large one about fifty-five feet long, and twenty-five feet broad. In the latter room are the girls who have only recently entered, and who are still unable to read: in the large room are the girls who have passed the small one, or who have entered the school with some knowledge of reading. The rooms are plainly and humbly, but adequately furnished. Maps of every kind are suspended from the wall, the classes are well supplied with books at the expense of the nuns, the desks are of a convenient size, and well arranged upon the floor. The rules of the National Board of Education are conspicuously placed on the wall, over the principal rostrum, and the beautiful lesson published by the Commissioners, which inculcates christian charity and forbearance "to mankind of every description," is also in a prominent position in the rooms. The records of the school, with a register and a report book are so accurately and neatly kept, that a stranger finds no difficulty in comprehending them, and learning at a glance what has been the history and progress of the institution since its establishment. We wish that teachers generally had the book-keeping and statistical genius of the good nun who has charge of these records, for, if they had, the annals of education would be more complete and reliable than at present, and visitors to schools would be saved a world of trouble.

The pupils pay 1d. per week, and for this they receive instruction, books, pens, slates, &c., gratis. An unalterable rule of the school is, that no one deficient in personal cleanliness or questionable as to morals and general propriety can be admitted. The nasty and unwholesome practice of daubing the hair over with the oil of the machinery, and the refuse grease of the mills, has been entirely abandoned by the girls attending the evening classes, and this alone, as a social improvement, is most creditable to the discipline of the school.

The course of education is so limited and humble that a stranger to the wisdom that directed it might over hastily pronounce it worthless and incomplete. It consists simply of reading, writing, and the rudiments of grammar and geography. As far as practicable, no girl is admitted who already knows how to read; it was to make the ignorant wise, and not the wise wiser, that the school was opened. In 1851, there were no less than 1,563,636 females in this country who could neither read nor write, and Belfast had its own large proportion of these. It is the resolution of the Sisters of Mercy to reduce this terrible quota of ignorance, and a noble task they have undertaken to accomplish. As a rule, therefore, none are admitted to the evening school unless those who enter for the first, or lowest class. As soon as they advance to the 4th, or highest class, they are requested to retire from the school altogether to make room for outstanding applicants, of whom there are always on the books a considerable number. On an average it takes only about five months, a very remarkable fact, alike illustrative of the system of teaching and the diligence of the pupils, to lead a girl from the lowest to one of the highest classes. By this arrangement there is a regular influx and efflux of scholars, and a constant tide of intelligence making its way into the mills. There was an average on the school rolls of 425, and an average attendance of 275, for the last year. On the evening that we visited the school there were, as we have stated, 205 females present. Of these—

13 were 12 years of age.	29 were 18 years of age.
12 were 13 years of age.	19 were 19 years of age.
19 were 14 years of age.	14 were 20 years of age.
26 were 15 years of age.	9 were 21 years of age.
24 were 16 years of age.	4 were 22 years of age, and
29 were 17 years of age.	8 were 23 and above.

The average age is then about 18½ years—the very period of female life when moral danger is most imminent, when the affections and the passions are most active and least fixed, and the enemy to virtue sees in woman his richest prize. At such a stage in her life, Knowledge is offered as a shield of sweet protection, and the school in which the offering is made is as thronged as theatres in gayer places on gala nights. Of the moral phases of the school and the inducements to attend it, however, more presently. The employments during the day of those present were varied as follows:—

Working at mills . . . 180	Muslin Workers . . . 2
Servants . . . 5	Fruiterer . . . 1
Waistcoat maker . . . 1	Book-binder . . . 1
Dress makers . . . 5	Not employed . . . 10

The classification, according to the proficiency of the pupils, was as follows:—

- 25 in first Book (still unable to read).
- 63 in second do.
- 42 in the sequel to second Book.
- 46 in the third Book, and
- 29 in the fourth Book.

One hundred and seventeen were engaged at writing on paper, and, for apparently sound reasons, the nuns had relinquished in the evening school the practice of writing on slates—176 were learning the arithmetical tables—151 were learning the easy rule of mental arithmetic—29 were working at commercial arithmetic upon slates, and the latter girls were also employed in the study of the rudiments of grammar and political geography. The classes were examined, and we found 4 who could read with care and expression, and about 90 who could read with as much clearness and intelligibility as the general mass of educated people. 659 of those, who were able to read with sufficient fluency and expression, as to be characterized fair readers, had entered the school ignorant of the very letters of the alphabet; 22 girls had learned a fair share of the rudiments of grammar, and 29 were pretty intimately acquainted with the outlines of the maps of the world, Europe, America, Ireland, &c., &c. 30 girls were able to write a free and agreeable hand, and there were a few who had attained to a bold, clear, and gentlemanly style.

The order, attention, and neatness of the pupils were amongst the many remarkable and satisfactory features of the school; and the whole tone and ensemble appeared to be an expressive picture of industry, skill, efficiency, and happiness. The school is open to persons of all persuasions, few Protestants, unfortunately, avail themselves of the advantages the school affords. The rule of non-compulsion and non-interference in matters of religion is one of the fundamental regulations, and we believe that we have valid reasons for asserting, that the nuns would sooner quit their cloister and renounce their vocation than intrude upon the sanctity of conscience, or attempt, in this school, to alter the religion of any one. Their function, they say, is to rebuild the sanctuary of society—not to perpetuate the wreck by the introduction of any unholy engine of discord—in the school-room their task is to teach, not to preach—to reform, not to proselytize.

To coax people together for a temporal object, as for instance, for the purpose of educating them, or feeding them, or clothing them, and to have as a secret motive, for effecting those humane objects, the undermining of their religious principles, and the propagation of one's own faith, are practices so repugnant to the honor, openness, and dignity of Christianity, and sustained by reasonings so fanatical, and untenable, that we pause on them only to state our conviction, that a wise regulation in imitation of what has already been done in Prussia, Austria, and the Continental states, will, bye-and-bye, declare it to be felonious to entrap the conscience of a pupil at school or obtain a proselyte under false pretences. The development of national principle, decency, and intelligence will inevitably lead to this. We look on it as no mean testimony of the sanctity of their mission to see the sisters of Mercy, in Belfast, actuated by the high and glorious principle of non-compulsion and non-interference ; and, as far as we have been able to learn, the female religious orders in Ireland, generally pursue the same course.

The religious exercises of the school were confined to the recital of a simple and beautiful prayer, five minutes before the school dispersed, for the evening: and were we Mahomedans or Jews, instead of Christians, deeply interested in the moral culture and religious perfection of our fellow creatures, we do not know how we could have witnessed this large assemblage of females, on their knees, and heard, them in accents of sincerity and deep emotion, make the response to the prayer that was recited by the officiating nun, without heaving a hopeful sigh for humanity, and feeling that there are voices amongst the lowly and the unfortunate, the utterance of whose praise to God, is as fervent as the worship of angels, and as propitiatory as the outpourings of a martyr's heart. Deep, solemn and simultaneous came their responsive tones, that God might spare them to cultivate their intellect, and prepare them the better to enjoy His wisdom and His glory. At the time, we wished we had some statesman of heart, and noble purpose, by our side, that he might learn how achievements worthy of a nation's praise are often made outside the Senate House—far from the warrior's tent or the philosopher's retreat—and that great national good can be effected without the proscription of laws.

We wished him near us that, in the deep, loyal and angel-like, devotion of the creatures on their knees, he might see a claim for a statesman's solicitude, and might witness a scene which would impress him with the importance of making Female Adult Education part of a legislator's care.

Our opinion of the good this school is doing may be anticipated. The simple truth is, we have no human standard, by which to measure it.

Some of the sisters in the Order of Mercy are far away in the Crimea giving succour to our brave soldiers; the celebrated Mrs. Bridgeman, who won her first laurels in humanizing Kinsale, and distinguishing herself, as the most comprehensive and practical female educationist of her time, is the chief of the little band from Ireland—but we opine that the sisterhood of Belfast is effecting successes of a more lasting, and by no means a less merciful or urgent nature. It is not by the amount of reading, writing, or arithmetic which they learn, that the advantages conferred on those adult girls are to be estimated.

Gentleness of manners, peacefulness in their relations with their neighbours, love of order, the observance of the precepts of virtue, the avoidance of sectarian bitterness, and the upholding of the dignity and purity of their sex, are amongst the inestimable advantages gained from the admonitions and teachings of the nuns.

Those happy results have been already accomplished, and the sisters have received the most gratifying assurances, from mill owners and employers, that the increased intelligence of their works has not only made them now moral, and religious, but also more punctual, painstaking and laborious. The amiability, quiet manners, and good nature of most of those who were present on the evening of our visit, struck us very forcibly as we passed from class to class through the school. When those girls quit the school, finally, they become propagandists of those principles, which the nuns, their teachers, had led them to reverence and cherish: they become patterns of virtue to the mill girls, who work in the same room, and to the men and women who live under the same roof with them. The streets lose many a wandering tenant by night; and to the hearths of many a poor father and mother are preserved the daughters who, through ignorance, and wicked example, might otherwise be lost.

When females grow up in ignorance, their case is like that of a tender sapling that shoots high into the air in early spring, but falls beneath its own weight before the summer sun has time to strengthen and rectify it. There is a protecting staff required to sustain it, else the plant withers and dies away. Education steps in as the staff, and she is indeed a sweet messenger of mercy—lay or religious—that lifts the fallen plant from the ground, and turns its face upwards towards the God who made it. It is horrible to contemplate an ignorant multitude of men, or of men and women, but still more horrible to view an ignorant multitude, composed exclusively of females. Think of the 1,563,633 females which the last census shows us can neither read nor write, and then turn to the six or seven hundred which we find one community able to train and educate annually, to diminish by so many, the frightful return of the census report. What a national good is here effected! There are upwards of one hundred and forty nunneries in Ireland, about forty of them belonging to the Sisters of Mercy, and if each Convent, were even these of the Order of Mercy only, to imitate their sisters in Belfast, who could calculate the results in the aspect of the social, moral, and religious phases of our people.

How does it happen, however, that the young women congregate about the nuns in Belfast in such numbers—in such numbers, in fact, that the nuns are obliged to keep a register of applicants and make it a prize to obtain admission—whilst adult education languishes elsewhere, and female evening education is almost unattempted! A sentence explains the secret. Because it requires either great individual enthusiasm on the part of noblemen, landlords, philanthropists, &c., or the higher enthusiasm created by religious influences and associations to kindle the flame in the first instance, and afterwards to keep it alive. Much as we should desire to see knowledge appreciated for its own sake, we are, withal, bound to confess, that in the case of ignorant adults, jaded, weary, and feverish after twelve hours' hard work in a mill, it is no wonder that they require some extraordinary stimulus to induce them to leave their homes, and still less wonder that the magnet which attracts to the blessed ways of Heaven, should also lead them captive to the temples of knowledge. Ladies, too, have reliance upon the competency of the nuns to discharge their duties; they know them to be persons of a superior education, purely disinterested in their motives, and bound by solemn vows to pursue education and the acts of mercy—without fee or reward—as the business of their lives. Mr. Joseph Kay, in his Social Condition and Education of the People, vol. 2, 399, thus expresses himself as to the fitness and success of the nuns who had charge of the schools in Switzerland:—

“At the present time it may be truly said, that in nearly the whole of Switzerland, every boy and girl, below the age of seventeen years, can read and write. The education of the girls is in perhaps a more satisfactory condition in the Catholic Cantons than in the Protestant. It is confided to the special care of the nuns, and, I can bear testimony, to the gentle, patient, and religious spirit in which these excellent women affectionately tend the progress of the young girls. The self-denying life which the Catholic nuns lead, and the excellent education which they receive in the nunneries, admirably suit them for the important duties confided to their charge in the Cantons. After examining the schools conducted by some of the sisters in Fribourg, the abbess of the nunnery, to which the nuns who had charge of the female schools belonged, allowed me, in company with a very intelligent priest, with whom I had been spending some days, to visit the nunnery. We went over it in company with one of the sisters. When I entered, I found myself in presence of about twenty of the nuns, who, under the direction of a very venerable old abbess, of about eighty years of age, were seated in the entrance hall, engaged in making clothes for the poor.

The apartments of the sisters were of the plainest possible description. They were in beautiful order and perfectly clean; but furnished very meagrely, and literally destitute of everything that was not absolutely necessary. The sisters have no servants and no assistants. They prepare their own food, clean their own chambers, take charge by turns of the dining-room, hall, and room of the abbess, and, in fact, perform by turns, all the humblest duties of domestic servants. They, at the same time, give a very excellent education to the young persons destined to take the veil, comprising, reading, writing, arithmetic, history, geography, grammar, and singing. The novitiates are, therefore, in every way admirably prepared for the duties of instruction which they undertake after having taken the veil, whilst the humble life to which they are accustomed during the years of their novitiate, and during the rest of their lives, in turn with their other sisters, make them admirably well qualified for intercourse with the poor, and renders them patient, gentle and persevering in their efforts in their schools. They certainly are living examples of the class of teachers a good training is capable of producing."

It is natural, therefore, that the poor mill girls should throng in such numbers around the nuns; for in addition to having all the merciful and zealous qualifications reported by Mr. Kay of the Swiss nuns, they have, it is generally understood, a much higher claim to distinction than their continental sisters, as scholars and teachers.

This school, as we have stated, is a National School in connexion with the Board of Education.

It is national in every sense, for it has great public good for its object, and its object it happily attains. The principles of the Board are paramount in it—no interference, no bamboozing into an unwelcome religion by fear or entreaty, by profession or covert design. We have never met with people more intensely abhorrent of all proselytising notions than the nuns, and we are bound in all candour and justice to make this statement as public as we can. Finding their usefulness so unparalleled, their principles so identical with those of the Board, their discipline and method of teaching so much in consonance with our idea of the National system, and their labours so very great, we were certainly astonished at the inadequate grant the Commissioners have made the school—£7 per annum for every hundred adults in actual average attendance rightly, or about £8 10s. for every hundred on the roll. There are seven nuns regularly engaged, and this gives exactly ten shillings to each for every hundred she teaches, or something less than a penny-farthing per head per annum. Yet there are people so utterly blinded by a spirit of pugnacity and intolerance as to rail at the Board for endowing convents. Endowing them indeed!! The grant to the Belfast Evening School hardly pays for the gas consumed. However, there are odd people in the world. Those who are opposed to the National System think that the convent ought to be denied participation in the public grants, because grants are refused to schools conducted by Protestants on proselytising principles. And these good opponents, forsooth, fancy that there is a parity between their case and that of the nuns. In what does it consist? The nuns enter in all heartiness into the spirit and letter of the system; offer obedience and respect to its rules, open their doors to children of all denominations, and solemnly guarantee that the wishes and scruples of parents shall be respected, and that the religion of no one shall be tampered with. The opponents to the system, on the contrary, condemn and stigmatize the rules of the Board, refuse their allegiance to the system, and repudiate its principles, found and maintain an institution in open hostility to the system, and close their doors to children of all denominations, unless they yield themselves up, body and soul, to whatever mysteries, prayers, and dogmas may be preached and recited in their schools. Is this a parity? It is asserted that B is black and W is white, and, because it is so, the opponents of the national system asseverate that B and W are incorporate, identical, and entitled to the same privilege. For sagacious people we must certainly pronounce this to be a very childish dialectic delusion.

We shall not, however, enter further into the general question of sustaining the Convent National Schools out of the public funds. It is a question of little or no complication, and in its proper place can be easily disposed of in a paragraph or two.

We allude to it here simply because the smallness of the grant to the Belfast school suggests the necessity of exposing the absurdity of the cry that the Education Commissioners are endowing the convents. The nuns support themselves. They have generally ample means for the purpose, but they think, legitimately enough, that their school ought to be supported out of the funds granted by Parliament for the purpose of National Education. We trust that the award to this school is only experimental, and that, as soon as the Commissioners become cognizant of its immense public advantages, they will, by making a commensurate grant, encourage others to embark in the merciful enterprize of Adult Female Education.

When the evening business had concluded we entered into earnest conversation with the Superioress and the sister in charge of the school. They saw their success, but feared to name it so. We have seldom met with persons who were better fitted for their positions and their high and peculiar duties. The Superioress was affable, learned, and accomplished; she had a countenance expressive of an enduring enthusiasm; no project that was destined to make her fellow creatures wiser and better was too formidable for her; no check, no baulk, nor cross, nor frustration could apparently sink her heart or diminish her hopefulness. Her voice was of that right womanly kind, it was sweet, firm, and impressive; and she moved from class to class amongst her devoted pupils with the dignity and gentleness of a hostess passing from guest to guest, and had a smile and a word for each, that all might feel the assurance of her welcome and her desire to make them happy. The sister who had charge of the school was one of the cleverest and most practical teachers we ever met. Her brow was radiant with intelligence; she was thoughtful, inventive, and eminently preceptive; her features were naturally vivacious, but subdued and softened by discipline and religion. She knew the name and could tell something interesting of every pupil in the school; her heart and soul were lost and absorbed in the glorious mission of her life; and her mind was of that delicately cultivated order that she was esthetical whilst saying or doing the most commonplace things.

We were anxious that our memorandum book should contain the names of two such benefactors of the human race ; but true worth, instead of wishing its laudation often defaces the recording word of praise engraven on the tablet. We could only learn that the superioress bore the name of Mother Mary Philomena, and from the skilful, learned, and intelligent superintendent of the school, we could gather no more than that in religion, she bore the name of Mary Borgia. Mary Philomena, uttered her name as the proud title of some sainted one, she would imitate, and Mary Borgia whispered her title in religion, as the name of some one in the Calendar of Heaven, whom she felt it her glory and her privilege to revere.

There were seven sisters present on the occasion of our visit, and, in addition, the superioress of a neighbouring convent (at Downpatrick,) who happened to have had business in town, was also present, and efficiently acted as a volunteer in the good work. We have seen the best training institutions, and visited the highest order of schools ; but we are bound to confess that the Belfast evening school is of a kind entirely different from those in which the education of the poor is usually conducted. When we were returning from the school, we observed a large number of the school girls standing waiting in the hall ; they were waiting for ointments, plasters, &c., which the nuns were distributing amongst them for maimed or sick relatives at home, or for ailments of their own ; and thus do these christian teachers, complete the beautiful mission of their lives, by adding the last link to the long chain of the attributes of mercy.

In addition to the great school which we have just described, there are a few other evening schools in Belfast ; but, like those of Dublin and elsewhere in Ireland, they are merely gasping for life, and are attended more by children who ought to be at day-schools than by men and women whose early education has been neglected ; they are mere speculations, and bad ones, of the poor teachers ; come into existence, live fretfully, pine and die away, without eliciting the pound of the Capitalist, the sympathy of the Philanthropist, the interest of the clergy, or the countenance of the public ; for all are equally indifferent to the national good on this question. Dublin has the wretched old excuse of a metropolis that has little or nothing to say to the manufacturing operative ; but Belfast has no such apology for its neglect. We are saddened to find our great manufacturing town so slow to acknowledge its duty in reference to those who are ignorant,—whether children or adults—and we are as much astonished as grieved to find a town, once in the enjoyment of the pet name of the Athens of Ireland without a Mechanics' Institute, or anything analogous to one for the elementary instruction of young artisans and labourers. There are young men's societies, religious societies, reading rooms, &c., all very good in their way, and no doubt creditable to their promoters and conductors; but it is, nevertheless, a patent fact, and a very deplorable one too, that there is little or no provision for the elementary education of an adult. The existence of an evening school in connection with the convent, we suppose can only be traced to the zeal and enterprise of its own conductors: the town, as a municipality, has done nothing for adult education. It takes sage men to make a town great, but it takes sager to keep it so. The seducing jingle of the gold must not lull men into an unconsciousness of their duty, or an obliviousness of their sins of omission; and yet we fear that when the censor, a watchful public man, upbraids,

With speedy help doth lend redress.”

This state of things, however, will not do and cannot last long. Mill owners must tread the way to the school-house as well as to the exchange or bank—and they must, for their own sakes, and in the interest of humanity, take care that their mills shall not be huge depositories of moral and intellectual wretchedness.—The immortal Milton called the forefathers of the great men of Belfast, “highland thieves and redshanks,” and fixed the geography of their town “in a barbarous nook of Ireland.” History has shown that the stigmas were unjust, but if the mill workers of the town are forced, through want of opportunity, to remain buried and lost in their ignorance, we fear that the writers of some other time may be looking back at the corner which Belfast occupies as indeed “in a barbarous nook of Ireland.” We trust that the path has only to be pointed out, and that their good sense will lead the Belfast merchants for the honour of their country to pursue it. The school we have described will be an incentive to them to establish similar institutions in the town; and we can fortunately point to a school in the neighbourhood of Belfast that in many respects is one well worthy of imitation. Long before school organizations were so perfect as they now are, Miss Grimshaw had a nightly gathering of some of the female workers of her father's mill, in the National School of the village of Whitehouse. This village is about two miles from Belfast, and is the first station which is met on the Belfast and Ballymena Railway; and perhaps the comfort and comparative independence which the people of the village can boast of, through the kindness and consideration of its factory proprietors, are only minor blessings compared with the good fortune they have for years back enjoyed in the beneficent interest taken in the education of themselves and their children by Miss Grimshaw. With the assistance of a few friends, this excellent lady was able to gather together for instruction a goodly muster of the mill girls every evening. She classified and arranged them in due working order. The number of pupils was not very considerable, and this in many respects was an advantage at the commencement of the experiment; for the school assumed the appearance of a family group, in which words of confidence could be spoken and friendly chidings made without much exposure.

Miss Grimshaw and her friends taught many a poor mill girl how to read and write; how to use a Bible or a prayer book: or to communicate with a father and mother far away. There was no price paid by those poor mill girls for what they received; it was not an affair of barter; no offering of conscience or gold. The good Protestant benefactor saw the victory that was before her, and she saw that it was to be won, if worth the winning, by respecting religious scruples and deferentially regarding a religious conviction as unpurchaseable and outside the circle of commercial exchanges. She went night after night to meet her pupils; and by perseverance, by sacrifice, by enthusiasm and by labor, she succeeded in spreading a taste for education amongst the mill workers of the locality—This taste for the acquirement of knowledge, naturally spread to the young men who were engaged in the mills, and to satisfy their desires, and to extract the advantages of the school as much as possible, a department for boys was soon opened—This led to the regular appointment of Teachers, and to the retirement from the position she had so ably and so humanely filled, of Miss Grimshaw—Since then she has been an active patroness of the school; to her continued support, is to be attributed much of its present efficiency and success. The school now consists of boys and girls indiscriminately; about one-half of the number in attendance being girls—a system by the way which we look on as extremely dangerous and to be always avoided if possible—but arising in the Whitehouse school, we presume, from the difficulty of procuring a really superior mistress to conduct the Female department. There are three Teachers, one male, the principal, assisted by two females and a paid monitor, a Catholic, and a little more than half the pupils are also Catholics. There is no religious instruction given at the evening school; the special object of the evening being to develop their hearts and intellects, and to prepare their understandings for the exhortations of their respective pastors. The average attendance numbers about 60, the average in the book 110, and the average age of the pupils about 15 years. The grant to the school made by the Commissioners of National Education, is £10 annually, independent of books at reduced rates and free stock; and there being 110 pupils on the books and 3 teachers in the schools this shows that each teacher receives only about  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per head per annum for each pupil.

The state does not always obtain its prizes at so nominal a cost, sevenpence farthing, (a penny farthing in the Callender-street School,) for the tuition of an adolescent for a year!!! As a financial curiosity which has been hitherto denied the light, we publish this fact; but whilst our feeling is partly regretful, that the grant is so small, we must state that it is also in a large degree a hopeful one, that the wisdom of the Board will soon lead them to deal more generously with adult evening schools. This little school at Whitehouse is performing its work nobly; it is held in a building which, in the year 1832, was amongst the first upon which the inscription "National School" was ever placed; and it is under the immediate supervision of one who passes by the door of her fellow-creatures, not with the high airs in which fashion would warrant her to indulge, but with the meek and assuasive influence of a messenger of peace and of comfort.

In bringing this brief narrative of what Belfast is doing, and not doing, in respect to Adult Female Education to a termination, we have only to express our extreme anxiety, that the discussion of the question to which our paper refers, may soon become familiar to the pen of the educationist, the reflections of the philanthropist, and the deliberations of the Statesman.

ART. VIII.—IRISH FISHERIES.

Opinions of the Press on a Pamphlet by Thomas Edward Symonds, R.N., on which is based the proceedings of the London and West of Ireland Fishing and Fish Manure Company. Published by Chapman and Hall, 193, Piccadilly. Dublin: J. M'Glashan, Sackville-street; Hodges and Smith, and W. B. Kelly, Grafton-street. 1856.

Within the small compass of six years, we have seen spring up, arrive at the full maturity of their fungus growth, and die out hopelessly, five, indeed, we may say six different political Societies, (for there are few so bold as to affirm that the Tenant League exhibits any substantial evidence of vitality,) created with much apparent, and it may be with much actual sincerity, to work out comprehensive ameliorations for the Irish race. Fame, with her thousand tongues proclaimed the future success of all; the Liberal Press teemed daily with high-flown eulogiums on their admirable principles, and spoke glowingly of their practical tendencies, and of the noble achievements which were to crown the labors of those who upheld and disseminated their doctrines. They have, however, vanished like shadows, leaving behind them no good result, save and except the experience which they have given us of their utter unfitness to carry out the objects which they were intended to accomplish. Our bitter knowledge of these unpalatable facts must make us hail with tenfold the pleasure which we should feel under different circumstances, the appearance of a Society amongst us so well calculated as is "The London and West of Ireland Fishing and Fish Manure Company," to improve the condition of a large portion of our people, to encourage habits of industry in a country where such encouragement has been so necessary, and to invite so many capitalists to our shores; and this not only by the peculiar nature of such a Company, but, also by the business-like manner in which its affairs are to be conducted. The inexhaustible supply of the most wholesome and nutritious fish which the Coasts of Ireland afford, has been no discovery of a modern date; it is a fact which has been known for centuries. We are told by Captain Symonds, the Managing Director of this excellent Company, that "Philip the Second of Spain paid into the Irish treasury £1,000 for liberty to fish on the Irish Coast."

"In the reign of Charles the First, the Dutch were allowed a similar license on the payment of £30,000, and they founded a fishing establishment on the Island of Innis Boffin, off the Mayo Coast, where many of the descendants of the Dutch settlers are to be found at the present day.

"In 1650, Sweden was permitted as a favor to employ one hundred vessels in the Irish fishery.

"About the year 1800, the Americans fitted out a vessel, and fished the Irish Coast for three years. The result of the experiment was that, if the permission of the British Government could be obtained, they would settle on the coast for the purpose of carrying out a fishery, and were ready to bring £100,000, if so permitted, requiring neither premium nor bounty. However, the permission was not granted, and so the proposition fell to the ground."

In the Morning Post for September 6th 1855, we have seen an extract from a report made by Mr. Tuke, who says:—

"While standing on the magnificent cliffs at Achill, overlooking the wide Atlantic, I saw the deep inlets and bays of that island literally filled with shoals of mackerel and herring, indeed the whole surface of the sea seemed completely alive with them. Around me stood groups of hungry creatures, who looked down upon this inexhaustible supply of food, wholly unable to procure it to allay their cravings. One fishing-boat, or three or four curraghs, alone were engaged, where there was employment for hundreds, and food for thousands of hungry creatures on the island."

In the same paper, an extract from Colonel Thompson's evidence given before the Government Commission in 1836, informs us that "The fish on the coast, from Achill Head to Galway, would supply all Ireland. It is a fact not generally known, that about 200,000*l.* is annually paid by Ireland for Scotch herrings, although there is around her shores not only an ample supply for her own consumption, but also sufficient to form an article of export were proper means adopted to render this bountiful supply available."

Every description of fish is to be found on the Coast of Ireland; turbot, sole, brill, plaice, dorys, lobsters, ling, eels, mackerel, salmon, herrings, and sprats. Captain Symonds tells us that simply from want of buyers, turbot are often cut up for bait; he also adds:—

"That at Innis Boffin, on the Galway coast, an acquaintance of his made a bargain to purchase turbot of a man who himself bought them from the fishermen. To meet these two profits he paid eighteen shillings per dozen of thirteen turbot, and the fish were of the finest quality, and from nine pounds to twenty-six pounds in weight. In England they were probably selling at the same time for about thirty shillings apiece. On the spot no doubt it answered better to sell them even at this price than that the fishing-boats should be obliged to leave their proper business and run, perhaps against the wind and tide, fifty miles to the Galway market on the chance of a better."

In a report made in 1855, by Mr. Howard, a gentleman largely engaged in the fisheries of the North Sea, and the Coast of Norway, he states, (speaking of the Southern Coast from Cork to Berehaven)—

"I have no hesitation in saying, that, both as regards quantity and quality, the banks off the coasts and the Irish shores are richer in fish of all descriptions than those of any country I have ever seen. On returning from Berehaven to Bantry, we came by boat, and literally rowed across that fine bay through a bank of herrings. I feel confident that with nets such as those used in Scotland, the Isle of Man, or on the Cornish coast, 40,000 barrels might have been taken that night. In fact, the coast was swarming, and if properly fished would rival Scotland in her annual take."

In the winter of 1854, we are informed, Captain Symonds fished between the Saltees and Helvick Head, on the Coast of Waterford, exploring the more distant grounds, and collecting all particulars about the south-eastern fisheries.

"Twenty-five trawlers fished in company, and all had taken an average quantity, but the wind blowing off shore, they were not enabled to make Dunmore in proper time to send the fish by rail for the Dublin market on Friday. They had from ten to fifteen tons, chiefly turbot, sole, brett, early plaice, cod, &c., which might have been bought for 5*l.* a ton, though in any of the good markets the ton would have readily fetched from 20*l.* to 25*l.* In summer, the take would have been almost profitless if the weather were equally unfavourable, the more delicate fish running to taint on the second day. Though the weather was very bad, the trawler of forty tons, in which Mr. Symonds was, cleared nearly 40*l.* in three weeks, and during that period threw overboard five tons of unsaleable fish, out of which M. de Molon, of Finisterre, would have manufactured prime fishguano, worth at least 12*l.* a ton."

The following extract from a letter, written by Eneas MacDonnell, to the Editor of "The Dublin Evening Mail," and in which reference is made to the valuable pamphlet of Captain Symonds, will make manifest among many other agreeable disclosures, the very great variety of fish to be found along the Western Coast of Ireland. Mr. MacDonnell received some valuable assistance in his researches from Mr. J. Redmond Barry, the Commissioner of Irish Fisheries, to whose excellent judgment he bears willing testimony :—

“I shall now turn to the publication issued by Captain Symonds. Referring to the supply of fish on the west coast of Ireland, Captain Symonds observes, (page 17)—‘It is notorious that all writers on this subject, during the past and present century, agree on the most essential point—the abundant supply of every description of fish and shell-fish, and that it only needs proper boats and gear, common energy and skill, to capture any quantity.’

This opinion is fully borne out by the result of every experiment, government or otherwise, up to the present date.

The Committee of the British Association for extending the fisheries of Ireland and Scotland, made an experiment on the west coast to test this point in 1847, and report as follows :—

‘The Committee are of opinion that the fisheries on this coast may be successfully developed so as to afford a considerable profit on the capital employed by carrying out effectually the principle of the government curing stations. That principle is to afford a steady price to the fishermen for the fish which they may catch. The agents of the government curing-stations have been restricted as to price, and, also, as to the kind of fish they should purchase ; turbot, and all other fish not fit for curing, has not been purchased, and as this class of fish is the most abundant on that coast, it has followed that no sufficient stimulus was given to induce the fishermen to go out.’

Captain Bennett, the gentleman who conducted this experiment, adds—‘I am satisfied from the quality of the fish, the abundance of it on the coast (even in the unseasonable time of year we commenced the fishery, cod and ling being out of season), that with perseverance and due exertion, and an adequate provision of gear, &c., laid in and kept on hand, that the next season’s fishing would realise a profit exceeding fifty per cent., and that the natives would cheerfully and immediately present themselves to embark in the undertaking. We have turbot, soles, brill, plaice, lobster, crabs, &c., in abundance.’

Captain Symonds states (page 28), ‘Periwinkles, collected near the Isle of Sky, on the coast of Scotland, are carried in steam-boats to Glasgow, and are found to pay railway carriage to London for sale in Hungerford Market ; also, mussels are sent from Exmouth, in Devonshire, to London per rail.’ In page 29, he adds, that ‘many of the largest dealers in fish in the United Kingdom have expressed an anxious desire to see increased supplies coming from Ireland, stating that such was the growing demand for fresh fish in the interior of the country, that every new line of railway opened additional markets far beyond the present means of supply.’ Again (page 30), ‘Mr. Leonard, a respectable owner of several fishing vessels out of the port of Dublin, is quite convinced of the abundance of fish there (the north-west coast), and also of herrings and sun-fish.’

‘The idea has gone forth that the herring has forsaken the western shores of Ireland; this is, however, far from being the case, having witnessed the contrary on several occasions, and received abundant satisfactory proofs of the same from parties incapable of deception. . . . The fact is, that they have always been on the coast, though not embaying in the same numbers or localities as heretofore, and on their coming to unusual places, nets have not been procurable until they were departing. One instance of this occurred in Clew Bay last year. In others, where they had no means of buying nets, they were altogether unmolested. Had the natives boats and nets fit for deep water, it would be found that the herring fishery on the west coast is second to none; and from its numerous islands in the deep sea, and good harbours, is peculiarly adapted to it, and possesses facilities for prosecuting it no other coast can boast of.*

Captain Symonds states, in equally favourable terms, the abundant supply of cod, ling, turbot, haddock, soles, dorey, mackerel, and bait on the west coast of Ireland; as also sun-fish or basking-shark, and lobster, observing, that 'in no country in the world are lobsters more numerous, or in greater perfection, than on the coast of Ireland, especially the west and north-west; and if the fishery was properly worked, and means devised for preventing the capture of the young, the supply would be sufficient for all the markets of the United Kingdom that now have recourse to foreign sources.'

I shall now set forth a list of the fishes and shell-fish of Clew Bay, according to my recollection, and favoured by the revision of a gentleman particularly well qualified to correct any errors:—

Turbot, sole, plaice, brett or brill, flounder, fluke, john-dorey, ray, skate, bream, herrings, salmon, white trout, mullet, cod, ling, hake, haddock, mackerel, grey gurnet, red gurnet, whiting, sprat, black pollock, white pollock, coal fish* or glassen, dogfish, halibut, conger eels, sand eels, smelts, pilchard, whilks (bait), lug (do.), lobster, crab, oysters, large scollop, small scollop, cloosheen, razor-fish, cockles, mussels, shrimps, perriwinkles, craw-fish, prawn.

Clew Bay is frequented, also, by sun-fish or basking sharks, seals, and angel sharks.

It produces slouck or laver, dillisk, cranagh, carrigeen moss, seaweed for manure or the manufacture of kelp, shell sand or gruanogh, and samphire. As I trust that you will favour me with the admission of another letter upon those interesting subjects, I shall not now trespass further upon your indulgence than to state, that shortly after the visit of the British Association to Dublin, I dined in the company of that distinguished artist, the late Sir David Wilkie, who, in reply to some inquiries as to his route in Ireland, said that after the business was concluded, he proceeded to the west, reached a town called Westport, and ascended a hill in the neighbourhood; that he had seen the Bay of Naples, and other bays, and picturesque scenery in Italy and other parts of Europe, but that none of them equalled the scene then before him. I thanked him, in the name of * Coal-fish in England, glassen in Ireland. The young glassen may be taken in large quantities, and produce a large quantity of oil, my native place, and asked his permission to mention the fact, which he freely gave—and again subsequently, in his own house, saying that I might repeat it wherever and whenever I chose, for it was perfectly true.

I am, Sir, &c., &c., &c.,

ENEAS MACDONNELL.

Rathmines, September 1, 1855."

These facts being made evident to us, how painful does not the reflection on a calculation which we have also quoted become, namely, that "about £200,000 is annually paid by Ireland for Scotch herrings." In order that the pecuniary advantages resulting from an extended development of these resources may be perceptible, it is only necessary that we should cast our eyes over the Prospectus of the Society, which contains a declaration signed by the principal fish dealers, whether as factors, salesmen, or retail fishmongers, carrying on business in Billingsgate Market, which states that "the present supply of the principal kinds of fish to the London Market is not equal to the demand," and that, "such supply being extremely irregular, they frequently sustain loss." But let us now see in what that insufficiency consists, which we are enabled to discover by referring to the Billingsgate return of fish for 1850. In that year, there were sold in Billingsgate,—

"203,000 salmon; 400,000 live cod; 750,000 barrelled cod; 1,600,000 salt cod; 2,470,000 fresh haddocks; 19,500,000 smoked haddocks; 97,520,000 soles; 23,620,000 mackerel; 8,375,000 fresh herrings; 50,000,000 red herrings; 147,000,000 bloaters; 17,920,000 whittings; 86,600,000 plaice; 800,000 turbot; 1,220,000 brills and mullet; 495,896,000 oysters; 1,200,000 lobsters; 600,000 crabs; 498,428,628 prawns; 9,797,760 eels; making of fish alone, a total of 402,978,000, besides some 10 millions of eels, near 500 millions of oysters, the same quantity of prawns, and near 2 millions of lobsters and crabs."

It is cheerful to find that a plan has already been set on foot, and will soon be in working order, which bids fair to remedy the negligence which has so long been causing the non-development of those splendid fisheries. In a pamphlet the excellence of which cannot be too highly praised, Captain Symonds, to whose office as Managing Director of "The London and West of Ireland Fishing Company" we have already alluded, furnishes us with a very lucid statement of the manner in which the designs of the Company are to be carried out, and we feel it impossible to refrain from expressing our great admiration at the adaptability of the means, or rather at the intelligence which devised them. Galway has been made the base of operations, and we think that in this there has been much judgment evinced. Its geographical position is particularly advantageous. "Situated at the head of a magnificent Fishing Bay thirty miles long, and seven miles broad," as we are informed by Captain Symonds, "abounding with fish and bait of every species, with good harbours, and a fishing population of 7,297 men, 497 boys, with 1,811 boats, and extensive salmon and white trout rivers, from which the fish may be cheaply obtained;" there is no reason why Galway should not be one of the most flourishing fisheries in Europe. "There is," adds Captain Symonds, "great local demand for both fresh and cured fish, (especially for that of an inferior class, which would not always pay carriage to another market); good and capacious docks, with any amount of storage and building for curing houses at a moderate rent, and cheap markets for provisions; a railway within six hours of Dublin, eighteen of Birmingham, and twenty of London. The Capital to be expended is £30,000."

There are to be at least six Directors, and not more than ten for the Management; to conduct local affairs two persons will be employed, having a thorough acquaintance with the subject, whose salaries are in a great measure to depend on the profits of the concern, and who will hold a certain amount of shares.

The floating Establishment will consist of Vessels of from seventy-five to eighty tons, some of which will be fitted with wells to keep the fish, lobsters, and bait alive. A smaller class of Vessels will also be employed of from twenty-five to thirty tons, for the drift net fishing. Some of these will also have wells for inshoal, turbot, trout, and long line fishing. There will also be row boats, from thirty to thirty-five feet long, for the bay-herring, mackerel, seine net, and other fishing.

Besides these, there will be a fore and aft schooner well boat, with an auxiliary screw, for transporting fish and lobsters from the fishing banks or outlying stations; a curing station, with smoking house and oil works, with appliances for making manure, and ice-houses for packing fish in ice in warm weather; and to crown all, a steam Carrier for conveying the fish, purchased from the poor fishermen, and for prosecuting the valuable

Sun fishing, the oil of which fish is estimated as worth £40, and for other useful purposes.

It is also intended to convert the coarser kind of fish, and such as are of an unsaleable abundance, into an artificial guano of a very rich description, which in itself will be a great source of profit, and will form an article by which the impoverished lands on our Western Sea board may be considerably enriched. We will now proceed to quote a few passages from an article in "The Field," respecting Captain Symonds' able brochure.

"The importance of this field of industry has been fully appreciated in France, although it has not been sufficiently attended to in this country. M. Payen, the agriculturist, and M. Pommier, the chemist, made a report of the manufactory of M. de Molon to the French Agricultural Society. This establishment is at Concarneau, in the department of Finisterre, and the experiments which have been carried on for a period of four years have proved most satisfactory. The fish is first boiled, the water and oil extracted, and the remainder then dried and reduced to powder. Repeated analyses showed that this powder was nearly as rich as the best Peruvian guano, the chief ingredients of which consisted of ammonia, comprising 15 to 16 per cent., and of phosphate of lime 22 per cent.; while in the dried fish there was 12 per cent. of nitrogen and 14 per cent. of bone-earth. This manure was eagerly bought by the French farmers at the rate of 8*l.* a ton, or about one-third less than the price of the best Peruvian guano. M. de Molon is about to establish a manufactory at Lowestoft, in Suffolk, which it is to be hoped may prove as successful as the original establishment, and be the means of introducing into this country a new source of national wealth and industry.

The subject of fish manure has also now assumed additional importance from the proposed operations of the London and West of Ireland Fishing Company—a subject treated very ably in a pamphlet on the Fisheries of the West Coast of Ireland by Captain T. E. Symonds, R.N. The enormous value of these fisheries is clearly demonstrated; and while carrying out this part of the plans, the company propose also to make use of all refuse matter, as well as the coarser kinds of fish, in the manufactory of a manure, the properties of which, as stated above, almost place it on a level with the best guano. In Professor Way's lecture on the subject he observed it was a question only of a supply of the raw material, not of any difficulty in the process of manufacture; and Captain Symonds answers this by collecting all the information possible from the best sources to show that the supply was almost inexhaustible.

Here, then, we have a satisfactory solution of the only doubt upon this subject, the question of supply. It may or may not be a fact that the deposits of guano are inexhaustible; but circumstances may arise to intercept the supply, which would be productive of the most serious consequences. It is fortunate, then, that the conversion of fish into a manure is attracting attention. A new source of industry will thus be created, our soil enriched by employing products of our own shores, and increased occupation thrown open for the working classes, in addition to the almost imperative necessity there appears to be for obtaining new raw materials for the manufacture of manure; for, as Professor Way justly observes, 'without this a term would be reached when the competition for manufactured manures, with an insufficient supply, would raise the price up to the extreme limits at which their use would be remunerative. For a time the deficiency would be met by adulteration and inferiority of the article, and this, together with the scramble to get manure, would soon wean farmers from their partiality to artificial manures. Then indeed the progress of agriculture in this country—at all events, in the use of artificial manures—would receive a serious check. He did not wish to draw a gloomy picture; but such a state of things must inevitably result if the increasing demand for manures was not met with some new and abundant supply of the raw material.

The subject of our home fisheries, in addition to its immense importance as a question of food-supply, thus assumes a high and national character. We can only hope that success may attend every endeavour that is made to increase and improve our own sources of national industry and wealth."

Another considerable advantage which will accrue from the working of this excellent design will be the employment of the immense fishing population of Galway and Mayo, who, owing to the smallness of their boats, and to the insufficiency of their gear, have been unable to avail themselves of the rare advantages of their valuable fisheries.

Nor does Captain Symonds foresee any disadvantage to arise from the employment of the Claddagh fishermen. On the contrary he bears testimony to their peaceable and orderly demeanour, and to their fitness to the task allotted to them.

"I feel satisfied," says this intelligent gentleman, "that, with judicious treatment, these men may be made a valuable acquisition to the Company by employing them in the different branches, with leading fishermen from either the English or Irish banks to command, by which means the vessels will be sailed much cheaper, and the ground more efficiently fished than by strangers."

And, he adds his belief that, with all these facilities of nature and art, and with the application of enterprise and capital, Galway can be made to rival those towns in Holland, whose wealth and prosperity originated in much smaller beginnings, far less accessible to them than those at the disposal of our own fishing population.

Here at last we have a practical undertaking whose future success is obvious, and for which we have to thank the Limited Liability Bill. In this uniform system our mind are not dazzled by the presence of imposing theories, or perplexed by the enunciation of scientific wonders. Its beautiful simplicity can be comprehended by all, and the most minute details of its principles bear the stamp of usefulness impressed upon them. In such a part of Ireland as Galway, where habits of practical industry, (notwithstanding the many good and noble qualities of its people) have never been remarkably prominent, a society such as the one under our consideration, must of necessity be productive of good and plentiful fruits, in the incentives to active industry which it will supply. The genealogical talent of the people may be more profitably employed in studying the substantial peculiarities of the finny tribes, than in discussing the relative merits to ancestral distinction of the human tribes of that Milesian Colony, and the reclamation by means of artificial guano, of the swampy marsh, and the barren moor, will be a more laudable employment, than either laying out race courses, or enclosing deer parks. The indolent nature of the Celt has long been the pet expression which flew to every Englishman's lips whenever the subject of Ireland's grievances have been mooted; it has come down to us, hand in hand, with that triumph of alliteration, "Pigs, Priests, Politics, and Potatoes;" though the unequalled industry of our countrymen, in France, in England, and in America, have made it evident to the world, that circumstances, and not nature, were the causes which prevented its appearance in our native country.

We have now given us an excellent opportunity of still more strongly exhibiting the injustice of the calumny, and that opportunity is afforded us by the people, who, hitherto ignorant of our real character, have attributed to us vices which their experience of us will shortly teach them were less natural than acquired. If this project succeeds, and for its success we need seek no higher pledge than the fact of having such a man as Commander Symonds as its managing director, we have every just reason to suppose that the rest of our well-sheltered and capacious Sea Ports will become more known and more appreciated; and that with that knowledge and that appreciation, will come some practical measures for the benefit of the commercial world, and the employment of the impoverished but hardy population which lives along their shores. Irrespective of the vast agricultural resources of Ireland, its highly valuable mineral productions are of a nature sufficiently attractive to tempt speculation to any extent, were their localities but rendered accessible to the merchant vessel or the waggon. Nor would this be a task of insurmountable difficulty. Into the very waters of that Bay, which has been chosen as the fitting spot upon which to carry out a great fishing enterprise, Lough Corrib flows. Were there but a channel or canal large enough to float vessels of a few tons burthen, cut for a distance of two or three miles, the navigation of the Corrib would be accomplished, and through that noble sea avenue the beautiful Connemara marble, and the produce of the Tin, Lead, Iron, and Copper mines of Mayo and Galway, could be transported to the English manufacturers. We do sincerely trust that the only society set on foot for many years in Ireland, which promises to benefit a great portion of the labouring classes, may also become the foundation of practical undertakings in this country, and that our people, by observing its application so thoroughly laid open to their inspection, may bring their experience to bear upon enterprises of a similar kind. If so, its formation will become a turning point in our history, which will serve to mark the line between the darkness of our utter prostration and the dawning of our prosperity; recording the period when wild theories, supineness, or the unhealthy excitement of the public feelings, with all the horrors of agrarian agitation, ceased to form our national characteristics, and when in their places business habits, industry, development of the vast resources of our country, with all the other sinews of a nation's strength, began to be perceptible.

Now particularly, when so many of our countrymen are recrossing the Atlantic to settle again at home, it is pleasant to reflect that for many of them there is really "a good time coming," which will lay open to them a field upon which they may follow out the good example they have learned from our western neighbours, nor have any cause to regret their having obeyed those instincts which knitted them to Ireland. In the mean time, we heartily wish success to the "London and West of Ireland Fishing Company," and to its able managing director, Commander Symonds: we sincerely believe that no distant day will behold the realization of many of his hopes, and we as sincerely trust that he may live himself to see it, and to receive the thanks of a people for being the instrument under Providence of unfolding, and of turning to profitable account, their inexhaustible "mines under water," as they have been called by Sir William Temple, and of being the first to give a fitting example in their own country of what an enterprise, carried on in a practical and business-like manner, can accomplish.

ART. IX.—LORD BROUGHAM'S SPEECH ON JUDICIAL STATISTICS.

Speech of Lord Brougham in the House of Lords, on Monday, 3rd March, 1856. Specially Reported in "The Law Amendment Journal, being the Weekly Journal of the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law." Vol. I. No. 4, March 13th, 1856, p. 21.

"Omnes comites et barones una voce responderunt, quod nolunt leges Angliæ mutare, quæ hucusque usitatæ sunt et approbatæ." Just six hundred and twenty-one years ago, a British Parliament thus expressed themselves, and from that epoch to the present era, wise, and able, and earnest men have but too frequently found later Parliaments as unwilling as that of Merton to change the Laws of England; without, however, the sound objections against particular mutations which that Parliament could urge against the revocation of the law of special bastardy.

It happens, unfortunately, that men confounded, in all these past-by years, amendments with innovations; and although the law reformers of one age may have been considered as patriots, and as benefactors of the nation in the next; yet in their own time they were, in all probability, met by the reproaches of upsetters "of the glorious pillars of the Constitution," "wild theorists," "jacobins," possibly "traitors."

When one comes to consider all these things carefully and closely; when he remembers how earnestly Romilly, and Mackintosh, and others of their era, toiled and wrote, and when reasoning failed, "coaxed," the legislature into wise measures of amelioration of the old laws of the kingdom, one can only feel regret that so much genius should have been required to persuade reasonable men into reasonable measures.

There is, however, to the student of our history of legislation, one bright and cheering point amidst all these clouded records—all great amendments in the law have been the work of Lawyers. And it is right that it should be thus. If law be a science, who can see its defects, and appreciate its perfections so clearly as its student or its adept—and thus it comes to pass, that from Somers and the Bill of Rights, to Brougham and the Reform Bill, our legal reformers have never forgotten that in repairing those decays which time has made in the constitution, still greater rents may be caused by rash or by unskilful alterations. When Sydney Smith said, that every man thought he could drive a gig, cultivate a small farm, and write a leader for a newspaper, he stated a truth; but he might have added, that every man considered himself capable of amending the laws of England; yet, as Jeremy Bentham most truly wrote, referring to law reform,—“ Adding to the mass in the Augean stable, every ox had wisdom for—every ox that ever was put into it: to employ a river in the cleansing of it, required, not the muscle, but the genius of a Hercules.”

To no man now living, possibly to no man, does England owe more than to Lord Brougham, who has applied, not alone his “genius,” but also his “muscle,” to the repairing of the grand edifice of the national legislation, whilst preserving its fair and noble proportions. Eight-and-twenty years ago his memorable motion upon Law Reform procured the formation of two most important Commissions, one on Judicial Proceedings, the other on the Law of Real Property; and, irrespective of the amendments effected through the recommendations of these Committees, their Reports will ever be considered as the most valuable and important of those, but half-worked mines of information, the Parliamentary Blue Books.

England is deeply indebted to Lord Brougham for his long, and never-ceasing struggle to render her code of legislation worthy her constitution. When he began to work this great question, he was accused of deserting his own principles, because he did not oppose all plans of legal reform less comprehensive or well considered than his own. Because he was thus anxious and thus unselfish, he was accused of adopting this conciliatory course from motives of personal ambition, and these accusations were made at a time when he had taken most effectual measures to prevent even the offer of the post indicated by his rivals being tendered to him. But, living down these slanders, he has earned and secured the gratitude of his country, and has long possessed, despite bitter political and party hatreds—

Amongst all Lord Brougham's various schemes of Law Reform there is not one more admirable in design, or more elaborate in its details, than that developed in the Resolutions upon Judicial Statistics which we shall just now present to the reader. Doubtless, to the general mass of readers, these Resolutions do not appear so important as to the few who are, like ourselves, engaged in the investigation of the subjects to which they immediately refer ; yet no man reading these Resolutions, with ordinary attention, can fail to comprehend the vast amount of important information, we may write, of infallible knowledge, which must of necessity accrue from the adoption, by the legislature, of the well considered and wise principles contained in the document.

These Resolutions have been read, and earnestly considered, by some of the ablest lawyers, and legislators in England, and we have not heard of one objector whose opinion was worthy of the slightest regard. Indeed all have given them the fullest approval. An old friend of Lord Brougham's has, as a friend and fellow-laborer should, applied his own knowledge to the subject, and has recommended the following additions to the Resolutions:—

II.

4. I think it important that the number of recognizances estreated for non-appearance should be given with the classification. Prisoners under bail, witnesses, &c. I believe it would turn out that very few accused persons who are admitted to bail, forfeit their recognizances. This fact coupled with the reflection, that the individual in default becomes an exile and thereby incurs a severe punishment, will tend gradually to increase the numbers admitted to bail, and thus diminish a great hardship.

VII.

1. Bills ignored should be distinguished from acquittals.
10. Not only the number of Inquests, but the verdicts should be given, and where the death is accidental or by the visitation of God, the cause of death should be indicated.

XI.

5. The disposition of the earnings should be given.

XVI.

2. Divorce Bills with their fate.
Divorce Bills though in form Legislative measures, are or ought to be Judicial acts.

It is almost impossible to exaggerate the importance of these Resolutions; and, in our mind, they will be perfect if the suggestions of additional points which we have, through the foregoing letter noted, be adopted. If Lord Brougham's Resolutions were proposed to any assemblage of men who have been engaged in the consideration of Social, Statistical, and Legislative questions, they could not fail to be received with unanimous approval; but, proposed as they are, to the House of Lords, one is by no means sure of their adoption. We hope, however, that their plain, patent good sense, will prevail in inducing the Lords to adopt them, even though the reasons for their adoption may not be so evident to their Lordships as to others outside the Peerage.

If law is ever to become a science in these kingdoms, it can only be raised to this position, through the adoption, fully and completely, of such rules and principles as are indicated and contemplated by, and developed in, the above inserted Resolutions. At present, to be an English lawyer, worthy the noble title, implies that the man possesses the mind of a philosopher, the sharpness of an attorney, the memory of a detective policeman, and the constitution of a prize-fighter.

At the outset, he is overcome by the statutes at large; he is overwhelmed by the reports extending from the Year Books to The Jurist; he is confounded by Saunders, astounded by Chitty, confused by Selwyn, and lost in Archbold and Roscoe. Having mastered a series of modern acts of parliament, an act to amend an act overturns all his knowledge; and after wading through cases without number, the conflicting opinions of judges leave him floating away on a black sea of doubt, hopeless, and despairing of certainty; and at length, driven by that inexorable Harpy, an anxious attorney, he is forced to write some opinion, and in the deep depths of his uncertainty he begins to feel that, like Necessity, he has "no law."

And why is the Law of England in this condition, this shameful condition, when considered as a science, and when contrasted as a science with the state of the Law in other Nations? Simply, because codification, and a reconciliation of conflicting judicial decisions have never been attempted, and because our absurd separation of law and equity, with our rusty, useless ecclesiastical courts, upheld as special institutions, have prevented the adoption of any wide and comprehensive measures of reform, through the difficulties raised by influential and interested persons.

However, information, such as Lord Brougham's Resolutions must procure, will, if the Resolutions be adopted, speedily, safely, and surely, enable the legal reformer, and enable the Society for the Amendment of the Law, to overturn, by facts and figures, the whole edifice of stupidity, selfishness, absurdity, and red-tapism, raised around the time-honored abuses of our legal "institutions."

Why do we thus delay the reader by words of ours, in support of these Resolutions? Their best advocate is Lord Brougham, himself, who thus spoke, in introducing them to the House of Lords:—

“I rise, in pursuance of my notice a fortnight ago, to bring before your Lordships the great subject of Judicial Statistics. When that notice was given, my noble and learned friend (Lord Chancellor) desired an explanation of the term. It signifies the regular and constant record of the whole particulars connected with the administration of the law in all its branches: its administration by all courts, civil and criminal, general and local; the state of those courts, as to judges and other office-bearers; their whole proceedings through every stage; together with every matter concerning the working of the law, though not having come within the cognizance of any tribunal—in a word, the record, in minute detail, and for the most part in a tabular form, of all the facts connected with the execution of our laws. Needs there more be said to show I will not say the great value, but the paramount importance, nay, the absolute necessity, of this knowledge to the makers of those laws? Can we, I will not say conveniently, but rationally, nay, can we safely, can we honestly, exercise our legislative functions without having this information upon the action of the laws which we make, or of those made by our predecessors, and which we are constantly required to abrogate, or alter, or continue? We make some change in the system. We are bound to examine how that new law works: unless we know all the facts connected with its execution, how can we tell whether or not it was wisely, that is, usefully adopted?—whether we should persist in our course, or retrace our steps, or proceed in another direction? Jurisprudence is eminently a practical science, and the work of a safe because a prudent lawgiver is for the most part of a tentative kind. It behoves him to carry it on with a constant reference to the effects which his measures have produced. He can but dimly see even to the shortest distance before him; therefore is he bound carefully to look behind, and on each side, that he may be well assured he has made no mistake, and be full sure of his ground. When we are sailing upon an unknown coast or a coast little known, where we cannot have the benefit of a chart, how shall we hope to be safe, if we possess neither compass to guide our course nor lead to give us soundings and keep us secure from shoals and sunken rocks? Full and minute statistical details are to the lawgiver, as the chart, the compass, and the lead to the navigator.

When I referred my noble friend (Lord Chancellor) to the French reports and tables as the specimen of such information which approached nearest to perfection, the Lord Chief Justice said, I was not aware that we possessed a body of statistical facts in the yearly Returns of criminals, to which the learned judges often referred in their charges to grand juries. I was fully aware of their existence and their uses, as I then told my noble and learned friend; and it was because I was well acquainted with them that I pronounced our judicial statistics to be at the opposite point from the French, and to be the very worst which any country affecting to have such Returns possesses. It will presently appear why I rated the French so high, and ourselves so low in this great department—a department which alone can make legislation a branch of inductive science and bring it, so to speak, within the scope of Lord Bacon's rules.

In 1853 an important congress to discuss the various statistical questions with a view to the intercourse of different nations, was assembled at Brussels, summoned by the King of the Belgians, who with his sons attended on one of its three days. The Minister of the Interior presided, and nearly a hundred delegates, mostly persons in official stations, attended from all parts of Europe save Russia, and from the United States also. Some years after, in last autumn, a similar congress but much more numerous attended, was assembled at Paris under the patronage of the Emperor, and presided over by the Minister of Public Works, Agriculture, and Commerce. The representatives of England were Dr. Farr, appointed by my honourable friend Major Graham, (Registrar-General); Mr. A. Fonblanque, of the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, accompanied, I believe, by his assistant, Mr. Valpy; and Professor Levi of King's College, representing different Chambers of Commerce. My noble friend Lord Ebrington represented the Statistical Society of London. These gentlemen had also attended the Brussels Congress: and there, as well as at Paris, the important department of Judicial Statistics largely engaged the attention of the body. It formed, indeed, the subject of one of the four sections into which the whole of their inquiries were distributed. The desire was universal at both the meetings for the promotion of this branch of economics; and the wish was strongly expressed that a third congress should be held in London this year. How imperfect our system is—how little it ever could bear a comparison with that of France at any time—how much it has become even less to be commended of late years—how entirely we are left by it in the dark as to all the facts which it is the most essential that we should know regarding the administration of our laws and the condition of the people their subjects, will speedily appear if your Lordships will bear with me while I enter into some necessary details upon the whole subject. It is needless to beguile with the notion that this explanation can be accomplished without some trespass upon your time: but I engage not needlessly to encroach upon it.

I begin with our Criminal Returns, the only portion that has any the very least pretence to be called a regular branch of Statistics—all the others being irregular, occasional, accidental. Now, I pray you to observe how exceedingly defective are these returns, tabular as they are, made by the care and ability of an excellent officer, very ill supported, Mr. Redgrave, of the Home Department; and I will first of all show you how a paltry saving has of late years made them more imperfect than they were before. In 1839 the Age and Instruction of the prisoners were omitted—their Age and Education in connexion with their offences. In 1851 a further step was taken in the course of petty savings, and the Sex of the persons was left out; so that the spirit of false economy, of expensive parsimony, had to boast of saving three columns out of four-and-thirty. But its triumph is confined to England: for the Scotch returns still continue as formerly to give these most important particulars. Some, I am aware, set little store by the details of Education, as if they were little to be relied on, or, if accurate, of no great value. Of their importance I can have no doubt; and how far they can be made trustworthy I think we have some indication from the experience of our neighbours in France. We find that the proportion given for the average of five years ending 1820 of prisoners wholly illiterate—that is, quite unable either to read or write at all—was 612 in 1000. In 30 years this proportion had been considerably reduced, for the average of five years ending 1850 was only 509 in 1000. Of persons not wholly illiterate, but very imperfectly taught to read, above 300 were to be added, making the uneducated class 14-15ths of the whole. When the proportion of Education in criminals, as well as its progress, is compared with the same matters in other classes, as the conscripts, we find such a diversity as might be expected. In the 15 years ending 1850, half the period formerly taken, the number of the illiterate conscripts had come down from 480 to 362, or as 4 to 3 instead of 6 to 8; so that the returns, being according to what the diversity of the classes would lead us to expect confirm each other. I have said that the returns from Scotland continue to give Education, together with Age and Sex as before the rule, the tyrannical rule of wasteful parsimony. But neither there nor in England, at any time, was there ever given the very essential particular of the number of offences, without which no estimate can be made of the amount of crime at any period, or in any district. The number of persons alone is given, and has ever been. Yet, see how this is calculated to mislead. I observe, by to-day's account of the assizes in Northumberland, six persons tried for one murder; in our tables this would be recorded as six murders. The gravest offences—murder, manslaughter, burglary, arson—are often committed by more than one; but so too are some misdemeanours; for instance, riot and conspiracy must needs involve several parties. Why all these defects in our statistics—defects which render them not merely useless, but deceptive rather than instructive? Above all, why this retrograde movement, so that the defects have become greater, the usefulness less? All arises from a wretched, a false, an expensive economy. In no country is it more the habit to overpay insignificant, and underpay important service. We positively appear to take as serious the sarcastic description of “penny wise and pound foolish”—to make of the sneer a maxim—not taking it as a warning against folly, but as the guide of our conduct. Nor, I greatly fear me, is this confined to such paltry savings on our criminal statistics as I am now speaking of. An alarming report has reached me utterly impossible to have any foundation, I would fain hope; and from such apprehensions I trust my noble and learned friend will at once relieve me.

The story, the incredible story is told, that the Government intend to cut down the salaries of the County Court judges from the sum voted by Parliament—I will not say in its generosity, but in its wise providence, for securing efficient services in those most important stations; and this while my noble friends have, I rejoice to say, listened to my often-repeated demand of repealing the taxes upon proceedings in those courts. But to lower at the same time for the miserable saving of a few hundreds the remuneration awarded by Parliament, and thus to narrow and fetter the choice of fit judges—and this by those who profess themselves the friends of Local Judicature—it is not to be believed! Well may those Courts pray to be saved from their friends, and ask what their enemies could do worse! They may, perhaps, remind us how near friend and foe can come together; and though they may not say that friend and fiend differ but by a letter, they may think it likely enough that the monstrous attacks upon the system will be, I do not say universally hateful, but let us say only disrelished in the greatest degree by the people with whom local judicature is in great and justly great favour, and who desire nothing more strongly than to see it exercised by the ablest, the most learned, and the most honourable men.

But I revert to the glaring defects in our statistics, especially as compared with those of France. Our tables, whether for England, Scotland, or Ireland, give no proportion of the criminal to the whole population, either of the country at large or of the particular districts. In the French you can tell this at a glance, both generally and in detail. On the average of five years, ending 1860, the proportion for the whole country was 1 in 4568; but this varied exceedingly in the different Departments. In the L'Ain it was as low as 1 to 10,523. The highest was that of the Seine, 1 in 1385; and nearly on the same level with the most refined portion of the community, the inhabitants of the capital, was the least civilised, the Island of Corsica, where the proportion was 1 in 1672. As might be expected, the offences against the person formed a large proportion in the latter, and a small proportion in the former Department. In Paris 14 per cent. or one-sixth were offences against the person, 86 against property; in Corsica it was reversed, 83 against the person, or five-sixths, and 17 only against property. Now, I have no manner of doubt that this extraordinary amount of crimes of violence being brought before the minister of justice, himself a Corsican, as indeed are also some in yet more exalted stations, he will direct his attention and theirs to the means of so improving the administration of the law in that island, as to bring the inhabitants to a greater uniformity with the rest of the people, so far as the diversity of temperament, character, and social habits will permit. Such is the practical tendency of the information which these Statistical Returns afford, such the useful lessons which they inculcate, and the needful remedies which they compel the Government to apply.

Another defect, and a very great one, in our returns is, that they give no account whatever of the length of time during which criminal proceedings are pending, no means of ascertaining how long persons have been in confinement, or what interval has elapsed between arrest and final sentence, between final sentence and execution, between the commencement and termination of the case. In this particular the French tables are admirable; they approach as near perfection as possible. The result is satisfactory as regards the administration of the criminal law in respect of dispatch. Of the cases tried at the Cour d'Assize, nine-tenths take no more than six months in the whole. Of those tried by the Tribunaux Correctionnels, nineteen-twentieths are finished in three months. As to dispatch, therefore, the return is satisfactory. As to the merits of the trial itself, I cannot by any means pronounce the same opinion; for their criminal procedure is extremely defective, being by far the worst part of the Code. It was, indeed, left imperfect: and I have learnt with the highest satisfaction that the Emperor's government is disposed to remove this great blot from the most important of his celebrated kinsman's works, that which he himself foretold would form his title to renown with after ages.

Such, then, is the inferiority of our Statistics in whatever regards proceedings in courts; and such the great superiority of the French. But, suppose all the defects of which I have been complaining were removed, all the omissions supplied, there is this grand objection to these returns—to the Statistics which my noble and learned friend, now gone the circuit (Lord Campbell), described as so important; they are confined to persons tried at Assizes and Sessions, and are silent as to all other trials and all other proceedings. Not one word of police courts—not one word of summary convictions of any kind: forming, really, the greater part in number, though not in magnitude, of the whole criminal proceedings of the realm. All the arrests, and discharges, and penalties at police courts—all the proceedings at petty sessions; all the penalties inflicted summarily out of sessions, are entirely left out; and your Lordships will observe, that the jurisdiction of magistrates has lately received a very large extension both voluntary and contentious, both where persons plead guilty, and where they elect to be tried at once and without jury, by the Act of last session, which I have often taken the liberty of calling the Carlisle Act, because it originated in the petition presented by me from my friends the Cumberland justices, last session and the session before, though a right hon. friend elsewhere (Sir John Packington) had proposed a like measure somewhat earlier. This new Act has been found to work so admirably that a most able and learned judge now on circuit (Mr. Justice Coleridge), lately pronounced a high panegyric upon it, the more valuable because his Lordship had formerly, as he states, entertained a somewhat different opinion, before the experiment was tried. The whole results of summary jurisdiction are thus left out of our criminal statistics. But I will now suppose this omission also to be supplied, and that we have these results as well as the proceedings at assizes and sessions, still our accounts are confined to crimes which actually appear before different courts.

Hitherto I have spoken of offences and offenders as recorded in the proceedings of Courts, whether of trial or of police; but it is of the greatest importance to ascertain as far as possible the number of crimes which never reach any Court: nothing can be more essential to the formation of an estimate touching the state of crimes in the community, and the action of the law in detecting and in preventing them. I can give no better illustration of this than is afforded by the inquiries of the Commission on the Constabulary force, whose report was made in 1839; at the head of it was my Right Hon. friend the Speaker (Mr. Lefevre,) Colonel Rowan and Mr. Chadwick were the other Commissioners; and it would not be easy to name any persons whose authority stands higher in all respects, but more especially on the subject matter of their enquiry. I may say that they soon found their progress stayed, if not altogether stopped, by the want of statistical information. They were obliged to issue above two hundred questions for obtaining necessary details from various departments, all which details, had their enquiry been conducted in France, would at once have been furnished by the inspection of the yearly Tabular Returns. On one subject they had access to accurate information regarding untried, indeed unprosecuted offences, that of forgery. From the Bank they obtained the number of forgeries for a series of years, and the result of the comparison is very instructive. The average number of forgeries for the years 1816 and 1817 was 28,000; the convictions, 110. The average of forgeries for 1820 and 1821, was 24,000; the convictions, 240. So that, while the convictions show an increase of the offence of more than double (24 to 11), the offence had actually decreased in the proportion of 7 to 6. So in the 20 years ending 1826 the convictions had doubled, while the offence had fallen to one half. Well may the commissioners observe, that if our view is confined only to the transactions in the courts of criminal justice, we may be seriously misled in our inferences, as may likewise the community in its feelings; and the legislature and even the dispensers of mercy may be misled, if the calculations founded on judicial proceedings are not corrected by a reference to the actual state of offences in the country. That there exist the means of obtaining such information cannot be doubted. We have it in some of our own great towns by means of the police. We have it generally in Ireland; and the Tables of Crime and Outrage record such information—the result, however, as almost all our returns are, of occasional exertions, arising from the accident of motions in Parliament. I will take the returns from the Dublin Metropolitan Police; I have here those for 1852. It appears that there were 60,886 offences of all kinds, and only 54,261 persons apprehended; so that above 6,000, or a tenth part of the offences, are reported without any proceedings having been had. Of the whole there were 40,256 sentenced, 13,050 discharged, and 955 committed for trial. I must add, in justice to my worthy countrymen of the sister kingdom, that by far the greater number of the sentences, or 43,000: were for small offences; for instance, 16,000 were for vagrancy. But this return shows that we may obtain accounts of crime independent of judicial proceedings. The French tables go further, they give a minute account of the causes which are supposed to have operated in producing the offences—as passion, poverty, sordid propensities, irregular habits; and no doubt this may be regarded as somewhat a speculative statement. Compared with the other heads of the returns it certainly is so; but it is very far from therefore meriting no attention. If, for a small number of instances, or for a single year, we were to rely upon such an account, manifestly we should be led into error. But as the same causes of inaccuracy, the same want of complete information in individual cases, the same sources in short of error, most probably exist in each district, and in each year, we may more safely rely upon the comparison of district with district, of year with year. As to time, if we cannot with perfect safety compare the returns of two single years, we can with greater certainty institute a comparison between any two years and any other two; and if we take the average of six or seven years at one period with the like average at a subsequent period, according to all the doctrine of chances, we shall be probably safe in the conclusions we draw from the result of the comparison.

Let me now lay before your Lordships in one view the result of the whole French Annual Statistics; and that not as a mere matter of curiosity, but as fruitful of proofs how far they are superior to our own, and as leading to some remarkable illustrations of the consequences that spring from our great deficiencies. We shall find that light is thus thrown, for example, on three subjects which much and justly occupy the attention of Parliament at the present day: the establishment of a rural police, prison discipline, and the secondary punishment consequent upon the disuse of transportation, connected with recommitment and ticket-of-leave. In 1853, the last year for which I have the tables, the offences of the whole country were 5440, and 7317 persons were tried at assize courts, 208,699, and 261,147 persons of lesser offences tried correctionally—in all 213,139 offences and 268,466 persons. Of the assize cases 4194 were persons in the rural districts, 2821 in the towns; and of the rural, 2458 were charged with offences against property, 1646 against the person; while of the towns 2115 were against property, 715 against person. I need not stop to observe that these are general results; but the tables give every thing in the most minute detail, specifying the offences and offenders in each district, the proportion to the population, with all the other particulars on which I have already commented. Then, we have similar returns in the like detail as to police proceedings; and the total is 543,407 persons apprehended or summoned, of whom 474,359 were punished by fine, 24,748 by imprisonment, and 42,433 were discharged. The offences of course were, for the most part, of a trivial description; thus 25,203 were cases of keeping shops open at undue hours. But one very important head is given, especially in the graver cases, that of recidives, relapse, or recommitment: we find that of the 7317 tried at assize courts, 2401 had been punished before. It is true that 15-16ths of the number had only been sentenced by the Correctional Tribunals; but 983, or nearly one-seventh, had been condemned to a year's imprisonment, 278 to more severe punishments, and no less than 169 to travaux forcés, indicating very grave offences.

It is from the view of these facts, and facts such as these, that the Government had been led to consider very anxiously the necessity of making some alteration in the system of secondary punishments, as well of the law itself as of its execution; and one most important use of these details, indeed the great value of such Statistics, arises from their holding up to the Government the state of the criminal law and its administration. Here we are continually desiderating such lights; and we are fain to obtain the mere glimmering afforded by occasional returns, required by mere accident and by accident furnished, instead of having them regularly supplied at all times, and systematically as well as symmetrically arranged, like those of our French neighbours. When I presided over your Lordship's Committee on Transportation some years ago, we had to circulate our questions in various quarters, and to examine for many days, I might say weeks, a vast number of witnesses, the greater part of whose testimony would have been rendered unnecessary had our criminal statistics been like those of France, because the inspection of the tables would have given very much of the information required, and given it without the partial one-sided view inevitable in the statements brought forward for a particular purpose. The information afforded by the French tables is further of the very kind most wanted to shed light upon the question, the all-important question of a Police establishment. A noble friend of mine who attended the Brussels and Paris congress, and has given his valuable opinion in the letter I am to move for (Lord Ebrington), could well speak to the want of such Statistics in this country. He was, with one or two others, lately engaged in the plan of establishing a rural police for the county with which he is connected, that of Devon. They had recourse to the experience of places where it had been tried. All was diversity and variation. In some counties, as Oxfordshire, they found the experiment had been made with superintendents and no assistants—with officers, as it were, and no privates; in other places, privates and no officers; in some, as Lancashire and Hampshire, both officers and privates. But there were no returns of the practical working; no steady light was shed on the effects of the plans severally pursued. The inquirers were not helped, but hindered: sometimes in the dark from the total want of details; sometimes misled and not enlightened, but bewildered by false lights and cross lights; so that in despair they gave up the attempt to guide themselves by the experience of others, and Devonshire has not had even the trial of a Rural Police.

I have now shown your Lordships how defective the Criminal Returns are in almost every material particular; how entirely they are made without system; and, excepting that most imperfect account of the assizes and sessions, how much their existence in any form depends upon the chance of some motion or other proceeding occurring; so that in the result, for the most part, there are no Returns at all. But bad as this is, the want of information respecting Civil Proceedings of all kinds is incomparably more disgraceful to us. There is absolutely not a return of the kind made regularly either to the Government or to Parliament—not the least record left of the state of any of the courts of Law or Equity, Admiralty or Consistory, except that once a motion of mine to your Lordships, was made with a particular view, and by this chance we had a list of the judges and their salaries—nothing like an account of the business transacted by these courts, except that the Commons also for a particular purpose directed a return of the County Court causes, which account happens to have been repeated; but there exists no return whatever of the causes in any of the other courts, either general or in detail; and any one looking at our parliamentary returns connected with the administration of justice, returns which it would be a cruel mockery, a very sarcasm, to call Statistics, must conclude, if he had no other means of information, that there was no business at all carried on in this country of a civil nature—no causes tried, no judgments pronounced, no costs incurred, no delays to wear out the suitor's life, no expense to consume his substance. Only see, my Lords, the consequence of this most lamentable defect in the information promulgated by authentic documents—this total want of such information from official sources as to all that passes in our courts of civil jurisdiction! See the sad effects of our having been left ignorant of all these particulars, that is, left without their being brought together and in one view, so as to produce the impression which can only be made by the light of such a concentration! Does any one dream, for instance, that the defects in the Court of Chancery could have continued so long to vex the suitor and discredit the law, had the whole of the suits been chronicled regularly here as they are in France, with their results, and the periods of their endurance? What possibility would there have been of the Legislature, but still more of the country, bearing for years, ay, and for generations, I might say for ages, those defects—we may now call them grievous abuses, for they have been at length, after a more than Chancery length of time, condemned and partially removed—these abuses which ended in making the name of the court a term of reproach? My belief is, that a regular yearly table, exhibiting the causes, the delays, the costs, would, even without a Department of Minister of Justice, have sufficed to produce, years and years ago, this great improvement. From that subject I willingly abstain on the present occasion. I have often urged it strenuously on your attention; but it is now, I trust, safe in the abler hands of a right hon. friend elsewhere,* and he I know will persevere after the success which attended his appeal, as learned as eloquent, to the Commons upon a late occasion. I may, however, remind your Lordships of the slow progress which has been made in the great cause of law amendment from want both of a Minister of Justice and of regular records of judicial statistics. The mere dates of measures propounded and adopted, distinguishing the times of the proposal and enactment, will show how truly the great sage's† maxim that proposal has wings, execution leaden feet, applies to all plans of amendment brought forward by men not clothed with official authority. I may well instance the greater part of my own plans for reforming our laws. Of the nine bills which in 1845, with the concurrence and support of my learned colleagues of the Law Amendment Society, I presented to your Lordships, and of which the greater part have since become law, I will venture to say all, certainly eight of the nine, would have passed easily if patronized by a person having the influence of Government to support him; and of those which did pass, by far the most important, that which has really altered the whole face of procedure in courts of civil judicature—the making the parties competent witnesses in civil causes, was postponed from 1845 to 1851; and though the judges now admit that it has had the most blessed effects upon the administration of justice, the suitors and the courts were kept from its benefits, the discovery of truth obstructed, the triumph of falsehood secured, for six years and a half of utterly needless delay. Again, of the four courts, the establishment of which I urged upon your Lordships—and all of which by many years' experience, are found to have been changes in our judicial system at once safe and beneficial—mark the dates of the proposal and adoption. The Bankruptcy Court Bill, presented in 1831, passed the same year. The Central Criminal Court Bill passed in less than six months after it was brought forward. The Judicial Committee was formed and in action within a few months after the Court of Delegates had been abolished. In all these cases of sure and speedy legislation I sat upon that woollack, now so much more worthily occupied (I speak most sincerely and unaffectedly) by my noble and learned friend; but the Evidence Bill, which lingered six years in its passage, was presented after I had long ceased to hold office. To one, the greatest of all these changes and the most important, the establishment of Local Judicature, no doubt, my present argument does not apply; for though originally propounded in the other House,* and before my accession to power, it was afterwards submitted once and again to this House with the advantage of official weight; and I bear your Lordships no malice for rejecting it by the narrowest majority in a moment of party controversy.† This blessed measure was some years after introduced and carried by my noble and learned successor, and though too long deferred has produced the happiest effects.‡ Such postponements of beneficial changes are, however, to be deeply lamented; and I cannot avoid recollecting, perhaps, the most remarkable instance of this delay, and which never could by possibility have taken place if all that passes in the Courts of Chancery had been, as in France, regularly recorded, and promulgated, and held up, as it were, in the face of the Parliament and the Government by periodical display of the facts. It affords a striking instance of our great loss in the want both of a Department of Justice, and of a Department of Judicial Statistics. The most important change, and the greatest improvement of that court and its proceedings, is on all hands confessed to be the abolition of the Master's office. When was this first propounded? In 1842, by my honourable and learned relative,§ then a Master, whose experience of 10 years had led him to consider (and one or two of his brethren, I believe, agreed in the opinion) that there was no other remedy for the evils so loudly and so long complained of. In answer to the demand for his opinion by the Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst), he reported to the Master of the Rolls (Lord Langdale) the very measure, with its details and the reasons for it. He and his colleagues could see no other means of effacing the blots on the system, than the root and branch reform of entire erasure. They said of their court, as the old Roman (or rather Spaniard) did of his own epigrams: Non possunt nostros multæ, Faustine, lituræ.

Emendare jocos—if sport to them, their proceedings were death to the poor suitor; so they mercifully concluded—una litura potest, and urged the total abolition. But when did my honourable relative make this proposal to Lord Langdale? In 1852; and for want of the departments I have named, above all for want of the concentrated light which must have been cast upon the evil and its causes by the constant promulgation of the whole particulars connected with the Master's office, ten long years were suffered to elapse of unspeakable suffering to the parties, utter disgrace to the tribunal, and general discredit to the administration of justice.

I have stated the contrast which France presents in this respect, and I pray your lordships to mark how the facts bear out my assertion. We have a perfectly full account regularly given to the Minister of Justice yearly of all the proceedings of every court within the realm in the most minute detail. That functionary makes his report to his Imperial Majesty, and presents the reflections also which the facts are calculated to suggest with a view to the improvement of the law and its execution. I am now dealing with the subject of delay. See how that is chronicled in these reports. We find that of the causes in the Court of Primary Jurisdiction (Première Instance) one-fourth on an average last above a year, one-third three months; but in the next superior court (Cour d'Appel) only one-fifth are disposed of in three months, while one-third take a year. I have already shewn that the dispatch is much greater in the criminal courts, nine-tenths of the proceedings for greater offences occupying six months, nineteen-twentieths of the proceedings for lesser offences three months only. The Minister of Justice is immediately struck with this difference of expedition in courts composed of the same judges, and he reports upon it. He is of opinion that it arises partly from the criminal proceedings being under the superintendence of the Public Prosecutor, somewhat from the greater complicity of the civil procedure—but chiefly from the operation of professional interest—professional men, and, it should seem, some official persons also being benefited by the protraction of suits. He calls the attention of the Emperor to this important subject, and promises his assistance in devising and effecting such measures as may (I cite his own words) “give to the administration of civil justice that promptitude which is an element of its efficacy.” One may venture to conjecture that a report upon the Master's office would not have required the “decies repetitum” in France as with us ; that the denouncement of the minister would have called forth that vigorous arm which brooks not the delay of a 10 years' siege ; and that the stronghold of abuse would have fallen in far less than the classical period of time during which it was suffered to mock the prayers of the suitor, and defy the assaults of the amenders of the law.

My statements have already extended to a considerable length, and I feel thankful to your Lordships for having so patiently borne a discussion upon matters somewhat dull in themselves, interesting as are the great subjects with which I hope their intimate connexion has been demonstrated. I must, however, still claim your attention to another subject of very great importance upon which the Judicial Statistics of our neighbours throw some light, I mean the Process of Reconciliation, the proceedings in the Bureaux de Conciliation. I have, unhappily, never been able to obtain your concurrence in the measures often propounded by me, chiefly in the County Court Bills, for establishing this most beneficial tribunal in England ; but I hope that either I shall be spared to see such a consummation of all the great reforms in our law, or that in other and more powerful hands it will be accomplished. It needs no proof surely from experience to show how unspeakably great would be this blessing—the extinction of all, or nearly all, the unjustifiable litigation, that which being groundless is the mere torment of society. Facts we have in abundance to prove the success of the plan, wherever it has been tried and had fair play. In some countries it has at once cut off four-fifths, in others even more, of all the suits previously brought and carried through the courts. But can any one doubt that this must be the result, or require the proof from experience of what the least reflection must show to be infallibly certain before any experience is had ? Needs more be done to secure its favourable reception than simply to tell what the plan is ? If the parties who can by no possibility have an interest in continuing a hopeless litigation, shall go before a judge without the presence of a professional man who may have such an interest, and shall hear the opinion of a person whose station commands respect, whose judgment they trust, and who stands perfectly impartial and indifferent between them—if the one be told that he has no chance of succeeding should he prosecute his suit, or the other that his defence must prove unavailing, can there be any reasonable doubt that in a great majority of instances this advice will be taken, say rather this warning will prove effectual ; and so the hopeless demand or desperate refusal will be at an end, and the greater part of the causes stopped, such only going on as involve matters of fact properly in dispute, or points of law really requiring to be settled by trial ? The French process of this kind is by no means so well devised as that of Denmark and some other countries, where the effect of its introduction has been to clear the tribunals of a very large number of that class of causes to which I have referred. But comparatively inefficient as the Bureau de Conciliation is, in consequence of the less satisfactory provisions of the law, it nevertheless produces very important results. We find, for example, by the tables for 1853, that of 211,000 proceedings of Conciliation, no less than 154,000, or three-fourths, were successful in wholly and finally adjusting the conflicting pretensions, or settling the cases without further litigation.

I must now add, that whatever doubts may be entertained or, if I may respectfully to your Lordships so speak, whatever prejudices may prevail, against Courts of Reconciliation, surely there can be no hesitation in approving of the Conseils de Prudhommes, and envying our French neighbours for the possession of so useful an institution, one so much wanted amongst ourselves. These, as your Lordships may be aware, are councils composed of respectable individuals not professional, for arbitration upon matters connected with the work and the differences of artisans, and especially for settling by voluntary submission disputes between masters and workmen. The successful working of this excellent plan is universally admitted. Thus I find that of 28,429 disputes in 1850 all were settled save 1041, and of this small proportion, only  $\frac{1}{7}$ , the greater part were subsequently accommodated by parties who at first had refused to yield. The proportion in Paris was much less satisfactory, less so indeed than in any other Department, probably from the turbulent habits of the working classes in that capital—not above two-thirds of the disputes were settled. In the great manufacturing districts it was very different. Thus at St. Etienne of 2818 disputes all but 70, that is all but one-fortieth, were accommodated. Only conceive how beneficial it would be if for our Birmingham (the St. Etienne of this country) you had a Domestic Forum which cut off 39 in 40 of the disputes between masters and men, by an amicable and comfortable and immediate settlement!

I have described the evil consequences of our only having occasional and chance returns upon the most important heads of both Civil and Criminal Statistics—that one accidental motion in either House obtains our only information on the numbers and salaries of judges, another on the business transacted in courts of a single description only, the County Courts. But I should except two others, Admiralty and Bankruptcy, from the statement that there never have been any returns; for by mere accident there have been in both these cases, but once only; and the information never has been continued, so that it became entirely useless for any practical purpose. The unhappy accident of the war occasioned a return to be called for from the Prize Courts, and it was of considerable use in showing the effects of the blockade; but nothing could be more interesting than an account of all the admiralty cases, as well as the Prize causes. Thus, in cases of collision and seamen's wages there is a concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of common law. It would be important to compare the proceedings in these concurrent courts, were it only to show what preference is given by suitors to the one or the other jurisdiction; and these returns should manifestly not be limited by the duration of the present lamentable hostilities. On the Courts of Bankruptcy we happen to have returns dated some years back, not from any systematic course of furnishing this important information, but because there chanced to be a Commission appointed for inquiring into the state of the Bankruptcy judicature, and also a committee moved for by my noble and learned friend (Lord St. Leonards), who had doubts, or more than doubts, on the new system of class certificates.

Much evidence was examined for many days by both Commissioners and Committee; and I will venture to affirm that a great part of it might have been obtained by an inspection of tables, if we had possessed anything like those of France, on the same subject.

The Commission obtained very full returns; they are the only ones ever made, although the new judicature has been in existence and in full operation for a quarter of a century. They have never been continued since the Commission acted three years ago: they are liable to all the objections of being occasional, imperfect, one-aided, as compared with the full and regular tables of the French Government; though they are of use as far as they go, and for the period now gone by to which they relate. Than the French nothing certainly can be more admirable; they are full to minuteness of detail, and except that they omit the expenses of parties (the defect, and the only one, in the other tables of civil proceedings), they may be truly said to exhaust the subject. Thus, to give a summary, and no more: taking the year 1853—there were 2126 bankruptcies; of these 319 for less than £200 (I translate into our money), 468 between £200 and £400, 348 between £400 and £2000, 200 between £2000 and £4000. The assets amounted to £1,320,000, of which £480,000, real estate; the debts £4,480,000, of which £520,000, secured by mortgage. Then the dividends are given in minute detail, so that at a glance you can tell how many, and in respect of what debts, received so many shillings in the pound (or sous in the franc) under the heads of various sums. I can imagine nothing more worthy of praise than this class of their Statistics; but indeed the whole of the great work is an object of admiration and of envy—a work renewed regularly year by year ever since the department was finally formed in 1829, Napoleon having begun it in the consulship, and afterwards more fully arranged it in 1811; but the execution of this important design was not consummated before his fall.

The precious volumes which are its yearly result, and which considering the infinite number and minuteness of the details, are of no startling size, two moderate quartos only, are accompanied with the minister's full and somewhat special report on the great value of which, for purposes of practical legislation as well as for administrative uses, I have already more than once commented.

Let me set before your Lordships, in conclusion, the remarkable picture which they present of the general state of litigation for the last 30 years before the war broke out. Notwithstanding the great increase in the numbers of the people, the number of causes had apparently somewhat fallen off, a real diminution of no inconsiderable amount, if we keep in mind the progress of the population.

But in one class of causes there was no decrease; commercial causes had doubled. Heaven be praised! Humbly, devoutly, but most heartily, let us pour forth our gratitude to the Great Disposer, for this happy consummation, happy for England, for Europe, for the civilized world, for France herself above all—indicating as it full surely does, the vast increase of trade, the application by that great people of their indomitable energies, their varied ingenuity, their untiring industry, their matchless perseverance—to the blessed pursuits of peace; for of commerce, we may say, as a great orator of ancient times did of his own art: Pacis comes, otiiq; socia, et jam bene constitutæ republicæ alumna—the offspring and the pledge of peace abroad, order at home!

My Lords, I will not further weary you by reading these Resolutions which I now move; they embody the recommendations I have made, and shew how these may best be carried into effect.

I have had, in framing them, not only the example of the French Statistical Department and its labours, and the co-operation of my colleagues in the Statistical Committee of the Law Amendment Society—more especially, I have had the invaluable assistance of Professor Levi, whom I have long known, and than whom I have never met with a person of greater ability, and more extensive information on all subjects connected with the Science and Statistics of Commercial Law, whereof he is the distinguished teacher, or one of industry more indefatigable. In framing the Resolutions, which relate to the Admiralty and Consistorial Courts, we have had the aid of my friend, Mr. Rothery; and what concerns the Bankruptcy Court has been settled by communication with persons of that department.

From the Statistical department of the Board of Trade under Mr. Fonblanque's able superintendence, I have derived liberal and valuable assistance, and his correspondence with Professor Levi, on Judicial Statistics, is one of the two papers for which I have now to move you: the other is, Lord Ebrington's letter to Lord Palmerston, on the same subject. The Resolutions I only desire may be laid on your table and printed, and I shall move that the debate on them may be adjourned.

This admirable speech, the result of seventy-eight years experience, requires no comment from us. The Resolutions the adoption of which it advocates, and the full advantages of which it explains, are of importance not alone to the legislator, to the lawyer, to the statistician, and to the political economist; they are important to every man in the community who has a right to uphold or a wrong to redress.

These kingdoms owe much to Lord Brougham. As a champion of the oppressed, as a law reformer, as a bold and unflinching defender of the popular cause, as a never-ceasing cultivator of literature, as an earnest and ever constant supporter of free education befitting a free people, as a writer in whose pages good sense, and learning, and genius are ever found, Lord Brougham stands before his country, a patriot judge in the truest sense of this grand title, and as has been well declared of Hale and of D'Aguesseau, we may declare of him, and never more truly than at this moment—"Happy is the nation, on whom Providence bestows such magistrates; they equally benefit their own times and posterity."

ART. I.—SLICK'S HIGH LIFE IN NEW YORK.

High Life in New York. By Jonathan Slick, Esq., of Weathersfield, Conn. A Series of Letters to Mr. Zephariah Slick, Justice of the Peace, and Deacon of the Church, over to Weathersfield, in the State of Connecticut. New York: Bunce and Brother, 1856.

THERE are two classes of readers from whom the work before us has but a small chance of welcome. Those, who, confiding in the strength of their mental digestion, prefer taking their “stale” unmixed, and who hold in utter contempt, minds weak enough to relish the addition of the “dulce,” probably consider, that Judge Haliburton has retrograded sadly in giving to the world a series of mere humorous sketches. According to their views, he for the first time, “really promised something great” in his English in America,* and no doubt had his present work been of a similar cast, instead of being so lamentably mirthful, they might have been inclined to forgive and forget in the sober political historian, the trivial varieties of Sam Slick. But, fortunately for Judge Haliburton, and indeed it may be for society at large, the possessors of intellects so far exalted, are decidedly in the minority. The public appetite is in general pleased with variety, and evinces a repugnance to intellectual dyspepsia, which must be very discouraging to those lofty-minded beings, who, forgetful of the days when James’s Powder was rendered grateful to their juvenile palates, by the addition of raspberry jam, deny the utility of humour, as a vehicle for wholesome truth. The opposition of the class of enemies to humorous writing, is founded on the belief, that vulgarity and wit are synonymous, and that mirth is incompatible with "gentility." To all of this dreary creed, the very title, High Life in New York, is of course conclusive; it satisfies them at once that the book must be "dreadfully low," and consequently it is returned unread to the highly genteel circulating library, with a request, that Mrs. Gore's latest novel, and the last work on Crotchet collars, may be sent up the moment they come in. There is one reflection however which cannot fail to infuse comfort into the soul of Judge Haliburton, and cheer him in his banishment from the reading tables of these worthy people—Shakspeare is undergoing a similar sentence in company with a distinguished circle of malefactors, convicted of Vulgarity at the bar of Ultra-R refinement. Against one or two of the more modern culprits, Dickens in particular, there is a second charge, to wit, that they did remove, crush, drive into obscurity, and totally eclipse, the Eau Sucrée School of novelists, whose works had for a long time formed an intellectual repast, both grateful and suitable to minds of delicate organization. In them were to be found no dull descriptions of every day life, in coarse every day language, no character was open to the objection Mr. Partridge brought against Garrick's acting.* No hero held a lower position in society than a Viscount, or at least an amiable cut-throat, who, to make up for the laxity of his morals, expressed himself like a Chesterfield, and had the manners of any polished gentleman, say, George the Fourth, and who, when it became a necessity to abduct the heroine (Lady De' &c. &c.) performed that duty with engaging suavity, and removed her to his private dungeon to be kept till called for in the third volume, when the hero had satisfactorily proved himself to be the son and heir of the Marquis. It is easy to understand that persons who admire this style, as emphatically the genteel, may feel a sublime contempt for works of fiction, in which the characters, many of them drawn from low life, are represented as speaking and acting just as people in their position might be expected to speak and act, and in which dialogues given in the dull monotony of the vernacular, and unrelieved by scraps of French, Italian, or any foreign language, have often a tendency to produce laughter, and other external symptoms of enjoyment; but it is by no means easy to comprehend what are their notions of vulgarity, so gutta-percha-like in its own elasticity, and extensive in its application, does that word become, when used by them in reference to anything which is unfortunate enough not to meet their approbation * They seem to forget that vulgarity is a quality, not inherent, but altogether dependent on circumstances, and that words and phrases, which may be vulgar in some positions, are not necessarily always so. For instance, it would be undeniably vulgar for an author in describing the parting between Mr. William Styles, and John Noakes, to say, "they wet their whistles, and then bolted;" but he might represent either of those gentlemen as using the same figurative expressions in his own account of the effecting event, without violating propriety, in any sense of the word, more than the author of Adela, or the Outlaw of Oxfordshire does, when he makes his heroine dismiss her lover, with the assurance that "poverty and contempt she could endure with him, but a father's anger, a parent's wrath she cannot, will not, &c." Of course there are many expressions in use among the lower orders, which no circumstances could render fit to appear in print, but vulgarity is altogether too weak a word to express the offence of any man, who would so far forget his duty to society, as to introduce such as these into his writings. In short propriety, as well in representing naturally, as in avoiding what is of itself offensive, is perhaps the surest guide the Novelist can have. As long as he keeps this landmark in view, he will steer clear of vulgarity or coarseness, even though his Styles's and Noakes's speak with all the idiomatic terseness of their class; unless indeed the objection be deemed a valid one, which those, whose refinement is of extra delicacy, have to the appearance on any terms whatever, of such characters in a picture of life; but as the prototypes are to be found in the original, it is probable that most persons will be content to join us in lamenting that at the outset, the organization of society was not entrusted to people, who would have no doubt, given us a world of ladies and gentlemen. As we have already stated; it is to be feared that the title under which the subject of the present notice is published, will be damnatory in the eyes of this class, that designates as vulgar everything outside the Drawing-room door; yet, if our recommendation have any weight, we would suggest a perusal however slight, if it were only for the purpose of correcting a mistake, to which the devotees of sublimated gentility, are of all people, most prone, namely, that the humour of our transatlantic cousins never shows itself in any other form than those facetious anecdotes usually charged upon American papers, of men so tall, that they are obliged to climb a ladder to comb their own hair, or of ghosts of such preternatural brightness as to render smoked glass indispensable to all who may wish to contemplate them. As to our utilitarian friends, deference to their lofty, though prejudiced minds, renders it impossible for us to recommend a work of such levity as Judge Haliburton's, on any other grounds than that many of the sketches of domestic life contained in its pages, may add something to their stock of "useful knowledge" concerning Social America. It is true, that the tendency of humour is to place its object in a state of inferiority, so as to cause laughter, but it does not follow that the inferiority is necessarily such as to excite the feeling of contempt; to delineate harmless peculiarities and good-natured simplicity, is just as much the province of humour, as to expose the less amiable failings; no doubt the pleasure we derive from the consideration of the clearness of those two great parallels in fiction, My Uncle Toby, and Mr. Pickwick, arises in a great measure from a sort of self-congratulation, at being unencumbered with their excess of simple benevolence, but the mind that could DESPISE those worthy creatures, must be of a very unloving and unloveable cast; when humor takes this turn, the inferiority does not pervade the whole conception; it is then merely a lowering of one part to throw another into relief, as the wood engraver reduces the surface of the block, where the lines traced on it are meant to be subordinate. There would be nothing humorous in Uncle Toby's widely extended philanthropy and tenderness of heart, unaccompanied by his bashfulness and childlike enthusiasm about the art of war, or in the intense bonhomie of Mr. Pickwick, were it not for the little traits of credulity, pompous simplicity, and occasional quickness of temper which render that dear man such a delightful study. Nor is it essential that the part of the conception thus thrown into relief should be of an amiable nature ; our admiration for Falstaff, with all his wit and philosophy, is of a much less kindly description than that inspired by Uncle Toby, yet, in spite of his sensibility and cowardice, we are far from feeling contempt for him as we do for Dogberry. In fact this species of humour represents certain qualities in a ludicrous light, not so much thus to excite laughter, as to supply a foil for others, which would, of themselves, excite admiration rather than laughter ; and hence arises that incongruity which forms the essence of the humorous. Of a far different nature is the incongruity which causes our enjoyment of humour, when it has for its object, the peculiarities of a nation, or class, of which we ourselves are not members, it then springs from our mentally contrasting the manners, habits, dialect, or whatever the immediate subject may be, with our own. But this is not all ; there is nothing humorous in the idea of a party of Cannibal Islanders dining off a grilled enemy, although the contrast between such a repast and a European family dinner, is about as great as can be well conceived ; there must be also a certain amount of that unusual combination of circumstances, incidents, or objects, which would render the representation humorous, irrespectively of its origin or locale, or in other words, what, speaking metaphysically, we might call an internal incongruity. The latter is of course just as perceptible to an individual of the particular class or nation, and our enjoyment of it proceeds from a feeling of temporary superiority to, or a sort of contempt for the object humorously treated. We may here remark, that this contempt is by no means identical with the feeling which our dictionaries, explain by the words "scorn;" certain words such as "pleasure," "pain," "delight," "congruity," acquire a conventional meaning in metaphysics, from being always used in their most abstracted sense, and perhaps, one of the greatest difficulties the student in that science has to encounter, is the training his mind to use that conventional meaning, and forget for the time being, the more ordinary one.

To return to our more immediate subject, as we of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland have an additional source of enjoyment in Judge Haliburton's High Life in New York ; the work itself, being a collection of American sketches, may be considered as doing double duty ; first, as a work illustrative of the manners, the domestic life, and the various provincial dialects, as well as of the humor of the Americans, and secondly, as a book of that sort which one takes up simply for amusement. Its efficacy in the former capacity will, we know, be doubted by a class of readers we have already alluded to; the sticklers for the solid and serious will scout the idea of a humorous work containing useful information regarding any country, and undoubtedly they are right in doing so, if they consider useful information to consist exclusively in statistics of births, deaths, marriages, gaol-deliveries, and prison discipline, or in lists of exports, imports, public buildings, and capital offenders. If to be well "made up" in such matters, is to know a nation thoroughly, then humour, which has ever had a rooted antipathy to the blue books and figures can avail but little. But we would respectfully (as dealing with persons of such severe taste) submit that something more is necessary. Which of us would think of establishing an intimacy with a person whose friendship was desirable, by finding out the name of his tailor, or the sum to his credit in the Three Per Cents, if we admired the cut of his coat, or had a marriageable daughter?—information on these points would be no doubt very acceptable; but if he were a man for whom we felt respect, apart from that inspired by his paletot, or his pocket, it is probable we should feel just as much curiosity about his tastes and habits, whether he was the same, in an arm-chair and slippers, by his own fireside, as he was in public, whether he was sociable or morose, playful or austere to his own family, whether it was he who kept the household in order, or the grey-mare was the better horse in his home circle. If information on points like these assist us in forming a just estimate of individual character, surely the study of the corresponding problems in national character has its claims to utility, especially in the case of such a nation as America, a nation which, with all her weak points, we cannot but respect (we do not use the word in a diplomatic sense.) A nation which still feels, and it is to be feared not without cause, a certain amount of jealousy and heart-burning towards her progenitor, while every day shows that something more than a mere speaking acquaintance is desirable. Although a small library might be furnished exclusively with books on American subjects, yet of what may be called Social America, of the manners, ways of thinking, fireside chit-chat of the middle (for democratic as she is, America has a middle) class,—we as yet know little or nothing. The Dots and Peerybingles of England have become Household Words in many a home between New York and New Orleans, but, though no doubt the cricket chirps just as loudly on the American hearth, as it does among the coal and turf-ashes of our two "right little, tight little islands," its voice has not come across the Atlantic. The native authors seldom give us a view of domestic life. The witty Clockmaker of Slickville, himself, avowes a preference for political or metaphysical disquisition, and the sojourns of foreign writers on America, have been generally too limited to allow them to acquire the necessary intimacy with the people, even supposing they had not travelled, as too many obviously have, only to collect evidence to prove some pet theory respecting the evils of democracy; there are few descriptions of American life or portraits of American character, in the works of Messrs. Hall, Dickens, Marryat, Trollope, (every one who has read the Lady's production, will admit her claims to the masculine title), that do not show the steam-boat, the stage-coach, the boarding house, or the public assembly to have been the field of observation. What a striking contrast to these is presented, by Washington Irving's admirable essays on English character, in his Sketch Book and Bracebridge Hall; long and useful study of the national peculiarities, and frequent intercourse with the people, have made his sketches as true, as they are elegant in diction, and full of that genial humour which laughs with rather than at, its object. It is, when humor adopts this tone, that it becomes a useful element in description; there are a thousand and one weaknesses, foibles and failings in human nature, which approach faults so nearly, as to render it impossible to pass them over in silence, pure satire is much too keen a weapon against such as these; to use it as a corrective, would be to break the butterfly upon the wheel, and though we may admire its brilliancy, it too often leaves a scathed mark, to show where the flash took effect; but humor plays round its object with a mellow continuous light, like the harmless lightning of a summer's evening.

Jonathan Slick, the son of Zephariah, and the younger brother of Sam Slick, leaves Weathersfield as supercargo of a freight of onions, garden stuff, and strong cider, shipped per the sloop of Captain Doolittle for New York. Arriving at the latter city, Jonathan, committing the disposal of the cargo to the Captain, goes into the city, and calls upon his cousin John Beebe, at his counting-house. John receives him kindly, and invites him to a quiet dinner at which are present only John, his wife Mary, also a cousin of Jonathan's, and Jonathan himself; and here Jonathan is overcome by what he calls, and fancied to be, "spring cider," but which was in reality very good champagne.

After this dinner Jonathan feels himself rising in the world; he offers himself as a contributor to The New York Express, which engages his services, and thenceforth, instead of writing to his father by post, he addresses him through the columns of that journal. His letters are found advantageous to The Express and people begin to talk of him, and he takes an office in Cherry-st., concluding that he will set up in New York as a literary man.

Before we proceed to make extracts from this most amusing book, we think it right to state that it is, all through America, known to be the work of Judge Haliburton; and we have heard, from friends in all quarters of the Union, that it is High Life in New York to the fullest and most admirable point of accurate painting.

Becoming famous, Jonathan is invited by Mrs. Beebe to "a swarry," of which we have the following account:—

One morning a little black boy cum into my office with a heap of letters, and he gave me one without speaking a word, and went off agin. I opened the letter, and there dropped out a square piece of white pasteboard, and on it was printed in leetle fined letters, "Mrs. Beebe at home—Thursday evening."

Wal, sez I to myself, if this don't take the rag off the bush—cousin Mary's got to gadding about so much, that she has to send round word when she is a going to stay at hum one evening. I do wonder how Mr. Beebe can stand it. I shouldn't blame him if he took to drink, or got into bad company, if his wife goes on so; for if a woman won't stay to hum nights, and keep every thing nice and snug agin her husband comes away from his bisness, a feller must have an all-fired good heart, and a good head tu, if he don't go off and git into scrapes on his own hook.

I sot down and histed my feet on the top of the stove, and begun to think it all over, till it seemed to be my duty to go and talk to cousin Mary about the way she was a going on. I remembered what a purty, smart little critter she used to be when she lived in Connecticut, and how kind hearted she was; and then I thought of her queer stuck up ways since I'd seen her here; and it was as much as I could du to keep the tears out of my eyes, for if cousin Mary had been my own sister, I couldn't a liked her better than I did when she was a gal.

Wal, arter thinking it all over, I made up my mind to go and ask John if he didn't think it best for me to go and talk to her, for I felt kinder loth to meddle with his business, if he didn't want me tu; and anyhow, I didn't expect much thanks for giving her advice—for when a feller steps in between man and wife, it's like trying to part a cat and a dog, and he is lucky enough if he don't git scratched by one and worried to death by t'other; but I looked at the piece of paste-board agin, and made up my mind that something ought to be done, and if John didn't take it up, I would; for if there's any thing I du hate on arth, it's a gadding woman—and I didn't feel as if I could give cousin Mary up quite yit.

Wal, I took my hat, and put my hands in my trousers' pockets, and walked along kinder slow through Cherry street, till I cum to Franklin Square. I didn't seem to mind any body, for my heart felt sort a heavy with thinking of old times. I kept a looking down on the stun walk, and felt eenamost as much alone as if I'd been in a Connecticut cramberry swamp; yit there was more than fifty people a walking up and down the Square. I'd got jest agin the old Walton House, that was built afore the revolutionary war, but was so busy a thinking, that I forgot to look up at the arms and figgers carved out over the door, every one of 'em put up there by a British tory family afore General Washington drove them out of house and hum—when all to once somebody hit me a slap on the shoulder that made me jump eenamost into the middle of next week. I looked up, and there was cousin Beebe a larfin like all natur because he'd made me jump so.

"Hello, cousin Jonathan!" sez he, "what the deuce are you thinking about?"

"About that," sez I, a forking out the piece of pasteboard from my trousers' pocket, "a little stuck up nigger jest gin me that ere."

"Wal, what of it?" says cousin John, "it's all right I see, I suppose you'll come of course?"

"Yes," says I, "I was a jest a going down to see you about it, and if you'd jest as livs I'll go right straight up and talk to her now; I feel as if I could say enough to break her heart, if it has got ever so tough."

With that cousin Beebe bust right out a larfin. "That's right," says he, "you're coming on bravely, don't talk about one heart, I havn't the least doubt but you'll break a dozen—you literary chaps carry all before you in that way."

I felt kinder unsartin how to take his meaning, for it seemed as if he was a poking fun at me, for wanting to give his wife some good advice; at last I spoke up, and sez I—

"If cousin Mary has got one good sound heart left to break, since she came here to York, she's a good deal better off than I took her to be."

With that John begun to stare, and at last he bust out a larfin again.

"Why," sez he, "you haint no idee of getting up a flirtation with Mary, have you? upon my word, cousin Slick, you are a shaking off all your steady habits in a hurry. It generally takes a feller, though, some months' training in fashionable society, before he can bring himself to make love to another man's wife."

"Now," sez I, "cousin Beebe, what on arth do you mean? as true as I live I shall git wrathy if you keep on in this way. Aint my father a deacon of the church? Aint I sot under Minister Smith's preaching since I was knee high to a toad? It's an all-fired shame for you to talk to me as if I was going to demean myself by making love to anybody, much less to another man's wife. When I du make love, sir, I can tell you what, it will be with a hull heart and an honest one tu; I'll never be afeard to look a girl in the face when I ask her to take me, or to let her look in mine for fear she'll see villain writ out in my eyes. As for your married women, they needn't be afeared that anybody, I don't care how imperdent he is, will make love to them, without they begin first. Now, Cousin Beebe, seeing as we have gone so far, jest look a here, see what your wife has sent to me!"

With that I give him the paper which the pasteboard was done up in, where Cousin Mary had writ, "Mrs. Beebe hopes Mr. Slick will not fail to come."

Cousin John read it, and sez he, "Wal, what harm is there in this? I'm sure it was very thoughtful of Mary, and I'm glad she did it. You will go of course; there will be a good deal of company, and they are all anxious to see you since your letters come out in the Express."

"What," sez I, "is Miss Beebe a going to have a party—why didn't she say so then?"

"Oh it's only a swarry, she often has them," says he.

"A what?" sez I.

"A swarry—a conversationny," sez he. I couldn't think what he meant, but I remembered that jest afore Mary was married she us'd to have hysteric fits, now and then, and I thought they give them things some other name down here in York.

"Dear me," sez I, "I'm sorry, but if I can do any good I'll come up, I s'pose you'll have a doctor."

"Oh yes," sez he, "there'll be two or three, besides lots of lawyers, and poets, and editors."

"You don't say so," sez I, "why what will you du with them all?"

"Oh Mary will take care of them," sez he, "she does those things very well, indeed, considering she was brought up in the country."

"But I thought you wanted us to take care of her," sez I.

"Why, of course you will all make yourselves as agreeable as you can; there will be lots of harnsome wimmen there, and I haint the least doubt we shall have a pleasant party."

"A party!" sez I, "is Miss Beebe a going to have a party?"

"Certainly," sez he, a looking puzzled; "didn't you understand that by the card and the note?" I felt my heart rise up in my mouth, and I could have begun to dance on the stun walk. I do believe nothing on arth makes a feller feel so happy as to find out that somebody he can't help but like, but has been a thinking hard things about, don't deserve them. Cousin John kept a looking at me, and I begun to feel awful streaked, for it seemed to me as if he suspected all that I'd been a thinking agin his wife. Arter a minit, I up and took my hand out of my pocket, and I took hold of his'n, and, sez I—

"Cousin John, I've been making a darned fool of myself; I didn't know what this ere piece of pasteboard meant, and I"—

"Never mind, Cousin Jonathan," sez he, all of a sudden shaking my hand, "you know what it means now—so come up on Thursday. Now I think of it—you had better git a new suit of clothes; that blue coat and those shiny brass buttons did very well for Weathersfeld; but here something a little more stylish will be better—supposing you go over to the Broadway tailors and let them fit you out."

"Not as you know on," sez I, a taking hold of the edge of my coat, and a dustin off the buttons with my red silk pocket handkerchief. "The picter that they printed of me in the Express newspaper was taken in these clothes; and if you'd jest as live, I'll keep 'em on."

Cousin John warn't to be put off so, and at last he cum his soft sodder over me, till I agreed to git another suit of clothes, New York cut, for parties and meetings. So we shook hands, and he turned and went back to his store agin, for he was a coming up to my office; and I jest turned into a narrow street, and took a short cut across to the Express Office. The Editors give me some money, for they aint no ways mean about paying me for what I write for their paper; and they put on the soft sodder purty strong about my letters. They said that everybody was a reading them and a trying to find out something about me, and that lots of young ladies had seen my picter and were a dying to git acquainted with me. I warn't much surprised at it. Arter putting the poetry in my letters so strong, I was sartin that all the gals would be a talking about me. Nothing takes with them like poetry. I had my eye teeth out when I wrote that, I can tell you. I couldn't help but feel tickled to hear them praising me so; but somehow one gits used to being puffed up, and arter a little while a feller don't seem to care so much about it.

Wal, I pocketed the cash and went to the tailors' store; it was a plaguy harnsome place, and there were two or three spruce-looking chaps standing about; but they looked at me kinder slanting, as if they thought I didn't want to buy anything; and I could see one on them looking arnestly at my coat, as if he didn't like the fit on't. I declare I begun to get ashamed of the old blue, when I cum to see the harnsome coats and vests and trousers hanging around.

"Have you got any first rate superfine broadcloth coats and trousers to sell here?" sez I, a chinking the loose change in my trousers' pocket a leetle, jest to show them that I was as good as the city banks, and held out specie payments yit.

"Yes," sez one of the clerks, a bowing, "what color do you wish to look at?"

"Wal," sez I, "I ruther think I'll take that color that looks so much like burnt coffee, or else a rale indigo blue, I aint particular, only I want it in the tip of the fashion—a rale harnsome fit, and all that, for I'm a going to a swarry and a conversationanny, and I want to shine like a new pin."

While I was a talking, a knowing sort of a feller cum out of the back room, and when he see me a looking at a coat that I seemed to take a notion tu he cum up and begun to talk about it—he pintoed out the silk lining and the way it was stuffed and quilted under the arms, and would have me try it on. So I stripped off the old coat and put the new one on. I can tell you it sot as slick as grease: there warn't a wrinkle or a pucker in it, from the top of the velvet collar to the eend of the flap. I looked as trim and as genteel as could be in it—when it was buttoned over tight it seemed to me that I warn't bigger round than a quart cup.

Sez the gentleman, says he, “that’s a capital fit, sir, you won’t du better than to take it.”

“Wal,” sez I, “I don’t know as I shall, I kinder seem to like myself in it—how much do you ask, hey?”

“Why,” sez he, “that’s a fust rate coat, superfine cloth and beautiful trimmings; but the times aré hard, and I’ll let you have it low for cash;” and then he sot his price; “but, sez he, “you mustn’t tell how cheap you got it, for I couldn’t sell any more at that price.”

“Wal,” sez I, “I ruther guess I’ll take it; now let us look at some of your vests and trousers. I shall have to beat you down a leetle on them, for I’m raly afeard my money won’t hold out.”

“Not much fear of that,” sez he, and he opened a drawer and took out an all-fired heap of trousers. Arter I’d tumbled ’em over a while, I picked out a pair of rale harnsome checkered ones, and then I bought a black vest with yaller stripes all over it, and between us, I ruther guess it made a considerable hole in the money that I got from the editors of the Express, to pay for ’em all. The man had done ’em up, and I was jest a going to take ’em hum under my arm, but sez he—

“Where will you have them sent, sir?”

“Wal,” sez I, arter thinking a minit, “you may direct them to Mr. Jonathan Slick, and send them round to the Express office, if you’ve no objection.”

I wish you could a seen the feller! he seemed to be all struck up into a heap when I said this, and the clarks looked at each other, and cum towards us as if they had never seen anybody that wrote for newspapers afore.

“Mr. Slick,” sez the head man, making a bow eeamost to the ground, “I’m much obliged for your custom, and I hope you’ll cum agin. If you find the clothes suit you, perhaps you’ll send any of your friends to our establishment, who happen to want any thing in our line. We shall always be happy and proud to sarve Mr. Slick or any of his friends.”

Here he made another bow, and I stepped back, and bent for’ard a trifle, jest to let him see that his soft sodder warn’t put on at all coarse; and, sez I, “Wal, I’ll try the clothes, and if they turn out fust-rate, mebbey I’ll mention where I got them in one of my letters. There is a good many chaps jest a going to be married about Weathersfield, and it won’t do them no harin to know where to come for the wedding clothes.”

With that the tailor bowed agin, and, sez he, "Mr. Slick, where shall I have the honor of sending you one of my fust-rate vests, or a pair of harnsome pantaloons? I'll take your measure, and have them made on purpose for you."

"Wal, now, I don't know as I can afford to buy any more jest yit," sez I; "but when these are worn out, I think as likely as not I shall cum agin."

"Oh," sez he, a rubbing his hands a little, and a smiling and bowing agin, "let us take your measure, and we shan't quarrel about the pay, we shall be most proud to supply you with a good article; and if you will accept of them, the honor"——

"Oh," sez I, a bowing, "you are very obliging, I'm sure, Mr. ——."

"Where shall we send them when they are done?" says he.

"Direct them as you did the others, to Mr. Jonathan Slick, to the care of the Editors of the Express. And look a here, Mr. ——, I wish you'd try and make the trousers so they will stay down, and not keep a hitching up to the top of my boots, if you can."

"Depend on it they will please you," sez he, a follering me to the door, "Good mourning, Mr. Slick, I'm very much obliged to you for calling;" and with that he made another bow, and I give him back one again, and made tracks for Cherry street, as tickled as could be.

Wal, when Thursday cum, I begun to feel mighty anxious about the party: I had all the clothes sent down to my office, besides a prime hat, which I got, and a pair of real dandy boots that sot to my foot like wax.

As soon as it was dark I shut myself up and begun to fix. I declare I never did see anything fit as them checkered trousers did; they sot to my legs like the tin moulds to a pair of tallow candles in freezing time, and I felt as if I'd been jest corked up in a junk bottle, foot foremost. Arter I got them on, and all buttoned up tight, I begun to think that I should have to go to the party in the blue mixed socks that marm knit for me, the last thing afore I cum away from hum; for my feet had got hung in a slip of leather, that was sowed across the bottom of the trousers' legs, and how to get 'em out, so as to put on my boots, I couldn't tell. I pulled and kicked till I eenamost bust off my gallows' buttons but they wouldn't give a morsel, and at last I jest took hold on the leathers, and I give them an all-fired jerk till they slipped over my heel, and arter that I made out to roll up the trouser's legs till I could pull my boots on. When I pulled them down again the leathers stuck out from the heel of my boot behind, as if I had got spurs on; I didn't exactly like the feel of it, but "Who cares," sez I to myself, "a feller may as well be out of the world as out of the fashion, especially down here in York."

As soon as I'd got my trousers purty well braced up I put on the vest, and it sot like a button, for there wur holes behind and strings that laced up like a gal's corsets, and I girted up purty tight I can tell you. I snuggers, them yaller sprigs did glisten, and arter I'd put on the new stock that I bought along with the clothes, I ruther guess I cut a dash. It was all bowed off and curlacued over, with red and yaller sprigs, and it made my neck look as slim and shiney as our big red rooster's used to when he stretched his head out in the sun to see how many old hens and spring pullets he'd got about him.

I swanny, if I hadn't been in such a hurry to git on my new things that I forgot to wash my hands and face till jest as I was a putting on my coat! I peeked in the little looking-glass that I've got hung up in my office, and my hair was standing out every which way; and somehow my teeth looked as yaller as if I'd been chawin' tobacco a hull week. What to du I couldn't tell, but I picked up the Express, and looked into the advertisements to see if I could find out anything to make my grinders white—there warn't nothing there; but I happened to think that I'd seen Doctor Sherman's tooth-paste puffed in some of the papers: and though I don't mean to patronize anybody that don't advertise in our paper, I thought, seeing as I was in a hurry, per'aps it would be as well to go out and get some of it. I slipped on my old coat, and down I went into Nassau street, eena-most to the corner of Fulton street, and I bought a little cheney box full of red stuff, about as thick as hasty pudding, and as sweet as honey, and back I went again to the office like a streak of lightning.

I didn't know how to use the stuff, but think siz I, they must rub it on their teeth somehow, so I spread some on the corner of my towel, and began to polish away like all natur. It warn't two minits afore my teeth was as white as a niggers; so I jest washed them off in the hand basin, and went at my hair, tooth and nail.

How on arth these York chaps make their hair curl so, I can't guess—I tried to coax mine to twist up a little, on each side of my face, but it warn't of no use. I combed it out with a fine tooth comb, and I put some hog's lard scented with some of the essence of peppermint that marm give me to use if I should git the stomach ache down here, and I twisted it round my fingers, but it wouldn't stay curled a minit; so at last I gave it up for a bad job, and put on my new coat as mad as could be.

I ruther guess you couldn't have found a better looking chap of my size anywhere about, than I was, when I put on my yaller gloves, and fixed my new red silk handkerchief in my coat pocket, so as to let one end hang out a leetle, arter I'd put a few of the peppermint drops on it—and the way I pulled foot up Pearl street and toward Broadway, wasn't slow I can tell you. It takes a feller forever to fix here in York—I'd ruther slick up for twenty quiltings and apple-bees, than for one swarry, I can tell you. I was a'most skared to death, for fear I should be too late, for it was eena-jest dark afore I left the office, so I didn't let the grass grow under my feet on the way to cousin Beebe's, you may be sartin.

When I got to cousin Beebe's door, I pulled the silver knob kinder softly, for I felt a sort of palpitation of the heart at going into a room chuck full of quality; and I jest pulled up my dickey a little, and felt to see if my handkercher hung out of my pocket about right, afore the nigger opened the door. At last he made out to cum, and when I asked if all the folks was tu hum, he begun to show his chalkies jest as he did afore, and sez he,

"Yes, but they haint come down yit."

With that I pitched in, and, sez I, "Look a here, Cuffy, none of your grinning at me but jest mind your own bisness. I've come to see the swarry that Mr. Beebe's been a buying to treat his company with ; so jest shut your darned liver lips, and show it to me."

"Oh," sez he, a trying to choke in, "the swarry is going to be in the drawing room there, walk in."

"What, haint it come yit," sez I, "and where's all the folks?—I thought he was going to have a party, too."

"Wal, so he is," sez the nigger, "but they haint begun to come yit."

"Wal now," sez I to myself, "If this don't beat all creation. Now, in Connecticut it would a been eenamost time to go hum agin ; these Yorkers du beat all for laziness." With that I went into the room. By the living hokey, I never see anything like it! It was enough to dazzle one's eyes ; the two doors were slid back into the partition, and it seemed like one great ball-room ; and, besides that, there were too great winders at the further eend, that opened into a place that seemed kinder like a garden. I didn't know what to make of it, for it was chuck full of posies that looked as bright and as green as if it was the fourth of July, and yit it was a freezing like everything out of doors. I went down the room and stuck my head through the winder, and as true as I live it was a little room all full of bushes and roses sot up on benches ; it had a glass ruff, and the sides were one all-fired great winder, with little vines a hanging down over it, and a great tree chuck full of something that looked like oranges, a standing up agin it.

There were five or six cages full of little yaller birds a hanging among the bushes, and right back of the tree stuck over with oranges, stood a marble woman a holding up a bunch of grapes cut out of marble, with a lot of green leaves twisted round it as natrual as could be. It was awful harnsome, but I swan if it didn't make me feel streaked to look at her a standing there among the bushes, for she hadn't the least rag of kivering on, and it raly was enough to make a feller blush to see her a holding the grapes over her head, as if she wanted to make people look at her.

Think sez I, is this the swarry that Cousin Beebe has bought to show his company: I reckon he'd better have bought a calico frock or something of that sort to kiver over it. I couldn't bear to look at it, and so I jest turned about and stood still by the winder with my eyes wide open, for at t'other eend of the room was another garden with a naked swarry and bushes in it, as much like the one I'd been a looking in as could be. I went toward it, but stopped short, and burst out a larfin all by myself, for it was nothing but the same garden a shining in the great big looking glass, that I wrote to you about, that hung up right afore me.

Arter I'd stole another sly look at the orange tree and the swarry, I jest stuck my hands in my pockets as well as I could, considering they were so tight. and stickin out one foot, leaned back again the winder frame and looked around the room. A hot sweathering sun in dog-days could not have been brighter than everything was. There were two great things hung by chains from the middle of both rooms, with hundreds and hundreds of chunks of glass a hanging all over them; and they were stuck full of candles as white as curd, all a burning and blazing, till they looked like a heap of ice and snow hung up to melt in a fire. Both the mantle shelves were kivered over with them things that I told you about that looked so much like gold; some on 'em were lamps, and some had great white candles stuck into them; and there were lots on lots of flowers set in among them, that smelt as sweet as new hay, and such a shining and glistening I never did see. The best on it all was, that the whopping looking glasses on both eends the rooms made them seem twice as long, and as if they had a great many more things in them than they raly had. There were two round tables made out of some kind of cloudy stun, about as large as marm's cherry-wood tea-table, a standing at both eends of the rooms, all kivered over with leetle picters and all sorts of play-things, besides heaps of books with morocco backs and sprigged off with gold, all lying among them every which way, as if somebody had been in a hurry, and had pitched them on the tables without staying to pile them up.

Besides all that, they had brought in a whole heap more of them footstools that I told you about, and they had put square kind of back pillows all tossed off and kivered over with flowers at the eends of the two settees, besides a good many other things that I haint time to write about. "Wal," sez I to myself, "If Cousin Beebe don't take the shine off these New Yorkers in his party, I lose my guess; but I wonder where on arth he contrives to raise money to do it with these hard times, for all this must have cost him a few, I'm sartin."

Jest as I was thinking this, the cuffy come into the room, and sez I—

"Look a here, snow ball, when is the party a coming, I've seen the swarry all I want tu, and I'm eenamost tired of standing here and doing nothing."

"Wal," sez he, "I s'pose they'll be here in an hour or two,—it aint mor'n eight o'clock yit."

"I rather guess I shan't stay here all alone any longer," sez I, and with that I buttoned up my coat, and jest took a walk into the Apollo gallery to see the picters, till it was time for the party to cum. I haint time to say anything about the heap of harnsome picters that I saw, and besides, I mean to write you all about them some day afore long, for they are curios I can tell you. I felt so much pleased with looking at 'em, that it was long after nine afore I thought of it. So I jest started off agin for Cousin Beebe's. When I went in this time the rooms were brim full of people, and I was eenamost scared to death. I unbuttoned my coat and pulled up my dicky a leetle, besides giving my hair a brush—and then I went in with my head straight up, and my new fur hat in my hand; jest as I used to go in the singers' seat, there in Weatherfield. Think sez I, I'll jest let 'em know that I haint been to dancing school for nothing. So I held my hat a leetle afore me by the rim, and I made a genteel bow, first to one side and then to t'other. Arter that, I went and sot down on one of the settees, and I looked round for cousin Mary, for I felt kinder awk'ard; and I hadn't the least idee that she wouldn't have come up, as she used to in Weatherfield, and put out her hand and ask me if she should take my hat. But there I sot with it between my hands, a fingering it over as if it had been a hot potater, and she never cum near me. I felt dreadfully, for there was a lot of harnsome gals a staring at me, and puckering up their purty leetle mouths, as if they would a gin the world to larf right out. Arter a minit cousin John cum up to me, and sez he,

"Cousin Slick, I'm glad you've cum, step in the next room and take a glass of wine with me. Mrs. Beebe is so crowdod you won't get near her jest yit."

I got up, and we went into the entry way together, and then says cousin Beebe to the nigger, "Here, Ben, take Mr. Slick's hat."

The nigger took my hat and carried it off up stairs, and, arter a few minits, cousin John went back into the room where the company was, without saying another word about the wine.

"You had better go up and speak to Mary, now," sez he, kinder low; "there she stands by Count — I didn't hear the name, but it was some darned crabbed word, that was enough to choke a feller."

I hadn't looked round much when I cum in before, for somehow my head didn't feel steddly; but arter cousin John cum and spoke to me, I didn't seem to mind it, so I jest looked round as bold as could be. I declare I never did see any body dressed out as cousin Mary was. She had on a frock of shining satin, with harnsome pink sprigs all over it, and there was a great wide ruffle round the bottom, made out of something that looked as white and thin as a gal's veil the day arter she's married: and that was hitched up on one side half way to her waist, with a pink rose, made out of ribbon with long eends, that fell down eenamost to the floor. A heap of some kind of shiney thin stuff was ruffled round her bosom, and hung down round her arms, for her frock sleeves were short, and made like a little gal's; and she had on a pair of white gloves, with ribbon tops to 'em. One on 'em was fastened round her wrist with a wide piece of gold, and three or four bands set full of shiny stuns wos on t'other arm, which was plaguey white, or else I suppose she would not have let folks see it.

Mary al'ers had a tarnal purty little foot, but I never see it look so small as it did in that glistening white shoe of hern, and to own the rale downright truth, she didn't seem to be much ashamed to show it, but kept it stuck out from under the ruffler, as if she'd made up her mind to be ready to make a curchy any minit. There was one thing that kinder puzzled me a good deal; Mary's skin never was over white, but somehow it looked like wax work, that night, and you never see a meadow pink look brighter than her cheeks did; but instead of coming into her face and going away again, as every man likes to see the color in a gal's face when she's a talking, and knows that he's a looking at her, Mary's always kept jest so; it didn't seem as if an earthquake would make her turn pale.

The hair hung in long curls down her cheeks and on her shoulders, jest as it did the other day, and she had a great white rose stuck in among the curls, on one side of her head, that looked as if it hadn't but jest been picked off the bushes.

I looked at her putty earnestly, I can tell you, and I do think she would have been a critter that John might be proud of, if it warn't for that stuck up way which she's got since she cum down here to York. She don't du nothing on arth nateral, and as she did when she was a gal in Connecticut. Instead of standing up straight, and speaking to her company as if she was glad to see them, she stood with one foot stuck out and her hands jest crossed afore her, and kinder stooping for-ard, as if she couldn't but jest stand alone; I never see a critter's back stuck up as her's was, I raly thought she was a getting the rickets, and I felt so anxious about it that I turned to cousin Beebe, afore I went up to speak to her, and sez I, a sort of low—

"Cousin John, how did your wife hurt her back so? I declare it makes me feel awfully to see what a great hump she's got a growing since she cum away from Connecticut!"

With that cousin John looked at her and larfed a little, but I could see he didn't feel jest right, and arter a minit he said, sez he,

"Hush, cousin, you must not speak so loud; it's true Mary has put on rather too much bustle, but it's the fashion, you see." I looked round, and as true as you live there warn't a gal in the room that hadn't her back a sticking out jest the same way. Such a set of humpbacked critters I never did put my eyes on, and yit they all stood about a smiling and a talking to the fellers as if nothing ailed them, poor things! I never see a set of folks dressed out so much, and so awfully stuck up as they were. Some of the gals had feathers in their hair, and some had flowers or gold chains twisted among their curls, and I didn't see one there that wasn't dressed up in her silks and satins as crank as could be. As for the men, I thought I should have haw hawed right out a larfin to see some of 'em; there was one chap talking to Miss Beebe with his hair parted from the top of his head down each side of his face, and it hung down behind aff over his coat collar like a young gal's just before she begins to wear a comb; and there was two bunches of hair stuck out on his upper lip right under his nose, like a cat's whiskers when she begins to get her back up. Every time he spoke the hair kinder riz up and moved about till it was enough to make a feller crawl all over to look at him. Think sez I, if it wouldn't be fun to see that varmint try to eat. If he didn't get his victuals tangled up in that bunch of hair, he must know how to aim all-fired straight with his knife and fork.

Advancing in popularity, Jonathan finds that a fashionable cousin is anxious to become intimate with him. This cousin, Jase Slick, had made money by all means, and was a regular "smart citizen" of the Scadder species, but he was of that class, or aristocracy, known in America as "The Upper Ten Thousand."

This Mr. Jase Slick calls upon Jonathan, and, after some introductory remarks, he says—

"Now, cousin Slick," and you can't think how easy he seemed tu call me cousin; "you've done purty well since you come to York, considering that you hadn't nobody to help you along but Mr. Beebe; but you must git a peg higher yit; we must introduce you among the aristocracy."

"The what?" sez I.

"The aristocracy," sez he agin, strutting back, and poking one hand down into his trousers' pocket, as if he was a going tu take something out.

Wal, think sez I, I s'pose arter he's fumbled about long enough he'll show me what aristocracy is, if he carries it about in his pocket like the rest on 'em; but he only took out a piece of pinto gold, and begun to poke it between his teeth; and arter he'd got through, he made out tu finish what he was a saying.

"Now," sez he, "I think I've seen Mr. Beebe at the New England dinner, and at one or two places of that sort where one meets almost every body, and for a merchant that hasn't made enough to leave off business, I dare say he's a very respectable sort of a man, but he don't exactly belong tu the—the; that is, tu the class—who—which I mean tu take you inter, Mr. Slick; a class that claim some standing from their ancestors—men of family, that can be traced back like our's, cousin."

"Yes," sez I, sort o' pleased, "I believe we never had many relations tu be ashamed on. Par always used to say that grandpa Slick could make about the barnsomet pair of cow-hide boots of any feller in Weathersfield; and as for uncle Josh, I'd be darned if ever I saw his equal at shoeing a hor. They were prime old chaps both on 'em—rale peelers, I can tell you. Now, come tu think on it, there was one lary coot of a feller that never would work for a living; but he went off when I was a little shaver, and our folks don't know what became of him. He warn't much credit to us, that's a fact."

"I don't know what on arth made my pussey cousin get so fedgety all tu once, but he begun to hitch about in his chair, and turned as red as a winter apple; and, sez he—

"Cousin Slick, this isn't the way we gentlemen prove that we are men of family. If that was the way we did it, there aint many men in the country that would go back two generations without breaking their neck over a lap stone or an anvil. Now I have taken a good deal of pains to trace out our family line, and the only way I could du it was to skip all the mechanics and farmers, jest touch slightly on the merchants, lawyers and ministers, but to dwell purty particularly hard on them that lived high and did nothing; now a days it helps a feller along a good deal if he can count up an author or so; and it was considered something of a feather in a man's cap if any of his relations were sent to Congress a few years ago; but now, since they've got a kicking up a dust every other day in the Capitol, and spitting fire at each other like dogs and cats, it don't help a man much to claim any of them for connexions except here and there one that has got decency enough to be ashamed of the rest. I begin to be glad that none of our family ever got into politics much; but step to the door cousin Slick, and I'll show you the coat-of-arms that I've got on my carriage."

"Wal," sez I, "I don't care if I du, though it comes kinder tough to leave the stove this cold day." With that I tipped down my chair, and took my feet off from the stove and went to the door. By gracious! but he had a smasher of a coach standing there. It glistened and shone in the sun like a house afire. A great strapping nigger sot on a kind of double chair with a low narrer back, kivered over with fine brown broadcloth, all fringed and tossed off like any thing—and a great bear skin was hauled up over his legs, all scollop-ed off with red cloth and stuck over with coons' tails. The horses beat all live critters I ever did see; they were as black as crows, and I couldn't say which glistened the most, their tarnal smooth coots, or the harness put over them. They were all kivered over and sot out with silver. The horses had great yaller roses stuck on the sides of their heads, like a gal when she's dressed up for a party. My pussey cousin, he opened the door, and sez he,

"Look a here, cousin, haint this purty well got up?"

I looked inside, and there was a leetle sort of a room about big enough for cousin Beebe to put his swarry in, if he wanted to carry it about with him. It was all lined off and stuck full of cushions, and tossed and fringed like a curtained bed. Two great spotted skins lay tumbled up in the bottom, and there were leetle glass doors with steps to them on both sides; it raly was harnsome enough to make a feller's eyes feel snow-blind.

"Wal," sez I, a looking at my pussey cousin; "this does about take the shine off eenamost all the coaches that ever stopped to my office—and there's been a grist on e'm, I can tell you, and some with tarnal handsome ladies in them too."

"Yes," sez he, sort of interrupting what I was going to say; "but you haint a lock'ng at the coat of arms—that is what I want you to see."

"Wal," sez I, a giving the nigger a purty general survey, that sot back of the horses dressed up in sort of regimentals, all fined off with buttons and yaller cloth; "The coat is well enough—I don't see much to find fault with in it, though to own the truth, Captain Wolf, of the Weathersfield Independent Company, had a training coat that berts it all tu nothing. As for the critter's arms, niggers may be different to white people in that way, but I don't see much odds—mebby you mean this other chap's, and his are long enough, that's a fact."

With that I jest took a good squint at a great tall shote of a feller, with arms like a pair of flails hung up arter threshing. He was a standing up back of the coach, and a hanging on to a couple of great tossels fastened to it, as independent as a monkey in a show. His coat and trousers were just like the nigger's, and he had a great wide band of gold stuff round his hat! my pussey cousin only shook his head when I looked at the chap. The nigger twisted his neck round, and the tall varmint stuck his'n up, and they begun to grin and tee hee at each other over the coach.

"See here, this is what I mean," sez my cousin; and his fat cheek begun to grow red with the cold or something. With that he put his finger on a picter, all sprigged out with gold that was figgered on the door, and sez he, "this is the coat and arms."

"Wal," sez I, "I've seen a good many picters, but I never heard them called by that name afore. I s'pose this is some York notion that you've picked up, aint it?"

"It's the gинуine thing," sez he, "and I paid a deal of money for it, I can tell you."

"Wal," sez I, a looking at the consarn purty sharp; "them two critters a lying down there cut a considerable of a dash, that's a fact; but the rooster on the top, that are beats all. It's so nat'ral, it seems to me as if I could hear it cockadoodledoo right out."

"Yes," sez my cousin, "that is well done, aint it? But I see you don't exactly comprehend the science of heraldry. Now all these things mean something."

"You don't say so!" sez I.

"These are lions couchant," sez he, a pinting tu the wild critters.

"You don't say so!" sez I agin; "I've seen a good many lions in the shows that travel through Weathersfield, but I never saw a croushong afore. They look purty much alike, don't they though?"

With that the two varmints stuck up at each eend of the carriage begun to tee hee agin, and my pussey cousin, sez he, "Mr. Slick, supposing we go in."

"Wal," sez I, "but if you'd jest as lives, I should kinder like tu know what the rooster means afore we go."

"Can't you guess what part of the Slick family that belongs to?" sez he, a strutting up and rubbing his hands together as proud as could be.

"Wal," sez I, "I don't know, without it belongs to Aunt Lydia—par's old maid of a sister; she sartinly did beat all natur at raising chickens. You never heard of an egg turning out rotten, or a duck gitting drowned, on her premises."

With that the two chaps giggled right out, and stuck their fists into their darn'd great tatur-traps as if they felt a cold; and my pussey cousin, sez he, "it's a glitting cold—less go in."

"Wal," sez I, "I don't care if we du; but I tell you what, if them two chaps don't jest hush up their yop, I'll give them both an allfired thrashing—I will, by gosh!"

I ruther guess the two mean critters hauled in their horns a few at this; and arter I'd gin them both a purty savage look, we went into the office agin.

What the "pussey cousin" did next is thus described, and we have a full and accurate description of the mode in which the rich class of Americans deport themselves, and also of their curious mode of passing New Year's Day. Let it not, however, be supposed that there are none of a better class, though poorer, in America than that described here by Jonathan—a parvenu is the same in all lands; we know him in our own country ; let us, nevertheless, see how he looks in other lands :—

I made a leetle inquiry about how people did a New Year's Day and found out that it was the fashion for the wimmen tu stand treat that day, to set out things, and invite everybody that come tu take a bite. So arly in the morning I put a clean white towel on the leetle table in my office. Then I went into the cubby house room, where I keep my new clothes and kindling wood, besides my tooth brush and sich things as I don't want to use every day, and I drew a quart mug of that outrageous good cider, that you sent me by Captin Doolittle. I guess I looked like live when I went out agin, with the mug brimming over in one hand, and the pillow-case stuffed full of dough-nuts, that marm sent me t'other day—besides the hunk of cheese, and the lot of baked sweet apples, tucked under t'other, arm. I heaped up a pile of the dough-nuts on one corner of the table, and sot the apple-box on the other, and made room for the cheese and the cider in the middle ; and it raly made me feel sort of bad because marm couldn't see how nice I'd fixed it all. Think sez I, there won't be many people in York that'll set a better treat afore their visitors than this I reckon, any how, and as marm aint here I'll stand treat to every body that comes in for her sake.

Wal, who would be the fust critter that come in but cousin John Beebe, tu see what I was a going tu du with myself all day. Arter I'd sot him a chair by the stove, I went up to the table, and sez I,

"Cousin John supposing we take a drink ; its an all-fired cold day, and you look as if you couldn't stand it." My gracious, but didn't his eyes snap when he saw what I'd got. I mixed the cider up, purty hot with ginger, and then I sot it on the stove, and kept a stirring on it up with a little ivory thing that a purty gal sent me tu fold my letters with ; it begun to foam and sparkle like anything ; then I took a sip jest to try it, and handed the mug over to cousin John.

"Here," sez I, "take a swaller ; it aint like the pesky stuff you give me when I eat dinner up to your house. Instid of kicking up a dust in your upper story, it goes tu the right spot tu once, and makes a feller feel prime all over in a giffy." I ruther seem tu think that cousin John warn't much afeard of the mug anyhow ; he gave a sneezer of a pull tu it, and then his eyes begun to glisten, and, sez he—

"I'm beat, Jonathan, if this aint prime ; where on arth did you find it ? I've sarched from one eend of York tu t'other for it a dozen times, but never made out tu get a drop yit." With that he sot into it agin like all natur. "I declare," sez he, agin, choaking off long enough tu ketch his breath, "this does taste nat'ral."

"Aint it the rale critter ?" sez I, a bending for'ard and rubbing both hands together a leetle easy. It eenamost make me hum-sick when I first tasted on it, it put me so in mind of Weathersfield. Par sent me a whole cag on it, by Capt. Doolittle."

"Then it did come from the old humstid ?" sez he, a eyeing the mug agin—"I must drink a leetle more, for the sake of them that sent it." With that, he jest finished up the mug; and when he sot it down, he drew a long breath, and sez he agin, "that's prime, Jonathan."

"Aint it," sez I, starting off to fill up the mug agin, for it tickled me to see how he took tu the drink, and how much he made himself to hum in my office. When I cutn out of the leetle room agin, John he looked sort of eager at the mug, and then at the eatables laid out so tempting.

"I declare," sez he, "I begin tu feel as I used tu when we were boys, Jonathan." With that I sot the table between us, and the way we laid in the provinder was a compliment to marm. Arter cousin Beebe had eat ten of the dough-nuts, and a hunk of cheese as big as your fist, he stopt short, and sez he—

"Cousin, this wont du, if we keep on eating as much as we want, we shan't find room for all the eatables and drinkables that the folks will give us to-day, when we make our calls."

"Look a here, cousin Beebe," sez I, kinder anxious, "you know I'm a sort of a greenhorn about New Years, for we don't have no sich things ever amongst us. Supposing you jest tell me how they act and so on. I don't want tu make a coot of myself; and that pussey cousin of mine is a coming tu take me round in his carriage, where I suppose he means tu stick me up like a swarry for folks tu look at; and if I don't du everything according to gunter, he'll be turning red and fussing about like an old hen that's got ducks for chickens. What on arth shall I say to the gals, and what will they expect me to du?"

Cousin Beebe he sot still a minit, kinder nibbling away at the end of a dough-nut, for he seemed mortal loth to choke off, and at last sez he—

"When you come tu a house where you want tu call, jest go into the room where the ladies will be a waiting tu see folks, and arter a while they'll ask you to take some refreshments: with that they'll go up tu a table where there's wine and so on, if they hain't teetotalists, and if they be——"

"It don't make no odds tn tell me how they act," sez I, "for I don't call on anybody that sets up to be wiser than our Savior; he turned water into wine, and when I set up tu be better than him, I'll turn up my nose at it, but not afore. I wish you could a heard par argufy that question with the ministers. I rather qesse——"

Here cousin Beebe sot in, and sez he, "Well, just fill up a glass for the lady about half full, not a drop more, then pour out a glass for yourself——"

"What, full?" sez I.

"Sartinly," sez he.

"Wal," sez I, "that seems kinder hoggish to give yourself mere than you du tu the lady; I don't seem tu like that."

"It's the fashion," says he.

"Oh, is it?" sez I; wal I think as like as not they know how to help themselves after a feller's gone. I always notice that the gals that are so mighty stuck up as if they couldn't swaller anything but air before folks, stuff like all natur back of the pantry door."

John larfed a leetle as if he agreed with me, and sez he, "Never mind that now, but when you've poured out the wine, just step back and make a bow, and say, 'The compliments of the season,' or any other interesting thing that you like. A person of your genius should not be at a loss for pleasant sayings—and after that drink off the wine, take a leetle of anything else that is on the table, and go away agin."

"Wal now," sez I, "I can remember what to say well enough, though it does seem to me that there would be a leetle too much soft sodder in the speech, if it warn't made to a lady; but suppose you jest go over the manœuvre about the wine, so that I can get the kink on it, if you hain't no objection."

"Very well," sez he, a taking up the cider mug, "observe me." Witn that he made a purlite bow, and give another allfired pull at the drink. I see what the critter was at; but think sez I, I ruther think you've had your share of the cider. With that, I put out both hands a leetle easy, and took the mug from his mouth.

"See if I hain't larnt it," sez I, as sober as a deacon; and with that I made him a low bow, and while I was a drinking off the cider, I jest winked one eye over the top of the mug, tu let him see that I was up tu a thing or two. The minit I pulled up, he began tu laugh as good-natured as a kitten; and arter I'd got my breath, I sot in, and we had a good haw-haw right out in the office.

Arter we'd both got sobered down, John he gave me an invite to come up and see Mary, and then he cut stick to go home and fix for visiting. I hadn't but jest time to run out and git a piece of Injun rubber to clean my yaller gloves with, and begin tu fix up, when my pussey cousin come up the street, hurra boys, carriage and all, arter me. The tall chap let himself down from behind the carriage, and knocked at the door.

"Come in," sez I, a poking round the office arter a pin tu stick my shirt-collar together, where the eternal washerwoman had washed the button off, consarn her!

The feller was dressed up like a Connecticut Major-General, all in yaller and blue, as fine as a fiddle; he kinder grinned a little when he see my table, and that I hadn't got my fix on yet; but when I looked in his face, he choked in, and, sez he, as humble as could be—

"Mr. Slick, my master is a waiting."

"Tell him not to be in a pucker," sez I, "I ain't quite spruced up yet." With that he went out—I pitched on my clothes in less than no time, stuffed a baked apple and a few dough-nuts into my coat pocket, for fear of accident, and follered arter. There he stood a holding open the glass door, and a set of little steps, all carpeted off, hung down tu the ground; and there was the fat nigger a twistifying his whip-lash round the horses' heads, as crank as a white man. I jest had time tu see that Jase had got his lions and roosters and crouchants pictured off on the curtain that hung round his seat; and then I jumped into the carriage as spry as a cricket. The tall chap folded up the steps as quick us marm could undu a cat's cradle, and shet the door tu, and away we went like a house a-fire. I swanny!

but these coaches du go over the ground as slick as grease; it seemed jest like being bolstered up in a rocking-chair! My pussey cousin seemed tu swell up bigger and bigger every minit, when he see how surprised I was with the spring of it; and, sez he—

“Now, cousin, I’m going tu take you tu see somebody worth knowing, and when they know that you’re my relation, they’ll take a good deal of notice of you; so jest put your best foot foremost.”

Think sez I, it’s looky that I got cousin Beebe tu show me how it’s done; but I kept a close lip and said nothing, for it was snapping cold, and a feller’s words seemed as if they’d turn tu ice, before he spoke ’em.

The nigger driv like fire and smoke, and it didn’t seem no time afore we stopped by a great house clear up town, and the tall shote opened the door and undid the steps again, as if he expected us to git out.

“This is my house,” sez my pussey cousin, “you go in and call on the ladies, and I’ll dive round to one or two houses, and take you with me again, by and by.”

I got up sort of loth, for it seemed kinder awk’ard to go in alone; but afore I had a chance to say so, the tall shote shet tu the stairs, gin the door a slam, hopped up behind agin, and away they went like a streak of lightning.

I stood a minit, a looking about. It was cold enough to nip a feller’s ears off, so I jest tucked my hands into my pockets as well as I could, and begun tu stomp my foot on the stun walk. It raly was fun to see the streets chuck full of fellers running up and down, hither and yon, as if the old Nick had kicked them on eend. Every one on ’em was dressed up in his Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes, and they all had their hair slicked down exactly alike, and most on ’em looked more like gals in boys’ clothes than anything else. Not the shadow of a petticoat could a feller see, from one eend of York tu the other—it seemed as if the hull city had run tu boys for one day. The streets raly looked lonesome; for, arter all, it don’t seem nat’ral to go out and not see gals and women a walking about with their purty faces and fine clothes. A city without them, looks like a piece of thick woods without any sweet, green under brush-wood and harnsome flowers. I don’t know exactly why, but when I go into a place where there’s nothing but men, it seems as if all the sunshine and posies of human natur was shet out; and as I stood there afore my pussey cousin’s house, it made me feel sort of melancholy not to see the least glimpse of a red shawl or a furbelow nowhere about.

I believe arter all, that when a chap is a leetle scared about doing a thing, the best way is tu pitch for’ard, hit or miss, without thinking on it. So as soon as I’d got a leetle grit raised, I up and pulled the door knob as savage as could be. It was an all-fired big chunk of silver though, and the piece spread out on the door was as big as a dinner-plate, and there was “JASON SLICK” cut out on it in all sorts of flourishes and curlecues. Think sez I, my pussey cousin means to hang out a specie sign, anyhow. I wonder he didn’t have his rooster and lion and crouchants pictured off in his door too.

Arter a minit a tall chap that looked like a twin tu the feller that stood behind the carriage, all dressed out jest as he was, too, like a major-gineral, stood a bowing and shuffling in the hall, as if he wanted to larn me how to dance. The way he sidled and bowed and spread out his hands as he opened the parlor door for me, was enough to make a feller burst with larfin. Wal, afore I knew which eend my head was on, there I stood in the middle of a great long room, that was enough to dazzle a feller's eyes for a month, eenajest to look at it. The settees were all bright read, and glistened with thick velvet cushions. Great, heavy, yaller curtains hitched up with spears and holes, made out of gold, or something plaguey like it, hung over all the winders—all furbelowed and toased off with great, blue balls, mixed up with red fringe. The carpet was the brightest and softest thing I ever did see—but it was enough tu make a feller stun blind tu look at it, the figgers on it were so allfired gaudy. Everything in the room was as costly and harnsome as could be; but somehow it seemed as if every individual thing had come there on its own hook, and was so proud of itself that it wouldn't agree with its neighbors. The chairs looked dreadfully out of sorts with the settees, and the great looking-glasses made everything seem ten times more fiery and bright with their glistening. The hull room seemed more like a garden planted with poppies, sun-flowers, and marygolds, than anything I could think on. There was a table sot out at one eend, jest afore one of the looking-glasses, that made it seem as long agin as it raly was. It was all kivered over with silver baskets and knives and forks, and glasses, and everything that could be thought on tu eat and drink. At both eends were leetle meeting-houses with steeples tu them, all made out of sugar-candy, and hull loaves of cake with flowers and birds a lying down on top of 'em; besides some had leetle sugar lambs curled up on 'em as nat'ral as life. I never did see a table so set off in my born days; it was a sight to look on. Cousin Beebe's warnt a touch tu it; but somehow the things were all crowded on so, and there was sich heaps of everything, that it didn't seem half so geenteel as Cousin Mary's did. It must have cost an allfired swad of money, though.

I was so struck up with the room and the table, that it was more than a minit afore I found out that there were any folks in the premises; but by-am-by I discovered a fat chunked woman a sitting in a rocking chair all cushioned with red shiny velvet. She sot close by the fire, but when I stepped back and put my foot out to make a bow, she got up and made me a curchy—but sich a curchy I never did see—it was about half-way between the flutter of a hen and the swagger of a fat duck. It was as much as I could du to keep from snorting right out to see her; but I choked in, and sez I, bowing again, "You see I make myself tu hum, marm. Mr. Slick, my pussey cousin, out there, wanted me to come and make you a New Year's call."

I wish you could a seen how the critter strutted up when I said this; but all tu once she seemed to guess who I was, for she stuck her head a one side, and begun to smile and pucker up her mouth like all natur. Up she cum tu me with both hands out, and sez she—

"Cousin, I'm delighted to see you. Mr. Slick was telling me about you yesterday, and sez I, invite him by all means. It ain't often we can make free with a relation, they are so apt to presume upon it. Raly, some of Mr. Slick's family have been very annoying, they have indeed ; they don't seem to understand our position ; but you, cousin, you that have so much mind, can comprehend these things."

Afore I could get a chance to stick in a word edgeways, she took my hand, yaller glove and all, between both her'n, and led me along to the fire. Arter I'd sot down, she kept a fingering over one of my hands as if it belonged to her. Think sez I, what on arth can the old critter mean ? I'll be darnd, if she was fifteen years younger, I should think she had such a notion to the family, that she wasn't particular how many on 'em she made love tu. As soon as I could gither to give up my hand, she jest let'n drop on my knee as affectionate as a pussy cat, and sez she, a screwing up her mouth, and sucking her face close up to mine—

"Cousin, you can't think how delighted I was to read your letters in the Express. I du like to see such upstarts as the Beebe's taken off ; only think of the idee of her giving parties, and her husband not out of business yit ! When I read that letter, sez I to Mr. Slick, 'bring the young gentleman here, where he can see something of real high life ; it would be a pity to have him throw away his talons in describing such low affairs as Mrs. Beebe's must be.' " With that she looked round her blasing room as proud as could be, as if she wanted me to give her some soft sodder back agin ; but I felt sort of wrathly at what she said about cousin, and I wouldn't take the hint ; but sez I, " I beg pardon, marm, but Mr. Beebe is my friend and relation, and a chap that'll set still and hear a friend run down, don't deserve one, according to my notion ; as for cousin Mary —"

"Oh," sez Mrs. Slick, a twisting round like an eel, "she is a lovely woman, without any doubt. I sartinly should have called on her long ago ; but then one has so many acquaintances of that sort to remember, that really I have never found time." Think sez I, if you won't call till Mary wants you, I don't think you'll put yourself out in a hurry ; but I didn't say so, for jest that minit she seemed to remember something, and she sung out, "Jemima, my dear."

With that the yaller curtains by one of the winders were rustled and flirtd out, and a young gal, fined off to kill, come from where she'd been standing back on 'em to look at the fellers as they went along the street. I ruther guess there was a flirting of ribbon and a glistening of gold things when she made her appearance. She came a hopping and a dancing across the room, and when she came jest afore me, she stopped short and let off a curchy that seemed more like one of her mother's run crazy, than anything I could think on. The old woman she spread out her hands, and sez she, "Jemima, my dear, this is your cousin, Mr. Slick, the gentleman whose letters you were so delighted with"

With that the queer critter gave me another curchy and looked as if she'd been glad if she'd known enough to say something ; but the old woman sot in with a stream of talk about her till any body on earth would have sot her down fir an angel jest out of heaven, dressed up in pink satin and loaded off with gold, if they'd believed a word her mother said. Think sez I to myself, as I stood a looking at the old woman and the gal, it's enough to make a feller sick of life to see two such stuck up critters. The gal's furbelows didn't look so bad considering she was so young, yet it always seems to me as if heaps of jimcracks and finery piled on to a young critter looked kinder unnat'ral. Wimmen are a good deal like flowers to my notion, and the harnsomest posies that grow in the woods never have but one color besides their leaves. I've seen gals in the country with nothing but pink sun bonnets and calico frocks on, that looked as fresh and sweat as full blown roses—gals that could pull an even yoke with any of your York tippies in the way of beauty, and arter all if I ever get a wife I don't think I shall sarch for her among brick houses and stun side-walks.

The old woman raly had made an eternal coot of herself in the way of fixing. She had on a lot of satin, and shiny thin stuff twisted round her head kinder like a hornet's nest; in front on it, jest over the leetle curls all rolled and frizzled round her face, a bird—a rale ginuine bird, all feathered off as bright as a rainbow—was struck with its bill down and its tail flourished up in the air, as if it had jest lit to search for a place to build a nest in. I never see one of the kind afore, for its tail looked like a handful of corn-silk, it was so yaller and bright; but, think, sez I, it must be some sort of a new-fashioned woodpecker, for it's the natur of them birds always to light on any thing holler—and if he was once to get a going on that old woman's head, I've an idee ther'd be a drumming. She had a leetle thort neck, all hung round with chains, and capes, and lots of things—besides a leetle watch, all sot over with shiny stuns, was hung to her side, and her fat chunked fingers was kivered over with rings, that looked like the spots on a toad's back more than any thing else. She had a great wide ruffle round the bottom of her frock, like the one cousin Mary had on at her party; but she warn't no where nigh so tall as Mary, and it made her look like a bantum hen feathered down to the claws. Wal, think sez I, if you wouldn't make a comical figger-head for Captain Doolittle's sloop. I wonder what your husband would ask for you, jest as you stand—hump, ruffles and all? I shouldn't a taken so much notice of her, if she hadnt let off such a shower of talk on me about her darter; but when a woman begins to pester me by praising up her family, I always make a pint of thinking of something else as fast as I can. If you only bow a leetle and throw in a “yes marm, sartingly,” and so on, once in a while, you're all right. A woman will generally soft-sodder herself, if you let her alone when she once gits a going, without putting you to the trouble of doing it for her.

Arter she'd talked herself out of breath, she went along up to the table, and spreading her hands, sez she, “Take some refreshments, Mr. Slick?”

“Wal,” sez I, “I haint much hungry, but I do feel a leetle dry—so I don't care if I du.”

I went up to the table, and took a survey of the decanters and cider-bottles ; and arter a while, I made out to find one decanter that looked as if it had something good in it, and poured abou ta thimble full into two of the wine glasses, and filled up one for myself. Mrs. Slick and her darter took up the glasses, and then I stepped back and made a low bow, and sez I, " The compliments of the season !—or any other interesting thing that you like. A person of your genius —— " Here I stuck fast, for somehow I forgot how cousin Beebe told me to top off in the speech. But the old woman puckered up her mouth, and curchyed away as if I'd said it all out ; and the gal, she went over the same manœuvre, and laughed so silly, and put back her long curls with her white gloves—for she had gloves though she was tu hum—and sez she, " Oh, Mr. Slick," and then her marm chimed in, and sez she, " Now that you've mentioned genius, Mr. Slick, I do think my Jemima has a talent for poetry."

Think sez I, it raly is surprising how much genius there is buried up in these York brick houses. I hain't been to see a family since I've been down here that hadn't some darter that could write so beautiful, only she was so proud and diffident and modest, that she could not be coaxed to have any thing printed, Think sez I, if that leetle stuck up varmint has took to poetry there'll be a blase in the newspaper world afore long. She's sartin to set the North River on fire, if nobody else ever did.

I remembered what cousin Beebe told me about helping myself to eatables, so I sot down by the table and hauled a plate up to me, and begun to make myself to hum. There was no eend to the sweet things that I piled up on my plate and begun to store away with a silver knife and a spoon. Mrs. Slick, she begun to fuss about, and offered to help me to this, that and t'other, till I should raly have thought she didn't care how much I eat, if she hadn't contrived to tell me how much everything cost all the time. Jest as I was finishing off a plate of foreign presarves, the door-bell rung, and in streaked five or six fellers, dressed up tu kill. It raly made eenamost snicker out to see how slick and smooth every one of 'em had combed his hair down each side of his face. They all looked as much alike as if they'd been kidney beans shelled out of the same pod. When the old woman and the gal sot to wriggling their shoulders and making curchies to them, I begun to think it was time for me to get up and give them a chance. So I bolted the last spoonful of presarves, and took out my red silk hankercher to wipe my mouth. I thought it come out of my pockets purty hard, so I gave it a twitch, and hurra ! out come three of the doughnuts that I'd tucked away to be ready in case of fodder's getting scarce, and they went helter-skelter every which way all over the carpet. At fust I felt sort of streaked, for the young chaps begun to giggle, and Miss Jemima Slick she bust right out. I looked at her, and then I looked at the fellers, and then, instead of sneaking off, I bust right out, jest as if I didn't know how they come there, and sez I,

" Did you ever ! "

I didn't say another word, but jest made them a low bow all round, and was a going out, but Mrs. Slick got hold of my arm, and told me not tu seem to mind the doughnuts, and said, sort of low, that she'd tell the gentlemen that I was a relation of her'n, and that there warn't no danger of their poking fun at me about it. Think sez I, I see how to get out of the scrape: she'll think I'm awful mean not to offer her some of the doughnuts, when I had them in my pocket, so seeing it's new-year's day, I'll make her think I bought 'em to make her a present on, for relation's sake. I jest went back and picked up the tarnal things, and heaping them up in one hand I made a smasher of a bow as I held 'em out tu her, and, sez I—

"I thought mebbly you'd like tu see how a prime Weathersfield doughnut would taste agin; so I jest tucked a few one side, tu bring up here; take 'em, you're as welcome as can be; I've got enough more tu hum."

She looked at the gentlemen, and then she turned red, as if she didn't exactly know how tu take me.

"Don't be afeared on 'em," sez I, "they're fust rate; chuck full of lasses, and fried in hog's lard as white as snow."

With that she took them out of my hand and put them on the table, and, sez she, a puckering up her mouth, "you men of genius are so droll."

Think sez I, I've made a good hit off this time, ony how, so I'll cut stick. I made anotner bow, and out I went, jest as the chaps were all a bowing and saying, "the compliments of the season," one arter another, like boys, in a spelling class.

Returning to Weathersfield for a short time, Jonathan grows weary of the country and once more goes to New York as super-cargo. On this occasion he takes up his quarters at the Astor House Hotel, and becoming acquainted with Fanny Elssler, he falls in love with her manuers, herself, and her legs. She gives him a pass on the theatre, and he resolves that she shall have a bouquet. How he procured the bouquet is thus told:—

The minit I got to the sloop I took off my coat, for I didn't seem to hum enough in the Astor House to write there. I sot down in the cabin, and stretching out my legs on a butter-tub, I turned up my riethands and wrote off the letter that I sent you t'other day on the top of an onion barrel, without stopping once, I was so tar-nationed anxious to let you know how I was a getting along.

I had to bite off short, for a chap come aboard the sloop with Captain Doolittle to bargain for the cargo of oider and garden sarse. I was afeared that they would want to overhaul my writing desk, and so made myself scarce, and went up to the Express with the letter stuck loose inside the crown of my hat, editor fashion.

I left the hull letter with the clerk, and axed him where on arth a chap could git a smashing bunch of posies, if he took a notion to want sich a thing. He told me to go right straight up to Mr. Hogg's, clear up town along the East River, and said that I'd better git aboard a Harlem car, and it would carry me right chock agin the spot for a ninepence.

"Wal," sez I, "the expense aint nothing to kill, so I guess I'll ride."

With that, I got into one of them all-fired awk'ard things that look like a young school-house sot on wheels, and running away with the scollars stowed inside; and arter shelling out my ninespence, we sot out up Centre-street, through the Bowery, and all along shore, till we stopped short nigh agin the Astoria ferry, clear up town. Arter searching around a little, I found Mr. Hogg's garden, and went in. A great, tall, good-natured looking chap cum up to me as I was peaking about—a feller that made me feel hum-sick in a minit, he looked so much like our folks.

"How do you du?" sez I, "I'm tickled to see you; they told me that you keep posies about these ere premises, but I don't see no signs of 'em."

"Oh," sez he, as good as pie, "come this way, and I guess we can find as many as you want."

"Wal," that'll be a good many, for I'm a hard critter on mary-golds and holly-hocks," sez I, "and I want a smashing heap on 'em."

With that, Mr. Hogg, instead of taking me into a garden, jest opened the door of a great long, low, house, with an all-fired great winder covering the hull roof, and sez he—

"Walk in."

I guess I did walk in, for the house was chuck full of the harnsomet trees and bushes that I ever sot eyes on, all kivered over with posies, and smelling so sweet, that a bed of seed onions, jest as it busts out in a snow-storm of white flowers, aint nothing compared to it. Didn't I give good long snuffs as I went in! This idea, to my notion, of posies amongst big trees and bushes, are like wimmen folks and young ones in the world of human natur. If they arnt good for something else they are plaguey harnsome to look at, and the world would be awful dark and scraggy without them. Some wimmen may be bad enough and hateful as henbane, but consarn me if I wouldn't rather love thorn bushes than none at all.

There was one tree that took my eye the minit I went in; it hung chuck full of great big oranges, and tell me I lie right out, if there wasn't a swad of white posies a busting out through the great green leeves in hull handfuls, all around on the same limbs where the oranges were a growing. Think sez I, this raly is a genuine scripture lesson, spring and a gitting in love with each other and hugging together on the same bush; oh, gracious! how the parfume did pour out from the middle of that tree! I felt it a steaming up my nose and creeping through my hair, till I begun to feel as sweet as if I'd been ducked all over in a kettle full of biled rose leaves.

Mr. Hogg he went along among the great high rows of bushes sot in a heap, one on top of t'other almost to the glass ruff, with a good sized jack-knife in his hand, and then he cut and slashed among the green leaves and red roses, and piled up a bunch of posies about the quickest! Yet I wasn't satisfied, he didn't seem to pick out the rale critters, but tucked in the leetle fined buds jest as if he couldn't guess what I wanted 'em for.

"Oh, now you git out," sez I, when he handed over a hull swad of posies done up in a grist of leaves; "you don't mean to put me off with that ere! why, it aint a flee-bite to what I want. Come now, hunt up a few hollyhocks, and marygolds, and poppies, and if you've got a good smashing hidaranger, purple on one side and yaller on tother, tuck it in the middle."

Mr. Hogg he stood a looking right in my eyes with his mouth a little open, as if he didn't know what to make of it.

"The season is over for those things," sez he, "and I haint got one in the hot-house."

"Wal," sez I, "du the best you can, all things considering, only tuck in the big posies and enough on 'em, for I'm going to give 'em to a sneezer of a harnsome gal—so don't be too sparing."

With that Mr. Hogg sarched out some great red and yaller posies, with some streaming long blue ones a sticking through them, and arter a while he handed over something worth while—a great smashing bunch of posies as big as a bell-squash choked in at the neck.

Arter I'd examined the consarn to be sartin that all was ship-shape, I made Mr. Hogg a bow, and, sez I.

"I'm much obliged to you,—if ever you come to Weathersfield in the summer time, marm will give you jest as many and be tickled with the chance. She beats all natur at raising these sort of things."

He looked at me sort of arnest, but yet he didn't seem to be jest satisfied, and after snapping his thumb across the blade of his jack-knife a minit, he spoke out, but seemed kinder loth.

"We generally sell our bokays," sez he, arter haming and hawing a leetle while.

"Wal," sez I, "mebby I shall want one some of these days, and then I'll give you a call—but any how I'm obliged to you for the posies all the same."

I wanted to offer him a fourpence for the trouble of picking the posies, but he looked so much like a gentleman and a Weathersfield Deacon, I was scared for the fear he'd think I wanted to impose on him if I offered money. So I made him another bow, and went off while he stood a looking arter me as if I'd been stealin a sheep. I have wished since that I'd offered him the fourpence, for he kinder seemed to calculate on something like it. I stopped into a store, and bought a yard of wide yaller ribbon, and arter tying it round my bunch of posies in a double bow not, with great long eends a streaming down, I took the critter in my hand, and cut dirt for the theatre, for it was a gittin nigh on to dark.

Susan Reid, a young girl who had been Jonathan's companion at the Singing and Sunday School, was forced by change of fortune to leave her native place, and, with her mother, to seek support in New York as a needle-woman. Jonathan had heard that she was employed in a first class milliner's and staymaker's, and one day being disengaged he resolved to seek for her; accordingly he enters the first "grand store," or, as we would say, shop, of millinery he meets, and here he falls into the mistake of endeavouring to buy a fashionable French stays, supposing it to be a newly invented side-saddle:—

A leetle bit of a stuck up old maid stood back of a counter, all sot off with bonnets and feathers that looked tempting enough to make a feller's purse jump right out of his trousers' pocket. She had on a cap all bowed off with pink ribbons, that looked queer enough round her leetle wizzled up face, and a calico frock, figgered out with great bright posies, besides one of them ere sort of collars round her neck, all sprigged and ruffled off as slick as a new pin. Her waist varn't bigger round than a quart cup, and she stuck her hands down in the pockets of her dashy silk apron, as nat'ral as I could a done it myself. I was jest a going to ask if Susan Reed worked there, when a lady come in and wanted to buy a bonnet. At it they went, hand over first, a bargainin and a tryin on red and yaller and pink and blue bonnets.

The milliner she put one sort on, and then another, and went on pouring out a stream of soft sodder, while the lady peaked at herself in a looking-glass, and twistified her head about like a bird on a bramble bush, and at last said, she didn't know, she'd look a leetle further, mebby she'd call agin, if she didn't suit herself, and a heap more palavar, that made the leetle woman look as if she'd been a drinking a mug of hard cider.

While the lady was trying to edge off to the door, and the milliner was a follering her with a blue bounet, and a great long white feather a streaming in her hand, I jest took a slantindicular squint at the glass boxes that stood about chuck full of jim-cracks and furbelows, for there was something in one of 'em that raly looked curious. It was a sort of a thing stuffed out and quilted over till it stood up in the glass box as stiff and pardendicular as a baby's go-cart.

I jest put my hands down in my pockets sort of puzzled, and stood a looking at the critter to see what I could make on it. Arter I'd took a good squint at the consarn, up one side. down t'other, and down the middle, right and left, I purty much made up my mind that it was one of them new-fashioned side-saddles, that I'd heard tell on, and I took a notion into my head that I'd buy one and send it to marm. So when the leetle old maid cum back from the door, I jest pinte at the saddle, and sez I,

"What's the charge for that are thing?"

"Why, that pair," sez she, a sticking her head on one side, and a burying her hands, that looked like a hawk's claws, down in the pocket of her cunning short apron, "I'll put them to you at twelve dollars; they're French-made, 'lastic shoulder straps, stitched beautifully in the front, chuck full of whalebone—and they set to the shape like the skin to a bird."

Lord a massey, how the little stuck up critter did set off the talk! I could'n't shove in a word edgeways, till she stopped to git breath, and then sez I,

"I s'pose you throw in the martingales, sirsingle, and so on, don't you?"

"The what," says she, a stepping back, and squinting up in my face sort of cross, as if she didn't like to throw in the whole harnessing at that price.

"The martingale," sez I, "and the sirsingle; but mebbey you have some other name for 'em down here in York. I mean the straps that come down in front to throw the chest out, and give the neck a harnsome bend, and the thing to girt up in the middle with. Marm wont know how to use this new-fashioned thing if I don't send all the tackle with it."

"Oh," sez the milliner, "I didn't understand; you want the laces and the steel in front; sartinly we give them in. The steel is kivered with kid, and the laces are of the strongest silk."

"Wal," sez I, "I never heard of a steel martingale, and I should be afeard they wouldnt be over pliable."

"Oh," sez she, "you can bend 'em double. they give so."

"How you talk," says I, "it raly is curious what new inventions people du have, but somehow it sort of seems to me that a silk girt might be a leetle too slimpsey, don't you think so marm?"

"Lor, no sir," sez she, "they are strong enough, I can tell you; jest take a look at the Broadway ladies, they never use anything else and they girt tight enough, I'm sure."

I hadn't the least idee what the critter was a diving at; she see that I looked sort of puzzled, and I s'pose she begun to think that I shouldn't buy the saddle.

"Look here," sez she, a putting her hands on both sides of her leetle stuck up waist; I've got 'em on myself, so you can judge how tight they can be fitted."

"Gaully offalus!" sez I, a snorting out a larfing, and a eyeing the leetle fined old maid; but I didn't think it was very good manners to burst right out so, and I tried all I could to choke in. Gracious me! think, sez I, no wonder the York gals have such humps on their backs, since they've got to wearing saddles like horses.

By-am-by, arter I'd eenamost bust myself a trying to stop a larfing, it come into my head that the critter of a milliner was a trying to poke fun at me, cause I wanted to beat her down; for I couldn't believe the tippies quite so bad as to girt up and strap down like a four year old colt. Wal, think sez I, I'll be up to her anyhow; so I looked jest as mealy-monthed as if I believed her, and sez I, as innocent as a rabbit in a box trap, sez I,

"If the wimmen folk have took to wearing saddles, I s'pose they haint forgot the bridles tu; so I don't care if I take this ere pair for some old maids we've got in our parts. If I had my way, they'd all be bitted the minit they turned the fust corner. Darn'd talking critters them old maids are, marm," sez I, a looking at her sort of slanting, jest to let her see she hadn't got hold of quite so great a greenhorn as she seemed to think.

Lord a Massey, how she did look! Her leetle wizzled up face begun to twist itself up till it looked like a red winter apple puckered up by the frost. I didn't seem to mind it, but put my hand down in my pocket sort of easy, and begun to whistle Yankes Doodle.

"You haint got no bridles then?" sez I, after a minit; for she looked wrathful enough to spit fire, and sot up sich an opposition in the pocket line, that I was raly afeard her leetle hands would bust through the silk or break her apron strings, she dug down so.

"Bridles! no!" sez she, as spiteful as a meat-axe jest ground, "but I'll send out and git a halter for you, with all my heart."

"Gaully!" sez I, "but you're clear grit—smart as a steel trap, aint you?"

"Yes," sez she, more spitefully yet, "when it snaps at some animal like you, that don't know enough to keep out of its teeth?"

Think sez I, Mr. Jonathan Slick, Esq., it's about time for you to haul in these horns of your'n. You aint no match for a woman, anyhow; there never was a critter of the feminine gender, that couldn't talk a chap out of his seven senses in less than no time.

"Gaully," sez I, "you've about used me up—I begin to feel streaked as lean pork in the bottom of a barrel. I guess I shan't tackle in with a smart critter like you agin in a hurry! but don't git too mad; it'll spile that harnsome face of your'n. I swan! but I should think you was eenamost thirty this minit, if I hadn't seen the difference before you begun to rile up."

Didn't the puckers go out of her face when I said this! She was mollified down in a minit. I don't s'pose she ever had twenty years took off from her good fifty so slick afore in her hull life; but it aint human natur to come out all to once,—at any rate, it aint an old maid's natur, when her back once gits up. So when I see her darned thin lips begin to pucker and twist into sort of a smile, I let off a leetle more soft sodder, and wilted her down like a cabbage-leaf in the sun; and then sez I, a pinting to the glass-box—

"Come, now, s'posing we strike up a trade. I've took a sort of a sneaking notion to that ere new-fashioned side-saddle. So if you'll throw in the tackling, I'll give you ten dollars for it, cash on the nail."

"That what?" said she, a looking fust at me and then at the saddle, with her mouth a leetle open and her eyes sticking out like peeled onions. "That what."

"Why, that are saddle," sez I, beginning to feel my dander rise.

"That saddle," sez she, "that saddle; why, sir, did you take that pair of French corsets for a saddle?"

With that she slumped down into a chair, and kivered her face with both hands, and larfed till I raly thought the critter would a split her sides. The way she wriggled back'rd and for'd, teeheeing and haw-hawing, was enough to make a Presbyterian Missionary swear like a sea-captain.

"That saddle!" sez she, a looking up from between her hands, and then letting off the fun again as bad as ever. "That saddle! Oh, dear, I shall die. Did you really take take that pair of French corsets for a side-saddle, sir? Oh, dear, I shall die a larfin!"

Didn't I feel streaked though! Only think what an eternal coot I had made of myself, to take a pair of gal's corsets for a side saddle. "Darn the things," sez I, and it was as much as I could du to keep from putting foot to the glass-case, and kicking it into the street. I felt the blood bile up into my face, and when the old maid bust out agin, and I see a hull grist of purty faces come a swarming to a glass door, that they'd hauled back a curtain from, I could have skulked through a knot hole, I felt so dreadful mean. But by-am-by I begun think they had more cause to be ashamed than I had. Who on arth would ever have thought them stiff indecent looking things were made for a delicate gal to wear? I felt dreadfully though, to think that I'd been a talking about a gal's under-riggin, to a woman so long, but after a few minits I begun to think that I needn't fret myself much about that. The woman that stuck them things out in the street for young fellers to look at, needn't go off in a fit of "the dreadful suz," because a chap asks the price of them. "So, who cares!" sez I.

The old maid jumped up, arter she'd larfed herself into a caniption fit and out on it agin—and she run into the back room where the gals were. It warn't more than a minit before there was in there sich a pow-wow and rumpus kicked up,—the gals begun to hop about like parched corn on a hot shovel.

Every body knows that our present Viceroy, when Lord Morpeth, paid a visit to America, and of which he has given an account in some pleasant and useful lectures. However, he has omitted all mention of his meeting with Jonathan Slick, and we shall here insert the account of this interview as given by Jonathan himself, and it is certainly as amusing a sketch of the manner in which Lord Carlisle was often feted as it is possible to conceive. "I assure you," writes the friend who sent us this book from New York, "nothing is at all too highly colored in these letters referring to Lord Carlisle; the people here were as great flunkeys as Jonathan represents them, and Lord Carlisle was quite as sensible and considerate as our Yankee friend describes him."

What Jonathan writes is as follows:—

Wal, when I'd got to my room agin, there was a letter on the mantle shelf, sealed with a great whopping bunch of wax, and stomped down with a round "O," as big as a cent, with a rooster stuck right in the middle of it. I broke the consarn open, and found out it was an invite to Thanksgiving Dinner to Cousin Jason Slick's. Arter writing a hull page of soft sodder, the pussy coot let the cat out of the bag. There's an English lord a putting up here, and he wated me to ask him up to his house to dinner, and said Lord Morpeth would sartinly come if I asked him, because we were both kinder of literary together.

Now, if there's anything on arth that I despise, it's a genuine true born Yankee a hankering arter the big-bug lords that come over here, on'y jest because they've got a long tail to their names. For my part, I haint no idee of demeaning myself in that way anyhow. If a lord behaves himself like folks, he's as good as a Yankee any day, and he ought to be treated jest as well, and I don't think the most genuine republican amongst us ought to be ashamed to ask him to take pot luck or a glass of drink, if he likes it.

As long as they treat us according to gunter, when we go to see them on the t'other side of the water, it is no more than the fair thing if we take turn about, and do the genteel by them a trifle. We ought to feel streaked with all our lands and barns full of grain, if we can't give a foreign chap something to eat and drink without grudging on it, and then agin, without being tickled to death because they don't feel too much pomposity to eat it.

Jason had sent a leetle finefied letter inside of mine, doubled over and twisted up at the corners like an old fashioned cocked hat, and smelling as sweet as a garden pink in full blow. It was directed in leetle finefied writing to His Highness the Right Honourable Lord Morpeth—Howard Member of Parliament, &c., &c. Think sez I, this English chap needn't be consarned that his kite won't sail high among the Yankees for want of a long tail to it, if they all tuck the etceteras onto his name so strong as cousin Jase does.

But I hadn't no idee of being waiter to my pussy cousin, anyhow. If Jase has a mind to send his invite to a lord, done up like a cocked hat, let him be his own nigger, or else send it by the post-office—I wasn't a going to do it for him nor touch it. No lord that is any great shakes will think the better of an honest Republican for acting as if he was scared to ask him to eat dinner, or tickled to death if he didn't feel tu much stuck up to come with plain Yankee asking.

I made up my mind, that if Lord Morpeth took a notion to eat Thanksgiving with Jase, he'd be jest as likely to get his paper cocked hat from the Post Office, as anywhere. So, as I was going through the Park, I took the consarn between my thumb and finger, for fear of siling it, and tucked it through a slit in the post-office, made a purpose for city letters; and off I went, a tickling myself eenamost to death, and thinking how the post-office clarks would giggle and stare, and snuff up their noses to see such a pinted critter directed to a Lord, and smelling so sweet, with a long tail of names curled up in all the corners,—and Lord Morpeth, tu, wouldn't he set our Jase down for a shaller pated coot? I've a kind of a sneaking notion that it's as like as not he would, but that's none of my business. In this country, a feller aint to blame for his relations, that's one comfort.

Wal, next day was Thanksgiving, and down come another letter to say that Lord Morpeth was a coming, and that Jase was a going to send down his span fired new carriage to the Astor House, arter Lord Morpeth and I, afore dinner time; and hegin me to understand that if I could keep the carriage a spell afore the Astor House steps, where folks could get a chance to see the new fixings and horses, there wouldn't be no harm done to nobody,—the darned mean pussy coot! When a feller tries to make me do a mean thing I'm awful ugly, my Yankee grit is up in a jiffy, and I'm jest like a skeery horse that al'rs backs up hill when you want to lead him down.

Afore this I'd been on a cyphering voyage through my purse to see if I couldn't afford to go down to Lynde and Jennings' and bye a new narrow collar'd coat and some other dandy consarns, seeing I was a going to dine with a Lord; but when this letter cum I detarmined to go in the old fix up, jest to let this Lord and my pussy cousin see a genuine Yankee that wasn't ashamed of hisself in a homespun coat and trousers.

Howsomever I gin myself a purty good sudsing, and shaved as close as a Wall street broker; besides I did some extra fixing to my collar and hair, and paired off my finger-nails harnsomely, and scrubbed the yaller from off my teeth with the corner of a brown towel that I found in my saddle-bags; for there aint no reason that I know on, why a true born American shouldn't wash up and keep a clean face and a stiff upper lip, if he does weed his own onions and wear a humspun coat. A chap may live in a land of Liberty and let these lords know it tu, without swellin like a toad to outshine the British, or going slouching about as if we put a tax on soap and water, jest as they do on winder glass.

For my part, I didn't mean to let Lord Morpeth think that we give so much soft soap here in York without keeping enough to wash our own faces on thanksgiving day.

When I was fixed up about tu the right noch, down stairs I went with the eend of my checkered silk neck-hankercher a tucked under my streaked vest, my hair slicked down on both sides, my face a shining like a new pin, and my boots blacked up till they glistened like a gal's eye.

I tucked up my yaller silk hankercher clear into my coat pocket, for I didn't feel like showing all out to once, and I put my new mit-tens on sort a careless, and streaked the blue and red fringe up as I went down the Astor House steps through a double row of dandies that had swarmed out of the stun hall above to see my pussey cousin's carriage and horses that stood a glistening jest afore the house.

There the carriage stood right in Broadway, about the dashingest consarn that ever I sot eyes on. The wheels were a good ways apart and black as a minister's coat, and a great harnsome box swung over em, shut up tight, and a glistening in the sun till it a'most blinded a feller's eye-sight to look on it. There was a door on each side as big as them in the pulpit of our meeting house, with a whopping square of glass in the top and bottom all figgered off with gold, and then crouchonts, and lions, and roosters all pictered out in gold tu, and looking as nat'ral as life, for all they were so yaller and jammed down in a heap till it seemed as if the lions would roar right out, and the rooster give a coo-co-doo-dle-do if any body went tu tuch them.

Behind the hull consarn, was a great flat wide stair, with two pussy fellers a standing on it,—each on 'em holding to a yaller to-sel fixed tight to the coach and dressed out like folks in the theatre, with great high boots, and topped off with a wide rim of white, wide white cuffs to their coats, and white ribbons and beaus twisted round their hats.

Bight in front was a seat with a great square cushion on it, and all hung off with the finest kind of boughten cloth and piles of heavy yaller fringe, with the golden lions, and crouchants, and roosters pictered out and a glistening among the folds, till it a'most outshined the sun—and that was purtey bright for November.

A tall feller dressed out like the chaps behind, sot on this heap of gimcracks with a great long whip stuck up by his elbow, and a hold-ing in two tremendous harnsome black horses that stood hitched to the carriage, under a hull net of black shiney leather, golden buckles, and deers' heads cut out in chunks of gold, and sot on to the blinder and saddle-trees, and every place an inch square that they could be poked in.

If there is a critter on arth that I take tu, it's a good horse, and I couldn't help but be proud of them smashing arnimals as they shook their heads up so sarsy, as if the sun hadnt no business in their great eyes that had fire enough in 'em without its help, and pawed on the ground with their fore-feet—the mettlesome varmint!—like a couple of harnsome women, chuck full of music and crazy to dance it off.

When the chaps saw me a coming down the Astor House steps, one of 'em jumped down and opened the door and let out a hull grist of steps down to the ground, all kivered over with the brightest kind of carpet, till it looked as if somebody had been a flinging hull baskets full of posies all over 'em for me to stomp down with my shiney boots if I wanted tu.

Jest as I was a thinking whether it was best for Lord Morpeth to come before I got in myself—for I didn't want to du nothing that wasn't according to gunter, if he was a lord—a feller come down the Astor House steps dressed off to the nines, with a harnsome cloak slung across his shoulder, and one side of his hat tipped up jest enough to show a hull swad of curly hair a frizzling round his ears.

He had a leetle dab of hair a curling jest under his nose, and another leetle peaked consarn up in a pint from his chin.

When this chap come down the steps, the other varmint that stood behind the carriage in his white topped stompers give a dive to the arth, and stood a one side the door which t'other one held open. Think sez I, this is Lord Morpeth as sure as a gun; so I haul'd back my foot from the fust step, for I was jest a going to get in, and I stepped back as the chap come up, and arter making him a half bow—for I never give off the extra touches in a bow only to the harnsome gals—sez I,

“Walk in, Lord Morpeth, and I'll foller arter.”

The feller looked at me sort of supercilious, and I could see the dab of hair on his lip curl the leastest mite scornful as if he smelt something that didn't agree with him. He didn't make a bow, but stepped back as if he didn't just know what to du.

I give my mitten a short flourish towards my hat, and arter stepping back agin, sez I—“Arter you is manners for me. Make yourself to hum, Lord Morpeth.”

The chap looked at me agin, and then he went close to the feller that held the door, and said that Lord Morpeth couldn't go jest yit, but that we'd better go on and he'd come by-an-by; and with that he went up the steps agin without as much as saying, git out, to me.

Gawrie, but wasn't I wrothy to see that crowd of York dandies see me alighted so by a lord. There they stood a puckering up their faces like monkeys in a show, and there I stood feeling as mean as the meanest among 'em; but arter a minit my dander ris right up.

“Darn the critter,” sez I, a'most out loud, and a pulling my mitten up so wrothy that a whole swad of frieze gin away in my hand. "Does the stuck up varmint feel above riding with an honest Yankee, because he haint got no title? I'll be licked if a lord ever gets a speck of good manners from me again, consarn the hull biling on 'em."

With that I gin an allfired jump, and settled down in the carriage, as savage as a young arthquake, and sot down on one of the harnsome cushions kivered over with silks and figgered off with blue and white roses, that kivered the two seats and sort of sprangled up over the sides and ruff of the carriage. A narrow finessed border squirmed all around the cushions, around the doors, and into all the corners, and the hull consarn made a chap feel as if he was shut up in a band-box, lined with silk and with a chunk of the sky, white clouds and all, shut over him for a lid.

I was so allfired wrothy, that, without thinking on it, I histed my boots agin one of the cushions, jest as it's nat'ral tu, when a feller's so mad he can't help it, and left a purty considerable smooch of blacking amongst the blue and white posies, that sot them off ruther more than cousin Jase would like, I calculate.

Them carriages do cut dirt so soft and easy like a streak of greased lightning, that there is no knowing how fast a feller gets along. It didn't seem more than a half a jiffy when we drew up co-wallop right afore Jase's house. Down got the two varmints in white topped stompers, open went the door, and out I jumped.

I didn't have to ring at the silver knob, but the door swung open of itself, or seemed tu, and in I poked, as independent as a clam in high water, but not afore I'd sketched a squint at that shaller little Jemima, a peaking out from behind the winder curtains to see who was coming with me.

A chap took my hat and things in the entry-way, and asked me what my name was, sort of low, as if it was something I ought to be ashamed of; and the minit I told him, he went to the door of the keeping-room and bawled out,

"Mr. Jonathan Slick."

I went in and there sot our Jase, in a great armed chair, as red and pussy as a turkey-gobbler, jest afore Christmas. He got up and come for'ard, but looked nation wamblecropped when he see that there wasn't nobody with me. That wife of his'n cum up with her fat hands stuck out, and asked how I was, and why Lord Morpeth didn't cum, and Jemima, she stood a giggling worse than ever, and a tossing them yaller curls of her'n about on her shoulders and consined me off to kill.

I told Jase how Lord Morpeth had sarved me, but he didn't seem to mind that, arter he found out that he was a coming by-am-by, so we sot down. I took a sort of a survey of the premises. Now if there is anything that makes me mad, it's to see a chap a selling off his harnsome things when they git a little siled or out of fashion. I couldn't no more sell a cheer or a table than that any of my friends had eat off from, or sot on, than I would strike my granny. Jest think how you'd feel to see grand par Slick's armed chair sold at Vandue, or the chest o' drawers that marm kept her "leetle things" in when I was a baby bought in by the neighbours. It makes me feel wamblecropped only jest to think of it, and yet there wasn't a single thing in the two great rooms that I went into at Cousin Jase's, that had a place where it was the last time I was there. Everything tooked spick-span new, and I haint no doubt that the hull house had been transmogrified and titivated up jest cause a Lord was coming to eat dinner there. The carpets were 'most all red, with a vine of pink and yaller a running crinkle-crackle all over 'em as if somebody had been a scattering a hat full of butter cups and meadow pinks all over it, the whole consarn giving under your feet like a flat meadow lot thick with a fall arter growth.

Great smashing looking glasses were set into the wall from top to bottom between the winders, and a hull dry-goods store of red silk curtains sot off with yaller bordering, fell in great heavy winrows from over a couple of long spikes, feathered off at the eend, and a glistening with gold, kivered both eends of the room all but the looking-glasses and winders. A whopping great picter of Jase a setting in his easy chair, and reading a book, kivered with velvet and gold, was hung over one mantletree shelf, and over t'other sot his wife, all feathers and flowers, silks and satins, with her red pussy face a shining among the whole, and all pen'd up in a gold frame, as wide as a slab, and a glist'ning like all natur.

Cousin Jase had gone into the fine arts to kill, arter he got hopes of a Lord. There was Jemima's shaller head cut out in marble, a kind of half swarry, with stun curls a hanging like iccices down her back, and a stun post to stand on, a rolling up its eyes to a corner of the room; and there were two funny sort of women, with wings that looked as if they'd been made of gold at fust, and then touched off with a thin coat of blacking, that made a sort of amalgamation critters, black and gold, stood each side of the looking glasses, a holding back the silk curtains that would have fell ca-swash over the whole eend of the room if it hadn't been for them; then out on the carpet was tables made out of black shiny stuff, and the whole round tops kivered over with picters that seemed as if they were polished down clear into the black wood, and all around was benches and footstools of the same black wood, sprigged off with gold, and cushioned off with red silk, besides the settees that had high backs and high arms at one eend, but curlecued down at the back, tapered off to a square bench on t'other, and sot out like the stools with thick red cushions.

Right over the pictered tables was a sort of a golden tree, chained to the ruff, and kivered over and over with chunks of glass that shone like tears in a gal's eyes, when she gits the grit up.

Besides all these, was tu great round silk cushions, as thick as mother's cheese tub, a sitting right squat on the carpet, and tassled off to kill, with a mess of other things that I haint a chance to look at afore the door was pushed open by the belp that stood in the hall; and there stood a tall man, with a blue coat on, and gilt buttons, each on 'em pictered off like our ten cent pieces, on'y instead of the Eagle, there was a Lion, and some kind of a one-horned animal, a pawing up hill arter of a cap with pints to it.

Afore I saw these pictered buttons, I kinder thought the chap must be Lord Morpeth himself, for he come in sort of softly, and yit independent, like a feller that felt himself to hum any where, but yit didn't want to walk over other folka, as them big bug foreigners al'ra du ; but on a second peak I see that it wasn't the chap that I had seen at the Astor House, and beside that he was shaved clean and hadn't a speck of hair, only on his head and eye-brows, and that was a little mite gray ; so, think sez I to myself, that other chap was the Lord, and this is his waiter, cum to tell Jase that the big bug has gin up cumin. For no Lord that can git dye stuff or buy a wig, would ever come a visiting with gray hairs in his head. You wouldn't ketch one of our York tippies at that, let alone a ginuine Lord.

I never saw Jase so wrothy as he was when he ketched sight of the feller, for he got a peak at the button the fust thing, and sez he,—

“By gracious! if his lordship haint sent word to say he can't come.”

With that he went to the door, and sez he to the man, sez he—

“Wal, Sir, did, you bring a note for me, or what?”

And then he strutted right in the door-way, as pussy and pompous as a prize pig jest afore killing time, und there stood the tall chap, jest afore him, a looking right into his red face, with a pair of eyes as black and keen as a weazle's, yit sort of easy and good natured, as if he couldn't think what the matter was. He took off his hat sort of easy, and kinder bent his head a leetle, and sez he,—

“Is it Mr. Slick?”

He spoke so soft and humble that it seemed to mollify Jase ; he stepped for'ard and waved his hand about as big as cuffy, and sez he, as condescending as could be, sez he,—

“Put on your hat, my good fellow, I've been a poor man myself. What word did his Lordship send? don't be afeard to speak!”

The chap looked at Jase, and I could see his mouth pucker up the leastest mite in the world, and his eyes begun to twinkle as if he'd choked back a smile from his lips that was determined to break through some where. He bowed his head a little, and then he handed over a piece of square pasteboard jest like that Miss Elsealer gave to me.

Didn't my pussy cousin look as if he'd fell through a thin place in the ice! He wilted right down, and looked as sneaking as a turkey gobbler ketch'd out in a rainy storm ; but when he see that Lord Morpeth didn't seem to know that he mistook him for a waiter, he walked into the room a spreading his hands and a sending out a storm of excuses, and welcomes, and friendships, like a junk bottle of cider letting off steam.

Lord Morpeth, he walked along into the room jest as if he'd been to hum, and then Jase he spread himself agin, and made him acquainted with his wife.

Lord Morpeth made a little slow bow, and Mrs. Jase Slick she gin her turban a toss, spread out the skirts of her velvet frock that was jest the color of a wild cherry, and then, after sticking out her fat foot, she began to fold up her jints, till she threatened to settle down on the carpet all in a heap, before she'd a let out all her kinks agin. Jemima she come up and begun to flourish out her foot, and show her curls, and her teeth, and twitter about, while Lord Morpeth was a bowing to her. I swow, it made me grit my teeth to see what ternal coots the whole consarn were a making of themselves! Then cum my turn. I stood a leaning agin the mantle-shelf, detarmined to show this Lord that all the Slicks on arth warn't darned eternal chuckleheads if some of them was. I'd a seen him in Guinea and further yet, afore he'd a got one speck of a bow more than he give me.

Well, Lord Morpeth, he bowed his head rather sparing of his neck, and I stood right straight up, and gin him as good as he sent, and no more on it, by hokey: yet there was something about this critter that took my notion amazingly; he didn't seem stuck up a bit, nor yet as if he wanted to poke fun at us, but sot down on one of the curleued settees, and begun to talk about the weather, and things in general, jest like our folks. Miss Slick, she sot down by him, and purty soon let him into the state of things here in York. She went into a fit of the dreadful sus, to think Lord Morpeth didn't ride up in the carriage—it was a dreadful thing to walk in the streets among the common people—her daughter Jemima had once brushed the skirt of her tunic agin a mechanic, as she went down Broadway, and they felt it their bounden duty to keep her from walking ever since,—Jemima was so delicate, so very literary, so—here Jemima, who sot on a bench close by the settee, turned up them eyes of her'n and gin a sigh that made the pucker come to Lord Morpeth's mouth agin, and when Miss Slick got up and handed over some varses that she said Jemima had writ the minit she heard that Lord Morpeth had come to this country, the tickle burst into his eyes, and he went to the winder with the paper in his hand, jest as if he wanted to read it over agin. Miss Slick she stretched up and looked at Jase, and Jemima, and me, and nodded her head, as much as to say—

“That's clenched the business. If Lord Morpeth don't take a shine to my darter arter reading that, I want to know, that's all!”

Jase he twirled his great gold watch key, and peaked at Lord Morpeth from under his eye-brows, and Jemima she struck her head a one side and tried to look as if she couldn't help it, till Lord Morpeth he come back agin from the winder, a looking as meek as a gray cat with a dab of cream on her whiskers, jest as if he hadn't been tickling himself to death behind the curtains there; and I, consarn me, as if I didn't feel as mean as a frozen potater, to think my name was Slick.

Miss Slick she spread herself out on the settee agin beside Lord Morpeth, and give him another dose of soft sodder, till I raly felt sorry for the poor critter. She held up her two chunked hands, and rolled up her eyes like all natur, when he told her which side of Broadway he come up; but Lord Morpeth said the west side was the most crowded, and so he took t'other.

"On'y jest to to think, Jemima," sez Miss Slick, "Lord Morpeth come up on the east side of Broadway, dear me!"

Jemima she lifted up her head, and looked a whole biling of lasses candy at Lord Morpeth, and said she shouldn't wonder if it would be all the fashion to walk that side after that.

Lord Morpeth bowed agin, and looked as meek as new milk, and kinder acted as if he'd jest as lives talk about something else, but my pussy cousin stuck to him like a dog to a briar.

"Now, my Lord," sez she, a laying her hand on to his'n, rings and all, "now, arter reading my darter's poetry, jest give me your opinion; we shouldn't think of ever letting her print anything, on'y we've heard that it's getting to be the fashion for English Lords and ladies to be sort of literary, and Jemima is so full of poetry and writes so sweet and soft—don't you think so, my Lord?"

"Very soft," says Lord Morpeth, as sober as a deacon, but yet giving a sort of a sly squint at Jemima, where she sot a puckering up her mouth and half shutting her eyes, and a shaking for'ard her yaller curls, till they eenamost touched her lap, and a trying to look like a love-sick robin on an apple-tree limb.

"Oh, you can't form no idee, you can't, indeed," sez Miss Slick, "without you hear Jemima read them herself, but she's so modest, so sensitive—but mebbey she'll be persuaded by your lordship."

Lord Morpeth give another squint at the stuck up little varmint, and sed, "he was afeard to urge the young lady agin her feelings."

"Oh, but she'll do it to oblige you, I'm sartin she will," sez Miss Slick agin; "and here's our literary cousin, he will persuade her, I am sure;" and with that she cum across the room and put her hand on my coat sleeve, and sez she, "Now do, cousin."

"Oh, you go to grass," sez I; "If Jemima there is a mind to make a coot of herself, she can do it without my boosting her along." Lord Morpeth kinder give a start, and looked at me like all natur, but yet he didn't look mad.

"Why, cousin Slick!" sez my pussey she cousin, a dropping her hand as if it had gripped a hot potatoe.

"Oh dear!" sez Jemima.

Jase he let his watch-key drop, and turned as red as a tomato, "What on arth do you mean by that, Mr. Jonathan Slick?" sez he.

"Wal, I reckon I mean just what I say," sez I, a dropping my hands into my trousers pockets; and a crossing one boot over t'other as I leaned sort of slantindicular, with my shoulder agin the mantle-tree. "If there's anything on arth that makes a man sick of all the feminine gender, its the eternal hankering which some on 'em get to to show off and trot themselves out afore the men folks, jest to show that their stockings have been in a dye-tub, and that what they are lacking in brains, is made up by impudence. I wouldn't marry a gal that could get up afore a stranger, before a hull room full on 'em and shake her curls about, roll up her eyes like a pious hen, and squinch her face over a lot of poetry, whether it's her's or anybody else's. I swow, I wouldn't marry her if her heart was a solid lump of gold, and every hair of her head strung with diamonds. That's my opinion, and Cousin Jemima is welcome to it such as it is."

I wish you could a seen Jase and his wimmen folks when I burst out with that speech. Didn't they turn red and white in streaks? I ruther guess so! And Lord Morpeth! I never seed a feller's face brighten up as his did. Jase put his arm through mine, and asked me to slip into the hall a minit.

"Look a here, cousin, this is ruther too bad," sez Jase, eenamost crying; "you ought to make an apology to his lordship for speaking so afore him—what'll he think of American manners?"

"What'll he think," sez I, "darn me if I care what he thinks; if he's a genuine nobleman—one that's got good English common sense, he wont think the better of us for trying to make believe we're a notch above what we raly be, and he'll like my human natur better than your soft sodder by a jug full. If he expects the hull nation of America to pucker and twist itself out of all nat'ral shape jest to gibe with his notions, he ought to be disappointed and that's the long and the short of it; and if he believes that we want to see our wimmen folks to be spitting out poetry and varses afore strangers, or that the genuine wimmen of America want to du sich things, he better stay to hum and read Mrs. Trollope's books. Now jest hold your gab, Jase," sez I, as he was a going to speak again, "I'm in the right on't—if we want to give these English Lords a true idea of us, act out human natur, and give me a warm, honest welcome, but less soft soap."

As I'd spoke out, jest so, the bell rung, and a hull grist of big bugs got out of some carriages at the door and come in. There was three or four harnsome wimmen and gals dressed off in silks and satins, with the dresses all fringed off round the bottom and a hugging tight up to them white necks as close as the skin to an eel, and a showing off the wide shoulders and leetle tapering waists about the best of any dresses I ever sot eyes on. The men folks had on span white gloves, and looked as if they'd jest come out of a band-box. While Jase was a blustering about from one to t'other, I jest cut stick for the other room, detarmined not to have any more jaw with the critter if I could help it. Miss Slick and Jemima, looked sour enough to turn new milk; but Lord Morpeth he cum right up to me and begun to talk as if I'd been his twin brother. He asked me about every thing on arth, and more too; all about the way we raise onions and garden sarce, how much hay our Weathersfield meadows give to an acre, and all about our district schools, meeting houses, and the old blue laws of Connecticut. When I told him that a man was fined five dollars for bussing his wife on the sabberday arter he'd been away to sea four years, Lord Morpeth he larfed right out as nat'ral as could be. Then I took turn about and asked him a few pozers about Old England, and he answered right up like a man that understood things, for all he was a Lord. I raly took a shine to the critter, though I'd made up my mind agin it, tooth and nail, and while he was a talking I took a good squint at his head and face.

He aint so over harnsome, not quite so good looking as a sartin chap I could tell you on if I wasn't so mealy-mouthed, but then he's got an allfired big head, high up over the ears, and one that looks chuck full of brains as an egg is full of meat. His eyes aint great black starers like some folk's, but as bright as diamonds, and as sharp as a hull paper of cambrick needles, and they know how to look right straight through a feller without flinching the first glance.

Purty soon, the gals and them chaps I'd seen in the hall cum a pouring in, and then there was no more talk with Lord Morpeth; he had to be led around like a race-horse by Miss Slick and Jemima, and I cum in for my share of the fun, for arter he and I got so thick together, they begun to think what I'd said was according to gunter, and sot it all down for eccentricity of genius instead of gинуine common sense; howsomever, I did not care so long as all was ship shape agin with 'em, for I hate to get a woman a pouting with me, for if I'm ever so right it makes me feel kinder ugly.

THE DINNER SCENE.

We hadn't but just got settled down when the great wide looking-glass that I've told you of, seemed to slide back of the curtains to the lower end of the room, and by gawly! there was another room further on, with a table sot in it all kivered over with silver plates, and soup dishes, and Chiny ware, with one of them trees of gold and glass all lighted up, and swung to the wall, a glittering, and flashing, and pouring down the shine over the heap of silver things, till it made a feller ketch his breath on'y jest to peak in.

Lord Morpeth he gin his arm to my pussy she cousin—Jase gin his to a harnsome gal that stood close to him, and I crooked my elbow up to Jemima, for I kinder wanted to make up for what I'd sed about her reading—poor critter! she aint to blame if she is a little shaller. The rest on 'em followed on two and two, and arter a little we all sot down round the table with six great strapping fellers, with blue and white regimentals on, and gloves on all their twelve hands, a standing up behind our chairs. I can't give you no idea of what we had to eat, for they called every thing by some darn'd jaw-breaker of a name, and kept a carrying things on and off and giving a feller clean plates all of solid silver, till it a'most made me dizzy with seeing them a flashing about so in the critters' hands. They had all sorts of mince meat with hard names tucked to it, and fish kivered with gravy, and butter, and every thing else, and sich a darn'd heap of things that I can't begin to tell you all. I tried to take a bite of everything, but it wasn't of no use—I was purty well filled up afore the puddings, and pies, and custards cum on, and arter they were carried off I thought we'd all made a purty good Thanksgiving dinner, considering it wasn't tu hum, and I can't tell when I've felt so big and pussy; but jest as I was thinking we'd got about through, the fellers went to work and swept the hull table clean as could be, and by-am-by on they cum agin with silver baskets full of grapes, and oranges, and prunes, with a grist of fust rate apples, and hull bunches of raisins that made a feller feel wrothy because he'd eat enough, they looked so tempting a hanging over the sides of them silver baskets, and a looking so meller in the light that cum a shining down from the consarn overhead.

When the wimmen folks had jest eat a few grapes, and mebbly a chunk of orange or so, Miss Slick she got up and off they went into t'other room, but yet a looking back sort of longing, jest as Eve did when the angels made her quit the garden of Eden, poor critter!

The minit the wimmen folks had made themselves scarce the servants begun to cut about like all possessed, and a hull regiment of decanters and cider bottles with sheet-lead caps to 'em, marched onto the table, and arter them cum another regiment of glasses, some of 'em round and bulky with short stems and kinder dark green, some white as ice, and then agin some that was short and slender, out on in squares, and red as a gal's lip, besides the long necked cider glasses that stood poking up among the rest, like a Down East general, and his officers ready to lead on the red and green militia agin the hull squad of bottles and decanters, till one side gin up beat. The help gin the first shot, for each on 'em took a bottle, and pop, pop, pop, went the corks—then the red, and green, and white glasses marched up, and cum off chuck full and a brimming over with plunder. As for me, I sent up a long necked feller, and took a swig at the cider, and Lord Morpeth he went deep into the green glasses, but they put me in mind of an old maid's goggles, and I couldn't take a notion to 'em till arter I'd drunk two hull glasses of the cider, and then I didn't seem to care what I drank out on. By-am-by some one called out and wanted a toast. I never heard of topping off a Thanksgiving dinner with toast afore, but it made me think of hum, and so I thought I'd have one tu.

"Look a here," sez I to the chap that stood back of my chair, "you may make me a toast tu, but none of your dry stuff now, but make it as marm used to, you remember Jase," sez I, "half a pint of hot milk with a chunk of butter about as big as a piece of chalk melted in, and then the hull soaked up with slices of toasted bread—hum made is best—one slice laid on top of t'other. Now you git out, and make some right off," sez I to the chap, sez I.

"Look a here, Jonoe, what are you about?" sez Jase, a poking his elbow sort of sly into my ribs. "It aint that we mean, we're a going to drink a toast."

"Wal," sez I, "I haint no arthly objection, but if the feller makes it according to rule it'll be rather tough to swaller without some chawing."

"I tell you," sez Jase agin, "we are a going to drink a toast to Lord Morpeth in wine."

"Wal," sez I agin, "I haint no objection, if Lord Morpeth likes toast and wine, it's his idee of what's good, and I can't help it; but as for me, hand over a bowl of genuine toast and cider with the bread crumbled in, Weathersfield fashion, rather hot, and sweetened well with lasses, that's my notion. Lord a massey, how marm does mix them critters up, it's enough to make a feller's nose tingle to think on it, aint it, cousin Jase?"

It warn't of no use a speaking to him, there he stood a strutting over back with a glass in his hand and a singing out, "Our noble guest, Lord Morpeth," like all possessed. Every critter at the table, excepting Lord Morpeth and I, jumped up with glasses in our hands, and begun to drink like a patch of seed onions after a six weeks'

dry spell ; but Lord Morpeth and I sot still and looked as if we didn't know what possessed the critters ; but the minit they sot down up he jumped like a house a fire, and the way he cracked jokes and said smart things, made the fire fly from every body's eyes round the table. I swanny, if he didn't take me a'most off the handle with his consarned sweet voice and harnsome manners. It raly was eenamost as good as a play, to hear him reel out the comamon sense and soft sodder about this land of liberty and old England. When he sot down, it was as much as I could du to keep from going right up and giving him a hug, if he was a lord. Arter this we mixed in the talk altogether, like lemon, and sugar, and brandy in a punch bowl, as sociable as so many chickens in a coop, till by-am-by, Jase he begun to swell up and talk to Lord Morpeth about the Slicks, and the crouchants, and lions, that belonged to the family coat of arms as he called it ; he gin us all to understand that the Slicks warn't a family to be sneezed at by any of the English Lords, and gin out some purty broad hints about a barron-night, and a lord, that gin a start to the name ever so long back in England ; then the consarned shote branched out into a sarmon about ancient birth, and pure blood, a running from one generation to another, without being siled by anything low since the Slicks cum to this country, jest arter the Pilgrims, and a hull lot of the darndest stuff that ever a transmogrified hand-cartman thought on. I'd topped off my cider with two or three glasses of hock, the feller called it, and it made me feel dreadful smart, and I felt jest like tackling Jase in his own camp.

"Look a here, cousin Jase," sez I, "what on arth do you want to make out that we Slicks are anything but jest what we be, for aint it a darned sight more to our credit, Yankees as we are, and Republicans as we ought to be, to own it at once, that we had to hoe our own row up, and found it a purty tough one ? Now you know well enough, for all your crouchongs, and lions, and roosters,—that you've picked up, lord-a-massey knows where—that you begun life, or anyhow begun to save up chink, fust by a horse cart on Peck Slip, and that wife of your'n went out a nussing other folk's children till arter you married her, and that aint no disgrace to her nor you neither, so long as you don't try to make out that you're something more than you raly be. It is too bad you're trying to make out that you're an English big bug, when you can prove yourself as good a nobleman as ever lived, by going back to our grand-par, the brave old shoemaker, that swung his lap-stone over his shoulder when the Revolution broke out, and jined the patriots when their struggle was dark as the grave. The old man never gave way once, but fought like a lion when fighting was to be done. He clung to his companions in good and bad luck, and though he fought, and marched, and suffered with the toughest of 'em, never once gin out or got discouraged, but arter a long day's march would unsling his lap-stone, take out his rusty tools, and hammer and stitch away half the night long, to make up shoes for his tired and sore footed feller soldiers, whenever he could find a scrap of sole leather or a piece of cow skin to make up !"

I was a going on, but Lord Morpeth he got up, and sez he, "Let us drink to the memory of Mr. Slick's ancestor, the 'brave shoemaker.'

Jase looked sort of ugly about what I'd said—but I couldn't help that, and when Lord Morpeth jined in, the hull biling on us got up, and another squad of wine glasses was put into action. When the rest had sot down, I felt as if I couldn't break off so, but I thought it wouldn't do no harm to give 'em a short specimen of Weathers-fied chin music, seeing as there was a lord to hear me.

"Now," sez I, "it's of no use denying that we Yankees do think a good deal of noble birth and pure blood, and all of them ere things that the English have boosted up their throne with so many hundred years: for my part, I du feel a kind of love and reverence for a family of any kind, whose blood has run pure from one generation to another, through brave men and good women, till it beats full of warm ginerous human natur in the heart of a true nobleman, whether he has a title or not. It gives a man something to be proud of, something to guard and keep himself good and honorable for. A man must be mean as pusley, and meaner yet, who could do a small action while he knew that his blood had been kept, pure as spring water, by a hull line of good men, all a sleeping in their graves."

"But, arter all," sez I, "what is the nobility of old England more than that which we Yankees have a right to?"

"Was William the Conqueror, that they brag so much about, any thing to be compared to our Washington? Was his conquest of Old England, half so great, or so tough a job as the tussle we had to get New England into our own native land? Now, the whole truth is, blood is like wine, the older it is, the stronger and clearer it grows. If it warn't for that, we Yankees, that had forefathers in the Revolutionary war, have as good a right to brag about our pure blood, as the greatest and oldest line of proud England." Here I stopped jest long enough to make a bow to Lord Morpeth, and on I went agin. "I say," sez I, a stretching out my arm, "there aint a true born American on arth, if he owns the truth, that haint English grit and pride enough about him to feel a kind of respect for an English nobleman, if he behaves himself like folks: but if he don't," sez I, "we've got a right to despise him more than we do one another when we act mean; for he not disgraces hisself but all the forefathers that he ought to be proud on, and a man that can do that must be mean as git out and meaner tu, a darned sight. Now," sez I, a looking at Lord Morpeth, "we Yankees and the English are purty much alike, for all. If they've got their lords, and dukes, and princes, haint we no military captins, and generals, and deacons, and squires.—rather small potatoes compared to the English, but yet it shows a sort of native notion we've got arter sich things, and don't du no sort of harm one way or t'other. Now," sez I, "in a few hundred years from this, we Americans, shall have a sort of republican nobility of our own. I aint sartin about the titles, but by-am-by, when the 'tea party,' and the battle of Bunker Hill lies clear back in our history, as William the Conqueror's does among the British, Cousin Jase there wouldn't have to make up a story about his British ancestors; for the pure blood of this ere country will be that which goes right back to the Revolutionary war. All Yankee noblemen will have to sarch for their titles on the pension list of this ere very generation; and the old man that now draws his twenty dollars a month, will be the founder of a line, jest as noble as any that ever sprung up in the heart of old England! That's my genuine opinion. Now," sez I, "if we Slicks wanted to make out that we are any great shakes, it aint no very hard job to du it. It aint by no means sartin that we, any on us, ever had any forefathers afore the old Shoemaker, that we've been jest a telling on; but he was a hull team and horse to boot. When the ammunition gin out at Bunker Hill, he flung away his gun, and went to storming a hull regiment, tooth and nail, on his own hook, till in the eend he was shot down dead with a piece of the old lap stun in his hand, that he gripped like an Injun arter his teeth was sot, and his fingers stiff and stun cold. Old England, I must own, has got a grist of noble families and great men, that are an honor and eternal glory to it, but the blood that biled up in that old man's heart, was as red, as brave, yes, and as noble tu, as ever poured itself out on the sile of old England, in the time of William, or any other Conqueror; and if I ever set up for a big bug, and put picters on my carriage door, I kinker think that I shant be much ashamed to have Jonathan Slick's coat of arms, a 'hand gripped hard on a lap-stun;' for consarn me, if we, any on us, ever get to be much, it will be through the old Shoemaker, and I aint ashamed to own it."

With that I took another swig at the hock, and was a going on agin, but all tu once my head began to whirl round like a top. The table began to spread itself into half a dozen, and it seemed as if the glass consara over head had got a hull family of leetle ones around it, dancing jigs and pouring out the shine all over the room—and then the wine bottles, and the decanters, and the grapes, and apples, and raisins, seemed to get onsteady, and more on 'em kept as tarting up. Then the waiters in regimentals grew taller and taller, and I'm consarned if Lord Morpeth hadn't half a dozen chaps a looking like so many twin brothers a dodging up and down all around him, awful onsteady though, for Lords. Then, arter all, the floor begun to rise and pitch up and down till I was obliged to give up, and so I sot down, and held onto my chair with both hands, and called out, 'Whoa' like a house afire, for it seemed as if everything was a getting upsot; and between you and I and the post, Par, my givine opinion is, that all the chaps in the room had got about half sew over, except me. I was as steddy as a judge, and sot up perpendicular and independent, jest as a true born Republican ought tu, determined to set that English Lord and the rest on 'em a good example. It wasn't no wonder, though, that they got a leetle how-come-you-ee, for they all drank wine, but I only took that sparkling white cider and hock, for I was determined not to make a shote of myself. Yet it made me feel so bad to see how they went on, that I got a'most sick thinking about it.

Arter a while we all went back into the keeping-room, and there the wimmen folks sot on them red benches, all in pimlico order, drinking coffee out of some leetle finessed cups, but I'm affeared they didn't set up so straight as young ladies ought tu in company—their heads did seem to set rather unsartin on their shoulders every time I looked at 'em.

I drunk off a cup of coffee jest to oblige Jase, and then I begun to be kinder sociable with a young gal that sot by Jemima, while Jase took Lord Morpeth round to look at his marble head, and the two whopping picters of himself and wife.

Arter he had gone the rounds—as we Editors say of a prime article—Lord Morpeth made his bow and went out, I begun to feel kinder as if I'd like to take a snooze, and so I jest gin one smashing bow at the door for all, and arter getting my hat, I follered Lord Morpeth out. It was tarnal cold, and I begun to chirk up a leetle when I see that Jase's carriage stood there. Lord Morpeth stepped back when he see me close to him, and moved his hand as much as to say—Git in; but I stepped back, and sez I, “I guess I've been taught better manners than to help myself fust,”—so with that he got in, and I arter.

We had a good deal of talk in the carriage; and when we both got out, Lord Morpeth shook hands with me as if I'd been his twin brother, and asked me to come and see him to his room, for he wanted to talk with me about picters and the fine arts, and things in general.

I gin his hand an all-fired grip, and sez I, “Lord Morpeth, you can depend on this chap, for he'll tell you the truth and no soft sodder. I didn't take much of a notion to you at fust, for I aint a chap to run arter you because you're a lord, but I like you in spite of that, for you're a darned good hearted, smart critter, and lord or no lord, that's enough.”

We here close, for the present quarter, our extracts from this most amusing, and frequently instructive, book. We have, in this paper, extracted chiefly from the lighter chapters, but in our next number we shall, perhaps, return to another phase of its contents.

ART. II.—LOVE AND POLITICS.

Un Homme Sérieux. Par Charles de Bernard. Paris : 1843.

It may not seem our wish to drift on comfortably with the current of our times, when we select a work published so far back as 1843, and (we are sorry for the circumstance) by a writer whose short and spirited career is at an end ; but as our business is with foreign literature, we are happily exempt from the necessity of noticing every worthless and ephemeral work of fiction sent for approval by influential publishers.

The nice-looking volumes in their flowered cloth dress, with their white thick leaves, clear type, and lines far apart, are laid on the table of the unfortunate reviewer, who, after a few desperate attempts at resolution, cuts some sheets about the middle of the second volume and the end of the third. He finds what he expected ; a tissue of crude thoughts or common place ideas, unsuccessful incursions into the domains of invention or fancy, a succession of events either of improbable occurrence or loosely strung together, the whole evidencing either slipshod negligence or a barren imagination. Still something must be done to disencumber the publisher's shelves of the heavy mass, or gratify the misguided author who, by relationship, acquaintance, or political sympathy, is furnished with some hold on the much straitened critic.

So, desperately wetting his pen, he resolves to do the deed, and boldly commences at the inscriptions engraved by Hermes on those Antediluvian pillars which, long after the deluge, were discovered in caverns somewhere or other. He then sighs for a journal of a day kept by an Egyptian lady of the reign of Psammeticus the Eightieth, or the prototype of Ennui written by some forgotten Maria Edgeworth, the ornament of the court of Pericles. He recollects in time, however, the unintellectual character and occupation of the Greek ladies of that reign, and gives it as his own private opinion that no novels of ordinary life were composed either at Athens or Sparta. Then, paying a compliment to Bekker for his clever and research-shewing sketches of Gallus and Charicles, he laments that in common with most fictions on classic subjects, they resemble the truthful and natural ones of our days, as a lay figure does the human being whose muscles and bones are informed by life, and invested with an outward envelope of youth and beauty. He then descants on the fortunate preervation of the comedies of Aristophanes, and Terence, and Plautus, and the dialogues and fictions of Lucian, seeing that we get a better insight into the interior life of the Greeks and Romans by their means than from the old serious chronicles which have come down to us. Having advanced so far in his subject, he naturally asks, wherefore the need of such ceaseless showers of vapid trash covering the surface of society in the shape of loose leaves, as snow flakes on a calm winter's day cover the dry hard street and field.

After fixing his hearers by this query, he shortly relieves them by alluding to the restless craving of the soul for excitement, when no real engrossing cares or troubles are present. He then learnedly disserts on the cruel sports of the circus giving temporary relief to the tired and unhappy Roman senators and ladies; touches lightly on the means resorted to by Julia and Messalina to escape from the dreadful sway of ennuï, attributes the cruelties of Nero and Tiberius to the same cause, and creates an agreeable variety in the page by the introduction, in Bourgeois type, of Dr. Watts, the Bee, Mischief, and the Devil.

Now, bidding adieu to the dissolute old Heathens, with a passing glance at The Ethiopian Romance of Heliodorus, and the fictions of Achilles Tatius, and Longus, and a reproof of the extravagance of the first and want of decency of the others, he glides easily into the old feudal castle, and shews the bard with harp in hand, driving the "evil-influence" from the hearts and minds of the noble Chatellan and Chatellaine by the recital of the Lay of the Niebelungen Hoard, the deeds of Charlemagne and his Paladins, the chivalric exploits of Arthur and Tristram, or the still greater (?) ones of Fion Mac Cumhail and Oscar, and the splendors and hospitality of the palace of Almhuin.

At this point of his task, the critic, forgetting that it is a task, and letting the existence of author and publisher escape his memory, seizes on the invention of printing, and ignoring the dirty advertisements of quacks, Reynolds's villanous Mysteries, Volney's Ruins, and The Vestiges of Creation, blows it up in triumph to the clouds.

Now encumbering his arms with Mme. de Scuderi's folio romances, he points to the curious circumstance of the living coachmen, vine dressers, and ploughmen of Normandy and Picardy rejoicing with their wives in the unchristian titles of Pharnabazes, Sophonisba, &c.; names given to their great-great-grandfathers by the lords and ladies, their masters, from the aforesaid folios, and still religiously handed down with true Celtic tenacity through their descendants.

Taking an easy flight over the curled periwigs of Congreve, Cibber, Addison, and Steele, he next repeats what every one knows about them already, and talks learnedly of the barren field of fiction from the Regency to the Revolution, if the works of Voltaire, Smollett, and Fielding, and the blameless Vicar of our own poor Oliver, are excepted.

Being now comfortably landed on the threshold of our own times, he shews, by the help of the introduction to Telemachus, and a translation of a volume in Bohn's Library, what are the essential qualities of a heroic poem, and varying the recipe a little, he applies the rule to a prose epic. He laments that Thackeray does not copy the bonhomme of Goldsmith, and that the plot of Pickwick is not so compact as that of Tom Jones; and wishes that the authoresses of Beatrice, of The Lady and the Priest, and of Father Enstace, might be shut up together in a lone chateau, be well fed, never see the face of a man, and be obliged to listen to each other's productions.

At last, our critic counts his pages, and finds that out of the sixteen which he had allotted to the Parish Orphan, fifteen and a half are occupied.

So he refers to want of space, (whose fault?) compliments his readers on the accession of a new and powerful, though yet undisciplined pen, to the field of letters; speaks of truth of character-painting, of delicacy of style, natural succession of incidents, (bating a little improbability), and recommends to the talented author more care in the elaboration of the design of his (?) next work; excuses the absence of quotations from want of space, and the impossibility of divorcing any portion of the compact structure of the work from its context; but orders his readers to procure the book at once, and enjoy the intellectual treat.

Our literary magistrate now flings down his wearied pen, begs forgiveness from the bust of Aristotle over his desk, thanks Mercury that his task is ended, and runs off to enjoy a hearty laugh at Little Tiddlers.

Those readers of the article who depend on Providence and their fellow creatures for judgment, and taste, and every thing else, send at once to the library or the shop for the much-be-praised book, wonder that they cannot find out the beauties attributed, throw it on the heap of neglected works, or return it to the library, on whose shelves it will soon form a permanent incumbrance.

Now, as from the peculiar aim of this series of papers, the amusement or information of our readers is of much more interest to us, than the profit of publisher or glorification of author we are more anxious to discover a work of merit among our French collection (new or old, it little matters), than to seize on the latest importation. We have taken down one of De Bernard's, of which we entertain pleasurable recollections since a perusal of many years date.

It will not be necessary to analyse the peculiar qualities of our Author's powers here, as this introduction has already extended farther than we proposed, and as something has been already done in our Sixth Number, (page 369,) on occasion of noticing his Gentilhomme Campagnard. His caustic and vigorous powers were there pointed out, with the substratum of a kind nature, under a harsh and cynical exterior.

As a pendant, we may remark, that he detested socialism and red republicanism, and was no believer in the sincerity of the poor old "Citizen King."

Incapacity or self seeking among those who aimed at political power or influence, particularly stirred his bile; and the chief object of the present work was to point out the bad consequences of a man of mediocre ability striving to attain office which he is unable to manage for his own comfort or the good of the people. In devoting all his attention to the means of raising himself to the coveted point, his family affairs are left to mind themselves, and the natural consequences soon force themselves on his notice in a very disagreeable shape.

Our Serious Man, an advocate at Douay, was in easy circumstances, but of no great mark as an able lawyer. He was sufficiently fluent, employed more in criminal than civil trials, and generally lost only three cases out of four. He practised more with the object of seeing himself in print four times in the year, viz. at the periods of the assizes, than from any wish to add to his funds. In the intervals he was much more intent on politics than jurisprudence. In a general election for members of the "Chamber" previous to 1830, he stoutly opposed the legitimist member, using all his influence for the opposition side of the house, and was stoutly supported by a society to which he belonged, The Help-yourself Association. It was to his son Prosper, a lad of fourteen that the crowning victory was due. At the critical moment he drove up to The College of Electors (an equivalent to our Hustings) in a triumphant chariot of many seats, with a full dozen of dilatory voters whom he had unearthed in different nooks of the arrondissement. He lustily cracked his whip on his arrival in honor of the Côté gauche, and alighting, threw himself into his father's arms. This touching and patriotic spectacle drew tears from the indifferent or friendly by-standers, and made the Prefect and the Attorney General turn pale.

M. Chevassu had some reason to be discontented with his treatment in high quarters. He had for ten years, vainly sought the place of Councillor in the Cour Royale at Douay; but it was not till the Revolution of July that his wishes were gratified. His ambition having expanded in the interim however, nothing less will gratify him now than the dignity of President of the Chamber, or Attorney General. As councillor of the court of his city he could not be deprived of his office, so he cast himself vigorously into opposition, and prepared for offering himself as member of the Legislative Chamber in Paris when the present representative, who was old and feeble, should be called away.

The political atmosphere of Douay being quiet and cloudy, M. Chevassu determines to infuse some briskness and life into it, even through the agency of a thunder clap in the guise of an opposition newspaper; and André Dornier is sent from an agency office in Paris to "guide the lightning and direct the storm;" Douay though boasting the title of 'The Athens of the North' being unable to furnish more than aspirants to the honors of Poets' Corner.

In the middle ages, Italy had its Condottieri, who, at the head of a band of soldiers, without fear, but not without reproach, settled the quarrels of princes or states 'for a consideration,' changed sides as they found it profitable, behaved with the forbearance of wolves towards each other; and, in fine, made a profitable speculation of civil war by exchanging a little blood for a great deal of money. These unscrupulous adventurers may be compared to certain speculators of our times who carry on war, plume in hand, at the behest of the opinion that pays, being fully prepared to oppose it if they can find better pay in the camp of the enemy. André Dornier was a curious specimen of these modern Condottieri. An Enfant Perdu of the hospital of the state, he treated this great and respectable parent with the coolest irreverence. Nothing could exceed the suppleness of his contradictory evolutions, and the unconcern with which he changed his colors when it was his profit to do so. Yesterday a doctrinaire, to-day a republican, to-morrow a ministerialist, provided that five francs' profit could be made by it. Still, such was his address, that where another would be looked on as a renegade, he passed for a writer of conscience, but sometimes led astray by the honest zeal of his convictions.

At this epoch André Dornier had arrived in Paris from Bourdeaux, where he had just got a republican paper killed under him, not the first accident of the kind that had happened. His luck had been adverse for some time. One paper had died for want of subscribers, the public functionary had executed another: so he came up to Paris, as a centre from which to make a new sally. Little welcome at Castelnau-dry for an editor coming from Morlaix, or at Briançon for one freshly cast at Brives-la-Gaillarde; the provinces are coquettish, their purveyors must be brought from the capital.

The suppression of his Bourdeaux journal was such a recommendation to the Douay malcontents, that they almost wrung his arms off at a banquet given in his honour, and at the end of the feast they danced The Marseillaise by way of refreshment. He soon got the measure of his flock of sheep, who affected the manners of ravenous wolves, and to M. Chevassu, their bell-wether, he paid successful court. This gentleman, though tolerably eloquent, was an indifferent hand at composition; and Dornier, by affecting the scholar, and ascribing all his merits to the instructions received from his patron, won on his friendship and consideration to such an extent, that The Serious Man, even while he felt his own dimensions wonderfully expanding, would venture on nothing without the advice of his cunning pupil. He often repeated, "When I am in the chamber, let Thiers and Odillon Barrot keep themselves quiet."

A wider horizon is now opening to our editor. Mlle. Henriette Chevassu, a fine dark beauty of sixteen, takes lessons in Italian from him; and the thought of becoming her husband, and getting such a fortune as will insure his future well-being, is becoming stronger with each day.

Strange to say, as his influence with her father increases, he sees her indifference strengthening to dislike; but the circumstance of the young, handsome, and amiable Vicomte de Moréal casting tender and loving looks on the young lady, when he can get sight of her at church or in the public promenades, has probably something to do in the matter.

The Douay Patriot struggles on for two years, but shews symptoms of decay, old subscribers dropping off, new ones not presenting themselves, when Prosper, the brother of Henriette, who is supposed to be diligently employed at his law studies in Paris, presents himself to his father one summer morning, in a colored calico shirt, torn trousers, boots with many cracks, and a coarse winter coat. The father, after a severe lecture, demands why his aunt, Mme. Pontailly, should have let him out of Paris in such a trim, but he replies that he could not think of being under obligation to any one of the slavish politics of his aunt and her husband. The young hero had exaggerated his father's opposition to the very reddest shade of republicanism; and as the aunt and uncle were pure Legitimists, M. Chevasse forgave his extravagance for the moment, for sake of this sacrifice to his political creed.

The Patriot continues to be watched by the officials of the Cour Royale, for the detection of some peccadillo meriting a prosecution, but no handle is presented till Prosper's arrival. In his father's temporary absence, he sends a "leader" which is unsuspectingly admitted; and

Next day was such a festival at the Cour Royale as leaves its memory fresh for many a year. According as the members arrived, the Patriot went from hand to hand, and every visage wore a joyful grin. The subalterns could not remain quiet; they moved restlessly here and there, as sea-gulls conscious of the coming storm. The "Silk-gowns" put their heads in a corner to assess the damages, and the Attorney General, happier than all the rest together, measured the hall with long strides, and took snuff without intermission; this being with him the usual token of supreme rapture. "We have them at last," was the exclamation on all sides.

The dismayed proprietors hold a stormy meeting, and M. Chevasse is confounded by his son's avowal of the article.

"Yes, father," said the student with the finest assurance; "for ever so long, the Douay Patriot was aground in the shallow, mry waters of 'moderantism': I have sent it into open sea. Now behold it launched: may its course be happy."

"You unhappy boy," said the wretched advocate, assuming a dramatic pose, "you have not committed it to the open sea, but to the Court of Assize. Alas! it was all that was wanted. I would wager that the jury list is already filled: we shall be condemned without a shadow of doubt."

"So much the better," cried Prosper with a determined tone. "We needed the baptism of persecution: let every one now do his duty. You, noble founders of the journal, will seize with eagerness this opportunity of manifesting your patriotism: you will joyfully associate to pay the fine." Here the proprietors looked wistfully in each other's faces, and some of them instinctively laid their hands on their pockets as if to defend the contents.

"The publisher will go to prison, that's all," continued Prosper: "what else is he paid for?"

At these words a little thread-bare man, who was modestly sitting in a quiet corner, rose and bowed to Prosper with an air of unaffected chagrin.

"Yes, Father Morlot; you will go to prison, and there you'll be like a fish in water. Be comforted; you shall want for nothing; every luxury will pour in on you. Game-pies, baskets of fowl, smuggled tobacco, kirsch-wasser from the Black Forest; you like the kirsch, Father Morlot: your fellow citizens will empty their cellars rather than see you want. 'We will be condemned,' you say: just the thing I wish. I will avow myself the author; I will plead in person; and, I give you my word of honor, the jacks in office will hear the truth for once: they will laugh on the wrong side of the mouth, the slaves!"

"Be silent, Prosper," said his father, looking at the journal with bitterness: "our enemies will be embarrassed merely in the choice of counts; provocation to revolt and civil war, personal affront to the king, attack on his rights and the order of succession. Ah, how the attorney will rub his hands! Prosper, is this the fruit of my lessons? I, who taught you the first rudiments of constitutional speech; I, who showed you by what paraphrases, by what attenuations, by what circumlocutions, you might say anything with impunity. Why, for instance, could you not avail yourself of the expressions consecrated to the present order of things; 'The days of July,' 'established order,' &c., instead of crying out unguardedly, roughly, rashly?"—"I call a cat, a cat," broke in the law student.

"My dear Prosper," said Dornier mildly, "you forget that 'speech has been given to man to conceal his thoughts.'"

"And who has said so but that old serpent, Talleyrand? No, gentlemen, citizens I mean: speech was not given to disguise thought, but to spit in the face of tyrants. That I have done, that I will ever do. We will awake public feeling, public resentment. We will be condemned, but we will gain five hundred additional subscribers."

This prophecy was only fulfilled on the evil side: the paper was extinguished by the heavy fine, and poor M. Chassani exclaimed, as Francis I. did with respect to Louis XII., "This big boy will put everything astray." Dornier, though his new "occupation was gone" again, made himself so necessary to our embryo politician that he could not let him depart: who would be then at hand to exalt him above Foy, Martignac, Berryer, and particularly Mirabeau? Rather than see that sprig of nobility, Le Vicomte de Moréal, espouse his daughter, he will bless Dornier with her hand: but first let the aged representative die for good, and himself take his place. Then, hey for the sensation he will produce in the house of representatives! Let the 'extreme right' look to itself.

The desired event takes place; M. Chevassu is elected representative of Douay; Dornier is despatched to Paris to procure lodgings, and make things smooth with the coterie to which the new member intends to unite his influence, and the Count Fabien de Moréal and Dornier are waiting (not by concert, you may suppose) on a cold winter's morning in the court-yard of the Diligences, on the watch for the member and his son and daughter. On the arrival of the coach, Dornier receives the family with his usual empressement, and announces that he has taken apartments for the new member in the Hotel Mirabeau.

"Hotel Mirabeau," repeated M. Chevassu, majestically applying a large pinch of snuff. "I have no objection to the name. Great orator, Mirabeau! very great orator indeed, and one that would have been a great minister, a perfect man in fact, if one thing had not been wanting." "And what might that be?" said Dornier, with the tone of a scholar asking for information from his master.

"Virtue," said the Member, brushing off some grains of snuff from his cravat and waistcoat with the happy air of one who was conscious of no deeper stains. "Virtue! political, I suppose," said Dornier with a sardonic smile. "Oh! not that of a Chartreuse or an Anchorite certainly. Mirabeau"—but here he was interrupted.

Prosper has been in chase of his spaniel Justinian through the yard, and now appears lugging him back by the collar: he exchanges a cordial grasp with Dornier, and asks Henriette if his fowling piece, cornet-a-piston, foils and pistols have been taken out.

"You have not enquired about your 'Code,'" said his father with an accent of displeasure. "That is, because it is carefully put up in my trunk." M. Chevassu, with increased gravity, drew out of his pocket a thick little volume with marbled edges, and informed him that he had left it behind at Douay; and gave it as his opinion that it deserved as much attention at least as his cornet-a-piston and other incumbrances. Prosper, to show his indifferent respect for jurisprudence, gives the volume to Justinian to carry, reminding him that if he happened to swallow it by mistake, there would be no great harm done.

M. Chevassu counts back at this epoch four hundred years of ancestors, all Roturiers; and is as seemingly proud of their want of title as others would be of its possession. On Dornier mentioning that Mme. la Marquise de Pontailly would be happy to receive Mademoiselle as soon as convenient after her arrival,

"Mme. la Marquise de Pontailly," repeated M. Chevassu, laying an ironical emphasis on each word: "you have mistaken your vocation, my dear Sir: you should have been born a gentleman. By the Countess of Escarbagnas, the title of my sister sounds pompously in your mouth. You are sadly deceived, Henriette, if you think Mme. la Marquise will be up at five o'clock to receive you. You can come to the Hotel Mirabeau in the interim: you will not be sorry to do a little toilette before presenting yourself to your noble aunt. But you are paying no attention to me."

His remark was just. The young lady had recognized the Comte enveloped in his slouched hat and mantle; and eyes and ears were available but for his dear presence. Prosper has recognised him also, and in conducting his sister to the gate where a coach provided by Dornier is in waiting, he whispers to her "Lindor (a nick-name of his for the count) is here; I must have an explanation with him." She deprecates ill feeling, and he promises the utmost moderation, but insists on impeding the match. He packs father, sister, and spaniel, into the coach, starts it for the hotel, interrupts the lover as he is getting into a cabriolet to follow on its traces, and insists on his coming into a little cabaret to have an opportunity for an explanation.

The two young men remained a moment silent, gazing at each other. "Is it possible that you do not recognize me?" said Prosper with a bantering air, "my name is Chevassu." "I recognise you quite well, dear Prosper," said Moréal, striving to conceal his vexation; "but I so little expected to find you here, that at first, the surprise—and then your moustaches"—"You flatter me," said the other caressing his beard; "still I think (permit me) your surprise was not so great as you would wish me to believe." "Yet you must own that to meet you here at 6 o'clock, implies a strange chance." "Ah! you believe in chance: I do not." "Quite right in a religious point of view: put Providence instead of chance." "Let us rather refer to the god Cupid: it will be less edifying but more explicit."

As they are entering the tap room, the spaniel, who could not endure his master's absence, runs at full speed into the yard, and bounds on his master. Prosper not being in good humor, pulls out his whip, but seeing the mortified air of poor

Justinian as he crouches at his feet, he contents himself with pulling his ears, and points out his wonderful power of scent to De Moréal, who politically joins in the dog's praise. They enter, and Prosper treats himself to a hot drink, and smokes at a rate to indemnify himself for his forced abstinence in the coach.

Prosper. "It is a fact that this is far from being a majestic apartment; but the gravest interests may be discussed in the humblest abodes. Did not Napoleon and Alexander sign the treaty of Tilsit, in a vulgar boat?"

"Let the oxen be propitious. I trust that after the example of the two emperors, we are going to sign a treaty,—and one more durable than theirs."

"First, let us display the point in dispute: your diplomatic manœuvres only embroil the question: You love my sister?" "Yes," said Moreal, with a grave air. "You love her much?" "With all my heart and soul." "Very well, your love is serious, the passion of an honourable man: you wish to espouse her?" "It is my dearest wish." "Well, that is a settled point. For the past year, you have been in her footsteps, at church, at the promenades, at balls. To get near her, you have become the anathema of the dowagers of our city, and what city can boast of such a precious collection! Douay, Dowager; the derivation is self evident. Your family are Legitimists, yet have you presented yourself at the Prefect's, at the General's, at the Mayor's, at all the officials' in a word; and what is the cause of your incurring the virtuous indignation of the Faubourg St. Germain of Douay, if it is not the fair young lady whose brother I have the pleasure to be—Is it not so?" "Undoubtedly." "Has not your conduct for a year past so vividly recalled the Paladins and Troubadours of old times, that a scapegrace of my acquaintance has had the assurance to give you the nickname of Lindor?" "I am ready to pardon that scapegrace for even weightier offences." "He desires nothing better than your friendship, but we must be reasonable: and here he refreshed himself with a hot gulp or two. We have only spoken of the romantic side of the affair, let us look on the waver side. Two months since you demanded her hand from my father, who, though flattered by the offer, did not feel himself disposed to encourage your proposal. After this refusal, it appears to me that to persist in your suit, and act the part of a romantic lover, is to place my sister in a disagreeable position; and this is what I cannot allow." "But where can be the crime of loving to day what I loved yesterday." "You do not comprehend me. Love with more ardour than Roland; be more constant than Amadis; I give you full permission. I object not to the existence of your love, but to its manifestation. You have been refused the object of your idolatry: if you should not become in consequence, a resigned and hapless lover, I know nothing of the matter." "I am an unhappy lover indeed." "Well, since that is your special position, act accordingly; the receipt is patent. Dis of grief, become a Trappist, throw yourself into the Seine, blow out your brains: I'll not interfere. Do not once think of turning my father from his resolution, it is not to be shaken." "I'll make the attempt, however; if you do not choose to befriend me, at least remain neuter." "But that I will not do: I would even use my little influence against you." "What can have caused your antipathy towards me?" "I am not limited to one cause: I have many. Primo, when we hunt together you kill all the game." "I vow that if I become your brother, I will never draw trigger till you have missed." "Do you hear that, Justinian," caressing the long muzzle which the dog held up to him: "do you see how your master is made game of?" "Secundo, when you sing Tenor, my modest Barytone is inaudible." "If it is of the slightest pleasure to you, I will always take Bass, when we perform together." "As much as to say that I cannot take a tenor part. But to pass to more serious matters; you are of the ancient regime, Count or Marquis, and we are of the new order." "Viscount only, and I have laid even that title aside, not being rich enough to uphold it properly." "But do you think that Henriette would not like to play at Viscountess, when your wife?" "And where would be the harm?" "None to me; I am above such silliness; but when I get a wife, I am certain that Mme. Prosper Chevasu would prefer a bourgeois sister-in-law to a titled one. So let the Franes intermarry with the Franes, and the Gauls with the Gauls." "My dear Prosper, there are no more Franes or Gauls; we are all French." "Ah! that would sound well in a Vaudeville, but I persist in my opinion; no disparities for me." "Has not your aunt married M. de Pontailly?" "Yes, and ever since treated us as vassals: so would Henriette." "Your sister has too noble a soul for such meanness; your opinion is really an offence towards her." "Oh, I am aware that in speaking of her as a simple mortal, I must incur your wrath, but the eye of a brother is not provided with a lover's focus." "Do you intend to present yourself at my aunt's reunions?" "By all means, if Mme. de Pontailly deigns to receive me." "And how could she refuse such a favor to M. le Vicomte de Moréal whose ancestors figured at the crusades!" "But this arrangement I am fully resolved to contravert. Do you intend to seek further interviews with my sister?" "By every means in my power." "Then give me leave to tell you that your first success will be followed by a little promenade on both our parts to the wood of Vincennes or the quarries of Montrouge." "As you please," said Moréal coolly, "but I give you notice that I will first make free with Mr. André Dornier's nose, and thus have the pleasure of a rencontre with him before I be obliged to meet you."

Prosper having in his vexation, given a kick to poor Justinian, the faithful animal feeling his self-love and esteem much hurt, made his escape, and his master gave chase requesting Moréal to wait a few minutes. However, he could not overtake the fugitive and Moréal went to his lodgings after a considerable delay.

In order to have his entrées at Mme. de Pontailly's whose husband had been a fellow emigré with his father in the good old times of Robespierre, he had addressed a note to that gentleman, mentioning that he had in charge to return to him a keepsake from his dead comrade. As he gets the key of his apartments from the porter he is accosted by

A bulky little man, about sixty-five years old, square in the shoulders, round in the body, and fixed as firmly on his short legs as a hippopotamus. Nothing more jovial or less venerable than his fleshy and purple cheeks, and his jolly nose which exhibited all the hues of the treacherous bottle.

Two piercing little eyes, sheltered by bushy grey eyebrows, gave to his jocose visage the mocking expression which characterises the portraits of Rabelais. In a word, so sensual and so epicurean, so jeering and so gastronomic was the countenance, that the white hair which shadowed all, seemed sadly out of place: it was the forehead of a patriarch crowning the mask of a satyr.

This lively old boy, predestined to apoplexy, wore a loose blue coat, under which his greenish silk vest enveloping his capacious stomach, bore a striking resemblance to the curving shell of a tortoise. All his dress was easy and unfashionable, but of the best materials and of unsullied neatness.

When Moréal finds it to be his father's old associate and Henriette's uncle to boot, he bustles to some purpose to make him comfortable; lighting up a good fire, installing him in an easy chair, &c.; and the old fox enjoys the welcome with great glee, as he is not very much astray for the pre-disposing cause.

When the gentleman is settled as comfortably as his host can make him, he lays before him a roughly fashioned little white wood box inlaid with ebony, and presents him the key. The old gentleman opens it with eagerness, all the sarcasm of his features giving way to an expression of deep emotion. On opening it the usual appearance of a water-color paint-box is presented, with brushes, crayons, saucers, &c., and on the inside of the lid appears in ink of an old date.

The Marquis of Pontailly, by the grace of the French Republic one and indivisible, maker of snuff-boxes and bilboquets—to his friend the Viscount de Moréal, by the forementioned grace, painter of hams, salads, pies, and other comestibles.

The Marquis read this inscription aloud, and heaved a profound sigh, and with a sadness in his voice which harmonized badly with his open and rubicund face, said, "Alas! when I presented this to your father, we lodged in garrets in a strange land, and had no expectation of our estates ever being restored; rather the guillotine if we attempted to re-visit our native soil. Judge then if we could be gay." "There seem to have been causes enough to throw you into despair." "Bah! we have never since been so happy: I'll answer for your father. Had we not youth, unconquerable youth, on our side? You will never replace twenty-five: grow old my young friend as late as you can." * * * He then took the box on his knees, and examined the drawers one after another. "It was in 1797," said he, recalling his souvenirs: "we were in Munich and our prospects had had little of the rosy hue about them. The army of Condé had just been disbanded and our castles in the air were levelled from 'turret to foundation stone.' It was not as in 1793, when we had no doubt at all of success. I recollect that after the taking of the lines of Weessenburgh, Viscount Moréal was so certain of being restored to his estate in a month, that he appropriated every pound he could lay hands on. When asked the reason, he said they were to replace his pack which the rascally peasants of Moréal had killed when he was obliged to emigrate. Poor Moréal! he never tasted game killed by his new beagles. In 1797 after the treaty of Campo Formio, all hope of recal was lost. Those who were not destitute of resources settled down in Germany or retired to England: those who had none (myself among the number) went into the service of Russia, or betook themselves to employments of various kinds, some of them being of a very bizarre character. Having amused my leisure in school days at turning, I now made that relaxation my bread-winner, and ignoring my dignity, I commenced to manufacture for the honest Bavarians, among whom my tent was pitched, snuff-boxes, pipes, spindles, and reels: behold a specimen of my handy work. It is not so bad for the production of a gentleman of name and arms."

M. de Pontailly turned the box in every direction, and contemplated it in every point of view with paternal complacency, then went on. "In the middle of his paradoxes, Rousseau was sometimes right. What he said of the utility of teaching the children of the rich some manual trade, struck the world at that period as exceedingly sound. My poor old box!" "The best workman of the Faubourg St. Antoine could not produce superior workmanship," said Moréal, faithful to his plan of determined flattery.

"Your father took to another line. He had been learning to paint at school, and after ten years' study had succeeded in producing with water-colors, what (with some indulgence) might be supposed to represent the different materials composing a déjeuner à la fourchette; an omelette, a slice of melon, a lobster, Roquesfort cheese, and in chief, a ham: the ham was the triumph. In varying the disposition of these viands, and breaking up the combination with bottles and glasses, he produced a series of little pictures which he confidently sold under the title of 'Studies from still life.' Each was the pendant of its predecessor, and it required all the German bonhomie to bite at such coarse eatables. However, by these and my turning lathe, we lived, and never was our life so happy as when we were obliged to labour for its maintenance."

"My father has often spoken of that time, and the most prized piece of furniture of his chamber was that box, which he said always recalled the happy days of Munich." "Just like myself. The two water-color drawings which he gave me in return occupy the best place in my cabinet ; and though they set our artist-visitors' teeth on edge, I would not exchange them for two 'Raphaels.' But you don't seem to set the same value as your father on this relic, seeing you are in such haste to return it."

It is an easy matter for the old gentleman to find out the real motives of Moréal's wish for his acquaintance, and he is only too ready to forward his views, as well out of friendship for his father, and his own agreeable person, and manners, and honorable character, as from a desire to keep Dornier out of the family. He explains that he has no influence over M. Chevassu, who is so zealous a commoner that he cannot forgive nobility in any shape ; but that he stands in awe of his sister, Mme. de Pontailly ; and that the only means to succeed must be to win her to his cause. The worst of the matter is that celebrity or talent of some kind is the only pass-word to her favor, and that at the present time Dornier is her chief favorite, she looking on him as a statesman of the first rank from his always having scraps of Montesquieu or Jeremy Bentham in his mouth. This influence must be combated by an exhibition of some other species of talent.

"Have you talent ? Are your acquirements varied ? Do you know the German Philosophy ?" "Not a shred of it." "So much the worse : an olla of Kant, of Fichte, of Schelling, and of Hegel, would be sure of success, and distance your rival at once. Well, well ; you are somewhat of an Orientalist ; you know the Arabic, the Chinese, the Sanscrit, or the Hindustanee." "Really I do not, I am only in possession of Latin, and even"—"Bah ! My wife reads Tacitus at sight. We must exhibit you as a great traveller : you have surely made a short excursion to the source of the Nile or to Tombuctoo ?" "Alas, no ; my travels are limited to Italy and Belgium." "Why not say to Brie and Beauce ? Ah, young man ! we'll have some trouble to make you an object of interest.—Let us look farther. You practise your father's art ; you paint well ; Mme. de Pontailly has an album." "Never touched a brush in my life." "I am now at my wit's end : can you magnetize ? This foolery would be better than all the others : it has not yet penetrated Madame's salon. You shall magnetize Dornier, and make him confess that he is a rascal ; a point you could never bring him to when awake. Ah, that would be a master-stroke !"

"I regret the want of magnetic power." "Then what in the name of Mercury can you do ?" "I have some little knowledge of music : I can sing at a pinch." "Vous chantez ; j'en suis fort aise," a nice letter of introduction to a lady who once had a charming voice, and has not sung a stave these ten years : music is forbidden at her meetings. If you have only this cord to your bow"—"Like all the world, I have perpetrated some verses in my time." "And why did you not confess the enormity an hour ago? Here have I been so long cudgelling my brains to procure a passport, and it in your pocket all the time. Produce the lines. I have sacrificed to the muses in my day ; so it is not to profane eyes your sweet secrets will be exposed. Read a specimen without fear : your verses must be bad indeed if they are not better than many that are applauded even in my wife's salon."

Moréal then produced a copy book filled with the neatest writing on both sides of every page (no erasures), and presenting such a specimen of caligraphic excellence as would only suffer by being printed : such amateur performances rarely are. "Fine writing," said the old man : "I am glad to see that you do not agree with those who look on spider-leg scrawls as an index of talent ; and all because Buonaparte took lessons in penmanship from a cat. Confusion," he exclaimed, as he examined the different titles : "Hours of Bitterness, good ; Disenchantment, good, good ; Days of Sorrow ! what devils of titles ! These subjects are about as gay as the 'Lamentations of Jeremiah.' Tears of the Soul ; Morbleu, I prefer the tears of the vine. Melancholy à M. de Lamartine. Give Cæsar his due ; is it not to M. de Lamartine that we owe this vapid beverage of Melancholy? To HER. All right, let us turn to the next : she would never forgive me for reading this without leave. Lost Hopes. I hand you to some one else. Hymn to Despair : ah, I see it is done for a wager," fixing a keen and mocking look on the poet. "You really are unpardonable. Young had lost his daughter, or more correctly his daughter-in-law ; and Dante had witnessed the burial of his Beatrice : but what have you lost, happy young rogue? The sucking poets of the day are detestable with their disenchantments and their melancholies. What would you have done in the times of my youth, if you could do nothing but dream, weep, and curse? The Roman Festival ; now we have something lively. I was at the Carnival in 1817, and can judge of its merits."

The piece being selected, Moréal is requested to read it out, his judge settling himself against the back of the fauteuil, one hand under his chin, the other in his waistcoat, and the whole attitude so threateningly attentive that the reading commenced in a very shaky tone. The subject belied the title ; it was a recital of the martyrdom of some Christians under Nero, and the teeth of the wild beasts and the torches of the executioners had enough to do : it was, in fact, a regular "Spasmodic Tragedy." When the poem came to an end, the poet found his judge enjoying a calm slumber, and flung his copy book in rage on the table. This succeeded in awaking his flagging attention.

The ancient critic opened his eyes, sat upright, and cast a derisive look at the Viscount. "Take comfort," said he, "I was not asleep but reflecting. In fact the poets of this era are a strange race: when they are not weeping they are roaring. For instance, see the wasp's nest into which you have brought me with your deceptive title, and what a goose I, that allowed myself to be led by the nose! And you call this a festival! Oh, Pasquin and Marforio, what would you say? A festival! call it rather an Auto-da-fé, a feast of Cannibals, a slaughter house. If it is to your taste, it is not to mine. Your festival smells of the abattoir, of burning pitch, of roasting flesh. I prefer the scent of roses or the odor of old Falernian. I give the palm to Albano over Ribera. It is easy to grind up red and black; the combination of sweet and delicate tints, on the contrary, is not within the scope of every pencil.

Are you thinking by chance, of sending these verses to the printer?" "By no means." "Very well. Whatever merit they have, they are verses at all events, and will assure you a reception with Mme. de Pontailly, which neither your birth nor knowledge of the world could procure. Shall I present you to day?" * * *

M. Andre Dornier was sitting by the fire while M. Chevassu with morning gown on, and shaving brush in hand, was laying on a coat of lather before a small looking glass. "Now," said he, "as we are alone, let us speak of the project hinted at in your letter." "Here it is. There are between the 'centre-left' and the 'left,' from twenty-five to thirty deputies discontent with their file-leaders, and wishing for nothing better than to form the nucleus of a new parliamentary faction."—

"Another third party. I have thought of it," said M. Chevassu, always willing to lay claim to priority of ideas. "Or rather a fourth party seeing that the third is extant. It seems to me that it would be a fine debut to seize on this floating mass, to establish yourself chief of an influential coterie; a certain opening to become one day the master of an entire section." "A superb debut: I've been long ripening this project in my mind."

"Among the men spoken of, there is not one, capable of disputing the first place with you: it is now vacant: why not occupy it?" "I will take possession of it: I said so to myself as we drove along." "This is the plan: you will establish a paper." "Hum!" said M. Chevassu, recollecting the hole made in his purse by the Douay Patriot. "I see your objections and can remove them. I have not lost my time since my arrival. I have seen, sounded, tried these members: they will give their patronage to the journal: deputies never give more. Two bankers are already engaged as sureties. Our present prospects secure our existence for a year; but as it is expedient that your position should be high in relation to the subscribers, and your influence paramount, it will be needful to invest a respectable sum, say fifty thousand francs." "Fifty-thousand francs!" cried the deputy, turning round so briskly that he cut his chin. "It is a heavy draw I acknowledge, looking on it as mere money, but light when the result is taken into account. Our thirty deputies are at this moment only scattered wheat-stalks; the journal will be the band binding them into a sheaf; and he who holds the band holds the sheaf." "It was from me you learned this clear and precise logic; but you should have added in order to complete the image, 'who carries the sheaf gathers the grain.'" "Doubtless the object is desirable, but fifty-thousand francs!" "What do you think of Mme. de Pontailly contributing a like sum?" "My sister! a rank Carlist, fifty-thousand francs to establish a patriotic journal!" "What does she care, so that it affords room to the speculations of herself and her literary protégées!" "Ah, the blue stocking! If I incur expense, it is for the perfecting of a scheme long in contemplation. But have you, young man, weighed one difficulty? After all, I am the representative of the 'extreme left,' and consequently of a frank opposition; and if this paper appears, concessions must be made to the discordant opinions of the body you speak of: I must, in fact, lean lightly on the 'centre-left.'" "And what shall prevent you?" "Ought the deputy forget the pledges of the candidate?" "Louis XII. forgot the affronts offered to the Duke of Orleans." "A jest is not an answer. If I depart a line from the path laid down in my electoral address, what will my constituents say?" "If it were only your constituents," said Dornier, with the air of Tartuffe when he exclaims, si ce n'est que le ciel! "I would soon bring them to reason. It will be merely the affair of a little supplementary act to complete your profession of faith. There is not an elector to be found who can resist this sort of codicil when well seasoned with patriotic spices. Do you fear an imperative order from your electors?" "I would never submit to such slavery," said the deputy with a proud accent.

"Besides, with a consciousness of your powerful faculties, how could you submit to enact a secondary or hum-drum part at the chamber? However great your modesty, you cannot be ignorant of your real value; you must feel instinctively the possession of power." "Dornier, Dornier," said the deputy, waving his razor as majestically as if it were a sceptre. "Yes, I will repeat it even at the risk of displeasing you; your proper sphere is in the administration of authority: thither you tend as to your proper centre. Do not think it a renegation of your principles; it is merely the moral application of the laws of gravitation. A man such as you may traverse the Côté gauche, but he cannot rest there; allow me to make a comparison. A political career resembles a jaunt on a rail-road. You start from the station of opposition to arrive at the station of power. At first you put on all your steam, Pure Left. Bye and bye, you moderate the speed a trifle, Dynastic Left. After a little, a still more moderate speed is assumed, Left Centre. Finally as we approach our object, we diminish the motive force, we relax the rate: we are not flying now, we glide easily, gently, Smorzando; and we conclude by stopping without shock or concussion at the ministerial benches: there we dismount and take our official seat." "But are you not aware that you are a very Roué?" cried M. Chevassu who had smilingly listened to this parliamentary theory notwithstanding his rigid principles. "I feel myself honored by being your pupil," answered Dornier with a bow full of modesty.

Our legislator has now got on his white cravat, mounting as high as his ears to give him a dignified air, and his black body-coat buttoned from top to bottom; but he is much annoyed by the entrance of Prosper, all muddy and disarranged from an unsuccessful chase after Justinian. He takes the liberty of asking his grave father, "whether he has seen the truant," and this does not tend to restore his good temper. He enjoys the idea of the newspaper, as it will ensure him free admission at the theatres in quality of its dramatic feuilletonist, an office he intends to take. However, M. Chevasse commences a grave lecture on the subject of the respectability of the family, now reckoning four hundred full years' enjoyment of roturiership, without a single mis-alliance with a noble family (Prosper perceiving that one hundred years additional have been laid on since the election); and after specifying several of their ancestors, all respectable and serious men without exception, even himself being modestly quoted, he asks his truant, "what he considers himself to be, to which Graceless replies that he feels all the symptoms of a devilishly wearied citizen, and prepares for a doze on the sofa.

This is too bad: high words follow, and the prodigal is ordered out of his father's august presence. He obeys with great alacrity, and the dignified but really weak father sends Dornier after him to prevent some rash escapade, this selfish Mentor wishing for nothing better in the interim than a rupture between child and parent.

While preparing for her visit to her aunt—Mlle. Henriette acquaints her papa that she will not take the accomplished Mr. Dornier for her life's partner on any account; Moréal under the wing of the Marquis is preparing for the same visit; Dornier is also on the road to the same bourne, and even Prosper is about to indulge her with a taste of his quality. So our readers must dispose themselves for a peep into her learned salon.

Mme. de Pontailly had been a beauty in her youth, and is still a fine woman. At a certain epoch, she had looked back with regret on the delights and charms of young life, but though the future loomed drear in comparison, she resolved that whatever enjoyments were in store for middle-aged women were not to be despised. So having lost or dismissed her train of admirers, she took to patronize talent and literary excellence of every kind. Accustomed to the turmoil of the fashionable world, she could not endure the neglect into which those women fall who have no substitute for the plea-asures that pass with youth. Amiable cavaliers were replaced by men of science; gay deceivers, by wits; coxcombs, by pedants. Being now at the mature term of forty-six, she resolved to enjoy the delights arising from mental excitement and occupation, till more advanced years should require another change of scene. She was determined to defer the reign of cards and gossip to the latest possible hour.

However strong her predilection for men of distinction, on one point she was inexorable. Homer with mud on his boots, Dante with a hole at his elbow, or Shakespeare in wooden shoes would find an indifferent reception in her sanctuary, a sanctuary dreaded by uncombed and slovenly artists.

On half a dozen of chairs ranged in a semicircle before the fire, herself occupying a causeuse at one side, were seated the same number of celebrities more or less ugly or old. Beginning at the hostess they numbered thus. A Peer of France, a historian whose chief merit consisted in a knowledge of the true pronunciation of Latin and German names; a Russian gentleman despotic in his own country, liberal in Paris; an Italian poet, author of some classic tragedies, washy imitations of Alfieri; a Mexican general as silent as the Techichi of his country, but having the merit of being come from afar; last of all a young romancer, a dabbler in the dishevelled literature of the period.

At home, Mme. de Pontailly was accustomed to direct the order of the conversation, as the president of the chamber directs the political discussions in that august hall. She always had the subject settled on before hand, and the company acquiesced accordingly. One day politics were the theme; another, literature flourished; then perhaps the fine arts, succeeded in turn by the exact sciences. Mme. de Pontailly interested herself in all, understood all, spoke on all, but as every one is not similarly gifted, woe to the poet who came on the day devoted to chemistry; and wretched the naturalist who tumbled into the midst of a philological discussion: their tongues were locked for the day.

The order of this day was the comparative merit of the poetry of Lamartine and Victor Hugo; but in spite of her unceasing efforts, the debate did not come up to her wishes: the theme pleased no one. The Peer would have preferred to hold forth on the little parliamentary intrigues of the hour; the Merovingian historian would be better pleased to have some errors respecting Hlodovigh put to rights; the Russian had not yet got beyond Voltaire and J. J. Rousseau; the Italian would have freely spoken of his own verses, but those of others interested him little: the Mexican was not ready in French, and the romancer looked on poetry as Reynard on the grapes.

"Ah! how little versatility and expansion among my party!" sighed the poor lady: "Will none of my poets present themselves to day;" and as she spoke her wish was gratified: the door opened and in came the Marquis and Moréal. * * * In the ante-room Mentor had given a few directions to Telemachus. "Have courage ; you are well looking and have a good voice : you will be settled at the side of the mantel-piece opposite my wife ; that is to be your tribune. Assume a modest but easy attitude ; one hand in your waistcoat, the other hanging gracefully by your side ; cast a glance also now and then at the ceiling : with eyes so expressive as yours this will produce a good effect.

No Roman Festival on your life : something agreeable if possible, such as a hymn in honour of the fair sex. Women pardon us for reproaching them in prose, but in verse they must be worshipped on bended knees ; recollect this."

Madame had been aware of Moréal's rejection by her brother, and had resented it on more than one account ; and though Dornier was in favor for his political knowledge, the noble air and handsome countenance of our lover, together with his supposed poetical gifts wrought a powerful effect on the susceptible Marquise.

"As you are a poet you can draw us out of our present embarrassment. We were speaking of the two great masters of modern poetry, M. de Lamartine, and M. Victor Hugo. We hesitated to decide between two such great writers ; but you who cultivate their art must have a matured opinion, and your word should possess authority. To which of the bards, Monsieur, do you accord the preference ?"

Moréal had been prepared to repeat verses known by rote, and was frightened by this request to improvise on a difficult subject in prose, fearing besides to chance on a decision not agreeable to the lady patroness. He might have known that women in general, prefer Lamartine to Victor Hugo, as in Louis XIV's time, they preferred Racine to Corneille. Madame followed the general opinion of her sex, and as her husband had often heard this opinion expressed, he relieved our hero by making in the air a capital L. Guided by this sign, the Viscount commenced his theme with an eloquence that surprised himself. In a parallel enlivened with ingenious touches, he characterised the style of the two illustrious poets ; established the points in which they agreed, and those in which they differed ; gave to each a due tribute of deserved praise ; and after seeming to hesitate a little as to whom the laurel should be given, finally decreed it to the author of The Meditations.

"I think it impossible to treat a literary subject with better taste or greater impartiality, said the Marquise delighted to find her own opinion established by the formal judgment of the Viscount. This is what I call true criticism. Is it not your opinion also, Messieurs ?"

There was unanimous agreement on the point, though they had already begun to hold the lucky candidate in thorough dislike. (The expected demand on his own poetical powers is made in due course, and the Marquis cries) "Come, make room at the tribune," and Moréal took the required attitude, and threw up his eyes to the ceiling with an air of reverie, which well became his expressive countenance. "As Mme. la Marquise admires the poetry of Lamartine," said he, after a moment of seeming reflection, perhaps she will show indulgence to some lines which I have dared to place under the invocation of the great poet, unworthy homage without doubt.

"We are all attention," said the Marquise, now radiant with pleasure at seeing her day of poetry, which had like to have died of inanition, take an interesting turn.

Moréal recites his mediocre verses, and the Marquise is still more delighted. Dornier enters during the recital, and strives to confuse the poet with his scornful and hostile glances, but is unsuccessful.

"Well Monsieur Dornier," said the Marquis, with a caustic smile, "what do you think? Are not these fine verses." "Are they really verses," said Dornier, affecting surprise. "Well what are they if not ? prose?" "I did not say they were prose either." Well they must be one or the other; even M. Jourdain himself would allow that." "I am not M. Jourdain, so I will not allow it." The Marquise overhearing the dialogue, took up the discourse with an icy tone. "Monsieur, writing some articles in a newspaper does not always qualify to pass true judgment on poetry: one may be deep in poetical economy, and yet not know the language of Racine."

Dornier having come off second best, is relieved by the entrance of M. Chevassu and Henriette. The Roturier reads a lecture to the servant for inflicting a "de" on his name in introducing him; holds an unfriendly conference with his sister on account of her reception of Moréal, then enters on confidential matters with Dornier; and all the time, the lovers are as happy as circumstances will allow. Are they not in the same room, and at liberty to throw furtive glances on each other at intervals!

The door of the salon was opened, and in the middle of this reunion of persons, careful as to costume, polished in manner, and of guarded language, suddenly appeared a being, brusque and negligent to the last degree, and shewing as much contempt for euphuism as for etiquette.

The student made his way through the crowd. (Those to whom he was unknown wondering at his admission), enchanted at the effect he was producing, as he knew it would enrage his aunt.

He advanced as fast as he could towards her, and as if impelled by nepotic affection, hastened to throw himself into her arms. The Marquise detested these manifestations of tenderness, particularly in public, and everything resembling what Condé speaking of Pichegru, called the tender effusions of the Corps de Garde. So she drew back to avoid the inconvenient accolade, but she had to endure the half at least.

"Monsieur," said she to her nephew, darting a look of dignified anger on him, "it seems that the schools of law and of politeness are not identical. You may kiss a lady's hand if she choose to present it, but these embrassades, even between relatives, are in very bad taste?"

"Do not be annoyed, dear aunt," returned Prosper, without being at all affected: "I believe no one kisses a woman's hand unless she happens to be old, and you, dear aunt, are so young." "And you so badly brought up," said the Marquise, lowering her voice, "that I blush to be your aunt." "Oh, you blush," said the student, who was about to make some impertinent allusion to the little toilette economies of ladies when they approach fifty, but a supplicant glance from Henriette stopped him. "Will you permit me to dine with you in this modest costume," said he in revenge, drawing her attention to a dress more whimsical than correct. "I shall not press you undoubtedly," said she, assuming her grand air. "Oh, how good you are, my dear aunt! you always anticipate my wishes." So the student, gladdened by his success in vexing his relative, ran off to shake hands with the Marquis.

"Ah, good boy, are you there! incorrigible as usual, I see by my wife's air that you have managed to enrage her. You should not vex her, especially as we are childless." "Alas! it is too late," answered Prosper with affected contrition. Disgraced by my aunt, proscribed by my father; such at this moment is the condition of your unfortunate nephew. If you close your arms, there is nothing left but the grave's repose." "I do not mean to close arms or heart, but still I must give you advice. A little foolery is excusable: too much will set the world against you. What have you done to your father?" "Nothing whatever. I am the very model of a son; it is my father on the contrary who outrages all laws human and divine. Did he not propose to send me to a board-and-lodging house?" "And he was right. In his place I would have done it long ago. Ah! there would be a great difference." "How?" "You are of the ancient regime, and domestic despotism would be only a legitimate application of your principles; but my father! a deputy for the left, to make an attempt on the liberty of a citizen! For after all, am I not a citizen?"

He soon after accosts Moréal and reminds him of his wish to meet him next morning at St. Mande. Moréal appoints the morning after.

An instant after, Moréal negligently approached Dornier who seemed earnestly occupied studying an album in the recess of a window. "Monsieur," said he with a haughty air, "I ask an explanation of the look you thought proper to fix on me when I was reciting my verses." "When I am in the theatre, I am accustomed to look at the actors," replied Dornier, with an air as disdainful as his own. "You are not in a theatre now, nor am I an actor. You may think my poetry detestable if you like, but I forbid you to look insolently at me." "I did not ask your permission, and that's the only answer I choose to give." He cast a look of defiance on the Viscount, and they exchanged a mutual glance of deep but silent hate.

"I see you comprehend. We both desire the same object. One of us is too many." "If you wish for a duel I am at your orders." "To-morrow morning at 8 o'clock, in the wood of Vincennes. You have the choice of arms."

When Dornier finds that there is an impending challenge also on Prosper's side, he is exceedingly chagrined that his own turn is to be first. Prosper, however is determined to have the priority which shame prevents Dornier from permitting, but the student concocts a plan to disappoint him; after their dinner at a restaurant's, they come out on the boulevards to refresh themselves with the spectacle of an emeute, an occurrence which took place every evening.

At the end of 1834, the emeutes had wofully degenerated. Civil war was reduced to the proportions of a charivari; the cane of the police agents had replaced the musket. A popular commotion was now only a lively scene played by some young proletaires (always friendly to a little disturbance), and witnessed by a number of idlers equally ready to patronise a gratuitous exhibition.

This was the usual programme. Early in the evening two detachments of Municipal Guards on foot, established themselves at Porte St. Denis and Porte St. Martin, each flanked by a squad of Sergents de Ville, and some auxiliaries out of uniform but easily known by their blue great coats, their disobliging looks, and stout canes. Some mounted patrols of the Municipal Guard kept moving from one post to the other, surveying the groups of stragglers as shepherd dogs look after their flocks; with this difference that the armed guardians fell on their sheep with the flats of their swords at the first alert. The crowds became by degrees more compact, troops of young citizens in blouses arrived from the boulevards, the city, and the faubourgs: they jostle and crush, they whistle, they shout, they chaunt patriotic songs; the festival commences in earnest.

At times the patrol quitting their sauntering pace, charged the crowds at a brisk trot, and swept the boulevards, as a lively breeze in Autumn scatters the dead leaves. At other times the men with the forbidding visages rushed on the next group to them, brandishing their canes in an artist like manner, seized at hazard some individuals suspected of having whistled, and like hungry spiders, dragged these foolish blue-bottles into a cavern in the interior of Porte St. Denis. At 11 o'clock, the Municipal Guards sought their guard rooms, the spies their dens, thirty poor devils, the least culpable of the whole lot were conducted to prison, and all was over.

Next evening the entertainments were repeated.

Prosper's plan being to get Dornier into the hands of the men with the canes for a day or so, till his own meeting with Moréal was over, got him into a troublesome crowd much against his will, and acted the republican so naturally that their party was charged by the blue coat boys, and Dornier, being helped by his friend to a fall (accidentally, of course) was in their hands in a moment. Now was our student in raptures; but stumbling at the corner of the Rue St. Denis on a sergent de ville to whom he had demonstrated the strength of his arm on a late occasion, he was overpowered by force of odds, and obliged to rejoin his betrayed friend in the cavern.

It is needless to say that Moréal and his friend the Marquis had their trouble gratis next morning at the wood of Vincennes.

M. de Chevassu is not a little embarrassed by the unaccountable absence of Dornier; for he is preparing for his debut in the Chamber, and is puzzled whether he will make his oratorical opening after the thunder-clap fashion of Mirabeau, imitate the spirited answer of Pitt to Lord Nugent (?), or follow Burke in his oration for the American exemption from taxes. A sudden inspiration seizes him; some sugar manufacturers have entrusted him a petition, and, on the simple ground of the beet-root, he would execute such flowery lacerwork as would delight and charm the Legislative Assembly.

According to him, the sugar question presented two faces, interior and exterior. Interiorly, it was connected with all the grievances of the opposition, the forgetting of the promises of 1830, the non-performance of the programme of the Hotel de Ville, the tendency towards retrograde notions, the corruption of officers in power, the falsification of the electoral lists, the hatred of every species of reform. Exteriorly, the eloquent tribune took a wider field. With the calm strength of an eagle who balances himself with ease above the highest mountain peaks, he descanted on the most arduous questions of the moment, Eastern, Spanish, Belgian, Algerian. In this birds-eye prospect, oh, what variety of episodes, what unexpected transitions, what luxury of metaphor, what boldness of the figure Prosopopeia! Biting sketch of the abject position of the cabinet in the face of Europe, defiance to la perfide Albion, protest in favor of Polish nationality, lamentations over negro slavery, philosophical dissertation on the decay of Turkey, prophetic tableau of the mighty duel between England and Russia, marching against each other from opposite points of Asia; sad return to the pitiable position of France, obliged to witness, without sharing in this magnificent spectacle,* patriotic homage to the tomb at St. Helena; and all in reference to beet root. In conclusion, the orator returning to his legume, pathetically established; that if they added to the tariff of native sugar, so much as a centime per kilogramme, they might as well pitch France at once into the abyss.

While he wishes for the return of Dornier and wonders at his absence, his brother-in-law enters with the intent of advancing Moréal's suit, and doing Dornier all the mischief he can by relating his failure to appear on the ground. He effects no good, and they separate in a very ill humor with each other. Moréal pays a visit to Mme. de Pontailly in the evening, and is employed inspecting an album in company with Henriette, when the devil takes that opportunity of reminding the aunt that it is not so long ago that she possessed charms superior to those of her niece, that she still retains enough of mature personal beauty, with superior mental endowments to enhance them; that it would be delicious to breathe the atmosphere of mutual affection again, that it would be a pity to chain down the talented, handsome viscount to the mindless young chit beside him, that it was shameful on her part to be so engrossed by him for such a length as they have been sitting together, &c. So she approaches and requests her niece to give orders for serving the tea, orders very reluctantly obeyed.

"Do you find in this album any design worthy of your attention?" said she to Moréal in a tone half tender half resentful. "Everything is charming, madame, particularly this landscape." "Landscape! do you not see that it is a sea view?" "Oh, doubtless," answered the embarrassed lover: "that is what I meant to say, a marine landscape." "But where is the land portion? it is only two ships on the open sea." "In the open sea, as you properly remark, madam, I gave to the word 'landscape' too extensive a signification."

Now Juno gets at her old trick of borrowing Venus's Cestus, and indulges Moréal with half an hour of her conversation with which he could have well dispensed. She is by this time determined to allow no tete-a-tetes while Henriette is under her protection: it would be contra bonos mores, and be acting disloyally towards her brother: and when her husband endeavours to win her over to the wishes of the young people, he finds her ears closed, and her feelings far from friendly. The only concession she makes is permission to Moréal to come and plead his cause in person. The husband thinks that he would not have been flattered by getting such a commission ten years ago, makes no remark, but keeps up his niece's spirits as well as he can. Poor M. Chevassu is now feeling the loss of Dornier. In a conference with the members of his section of the house, he has taken the airs of a chief on himself all at once, and disgusted or prejudiced every one of them, no silver tongued, Dornier being there.

to make things agreeable. Of course he attributes it to his evident innate greatness which little spirits like theirs could only look on with envy. In a visit paid to his sister he announces to his daughter that he will not insist on her marriage with Dornier, and while she is overcome with joy, the Marquis enters, and gives her a commission to arrange some things in his library.

"Well Monsieur the Deputy," said he, as she left the room, "where are we now? are we upturning the ministry? are we declaring war against all Europe? are we effecting electoral reform?" "Too many questions at once," said the deputy not at all sensible of the irony. "But this I say, that if the ministry is not put out by the address, it will be left in a hopeless condition. For my own part as soon as I have established my position in the chamber, I will trouble Messieurs the ministers with a few propositions of which they will be forced to make cabinet questions. We shall see how they will get out of the difficulty." "Ah, truly, a cabinet question! now I am going to propose to you a cabinet question; we shall see if it is worth yours, and how your paternity will draw you out of it. Where is Prosper?" "Prosper," said the deputy as if awaking from a sleep: "it is two days since I have seen him." "But you know at least where he is?" "At his lodgings I suppose." "But you are not sure?" "I have been so encumbered with affairs since my arrival" — "That you have not had time to look after your son; it would be too vulgar a concern, monbleu, for a great citizen of your rank. If it was but to emancipate negroes, to protect intriguants, to harangue imbeciles, oh, how zealous you would be! listen to this letter just received from Prosper."

He reads Prosper's letter in which Dornier is thoroughly acquitted of pusillanimity, and M. Chevassu sees no reason why he should not keep his word to his protégée, and in this resolve he is fostered by his sister for her own selfish motives. Noréal on being apprised of the turn things have taken, hastens to Mme. de Pontailly to obtain her powerful succour, and a long and tangled conference follows, where he is foiled at every attempt, by some excuse on her part, or reference to his poetry, or the necessity of a poet having a real living muse worthy of his verses, by her genius and accomplishments, and better than all, appreciation of his talents. We have only room for one or two of the points of view in which she set the picture of his future if it turned out to his wishes. In the general application there is not a little truth.

"When the present illusion vanishes, what will remain of your divinity of to-day? a mere frivolous, vulgar, insignificant woman, occupied with trivial interests, and incapable of any correspondence with your intelligence. What will happen? You will seek abroad that illusion which you cannot find at home. Poor Henriette will then be unhappy, and I never will forgive you for being the cause of her wretchedness." "Madame I swear to you"—"What will be your own fate? believe me it will be a sad one: it is a heavy chain which ties us to an inferior being. How renounce these outpourings of heart and spirit, impossible except between two equal and sympathetic souls? Do you feel the weight of the misfortune comprised in the two words, 'not appreciated, not understood'? Poets above all are liable to these bitter deceptions when they marry, Moliere and Lord Byron, for instance." "But Madam, I am not Moliere nor Byron." "You are a poet, that is enough. If I had any skill, I would not say to you, 'Macbeth, you shall be King;' but literature has its crowns, and I would point out one of these for your meed. At your time of life you should not peril its great end and aim by exaggerating the importance of your present feelings. What reality is there in them after all? the passing admiration which every pretty woman inspires, the irritation of self-love developed by rivalry, the eagerness of pursuit rendered more eager by obstacles, the wish to drive Dornier from the field, influence your perseverance more than you think. Ah, how much less charming would my niece appear to you, if her hand was to be obtained without difficulty! I love Henriette very much, but she is not the intelligent or sensitive woman, capable of comprehending your loftiest thoughts, as well as of sympathising with your most fugitive emotions; one in fact worthy to inspire your efforts and, perhaps, share them. You have doubtlessly dreamed of such a woman; why should you not find her? She is in existence, doubt it not, but she must be sought and devined."

No doubt now remained on Moréal's mind of the elderly lady's intention. He was afraid of openly rejecting the happiness she intended to confer on him, and unwilling to act the dullard by not seeming to comprehend her meaning; and so he appeared to be struck with the justice of her views, and assuming an air of reverie and indecision,

"I will not deny, Madame," said he, after a moment's pause, "that you possess in a rare degree the secret of heart-reading. You have just decomposed a sentiment which has hitherto appeared to me very simple, with a certainty of analysis which fills me with surprise, I might say dismay. I am obliged to confess that in that obstinate pursuit which you so justly blame, there enters not a little of antipathy to Dornier, and resentment to your brother."

"Can there be any doubt of it whatever?" answered Mme. de Pontailly, whose countenance was now radiant. "The ancients recognised only four elements, while modern science already reckons up fifty-six (This was in 1834). Are the passions more difficult of analysis than material substances? by no means; but the exact analysis of these passions is the object of a science yet to be created, and which may be named Moral Chemistry. Fourier seems to have foreseen it in his ingenious sketches of the Cabalist and the Butterfly."

Carried away by the second nature of a Femme Savante, the Marquise was about to introduce a dissertation fitted to exhibit the extent of her knowledge, but she perceived in time that a scientific display would be out of place where a sweeter subject should be the order of the day.

So they separate, with a conviction on her part that Moréal's heart is in a very satisfactory state of transition. In an interview with Henriette, he convinces her against her will, of the ill feeling of her aunt, and is rash enough to propose an elopement, a proceeding in still worse odor on the continent than with us. The lady, though deprived of her mother at an early age, and rather neglected by her political father, has strong religious principles, and will not take the rash step. In an ensuing interview the Marquis strictly forbids any hostile rencontre between Moréal and the others. Prosper readily complies, and Dornier and Moréal do so for fear of the uncle's resentment. When Dornier leaves the room the uncle takes notice that Prosper's zeal for his friend seems several degrees cooler than usual.

"Ah, I believed him to be gold, and find him to be only lead or at best, inferior copper: listen to my grievance, and you shall hear the cause. Though a prisoner, I did not chose to renounce my rights as a citizen. At the police-station we discussed politics, and in a very superior style. There was among others a well dressed, fat man, convicted, I believe, of issuing base coin, who held forth in a wonderful manner: you would have thought him a member of the Constituent Assembly. I held an interesting conversation with him." "With a coiner," said the Marquis. "Parbleu, except Dornier and myself, he was the best informed man at the dépôt. So we talked—politics be it understood—and a very important question was raised, and a circle of interested hearers gathered round. My man was a republican; I flatter myself as being another; and setting to work, we demolished bit by bit the bastard system by which we are governed. We obtained a merited success; I will say for myself that I had moments of vigor and inspiration of which my father might well be jealous.

"So far all was as it should be. Finding myself some minutes later behind Dornier who was conversing with a hypocritical looking fellow; 'This young man,' said he, 'who held forth so well, seems a friend of yours: is it not so? You have been arrested together, and your opinions are the same.' 'My friend!' said Dornier, 'I scarcely know him, and am far from sharing his exaggerated notions,' and that was the reply of the patriotic Dornier."

"Perhaps he feared a spy in his questioner," said Moréal. "That is the excuse he afterwards made to me. If you could believe him, the coiner, that eloquent tribune was only a mouchard in disguise, what they call in their argot, a sheep employed to set the prisoners a talking." "Very possibly it was so," said the Marquis.

As Prosper's quarrel with Moréal merely arose out of his friendship for Dornier, he now lavishes his favor on the accepted lover, and so pleases the uncle that he offers him his favorite horse, Leporello, which Prosper insists on calling Tribonien on legal grounds. He also offers a cabriolet, which is refused as looking too like a bribe, but he condescends to accept a present of a tilbury.

Chevassu Pere having recovered his useful instrument, is now in a good way to repair the little breaches made between himself and colleagues. The principals are assembled with him at a political tea; and grave discussions as to the best means of arranging and directing their tactics are going on, when Prosper takes the assembly by storm. He had not shaved since his incarceration, and his uncle's Johannisberg had made his cheeks a lively red: his sparkling eyes in addition would have recommended the ensemble to the painter of a Bacchanal, but the whole thing was unsuited to the gravity of the present conclave.

"In recognising his son the Deputy of the North contracted his heavy brows, while his colleagues curiously scanned the unparliamentary appearance of the new comer. "Messieurs, I beg to present my son," said at last M. Chevassu. "Fresh from the cachots of the present order of things," added Prosper. "Ah, this is the roysterer who was arrested in the émeute of Wednesday," said a deputy to his neighbour, "he has the air of a genuine sacripant."

Without letting himself be disturbed by the angry looks of his father, he advanced to the table, secured a cup of tea and a muffin, and took his place in the middle of the astonished members who were conversing near the fire-place. "Messeurs," said he, "I am honored by finding myself in your company, especially as I have a petition to confide to your care for presentation." "Prosper," said his father, "think to whom you are speaking." "As we are in your house, father, they can be nothing but honorable citizens, enemies of arbitrary rule, and defenders of the rights of all." "You wish to present a petition," said a man with a truculent expression, "and for what purpose?" "To draw attention to illegal detentions: victim in my own person to that abuse, I desire to fasten the bell on the neck of ministerial despotism." "What have you to complain of? You made a disturbance on the Boulevard, and you were arrested; nothing juster; you might have remained at home." "Nothing juster!" cried Prosper, his cheeks assuming a redder tinge, "then I suppose it is forbidden to take a walk on the Boulevards after dinner for health's sake. I must also suppose that a band of assassins have leave to knock on the head, an honest citizen to whom walking is prescribed by his physician." "He is mad," said one of the deputies to another in a low tone. "And Brutus was treated like a madman," said the student with an air of contempt. "Be silent, Prosper. Messieurs, I request your indulgence; a little vivacity is excusable in a young man who feels himself a victim of an arbitrary act." "No excuses, father: after all, the chamber of deputies is only a small fraction of the country; and if its members slumber in a culpable apathy, there are patriotic hearts outside its walls who watch." Now arose murmurs. "This is becoming scandalous." "An insult to the chamber." "Such a diatribe is intolerable." "Prosper, Prosper," said his father, feeling himself on burning coals. All this time Prosper was composedly sipping his tea, and looking with pity on the men of straitened intelligence round him. "Messieurs," then said he with a tone of persiflage, "I demand to be heard in opposition to the call to order; agreeably to the usages of the house it cannot be refused."

This parody redoubled the discontent of the members of the chamber. "I thought we were invited here to discuss grave interests, and not to listen to the pasquinades of a scholar." "I am no more a scholar than you a master. . . . I am conscious of the fault of being young; it is unpardonable; but the day will come, when the new generation will be let free from leading strings. Yes, that day will come," said he enthusiastically: "I attest the memory of the men of '93' and the glorious souvenirs of the republic."

A covey of partridges surprised by the report of a gun could not be more terrified than our grave councillors when they heard that dreadful projectile the republic, whistle at their ears. Those who were standing, looked for their hats, the sitters arose, and all were making for the door in a moment. "Catch me taking tea here again." "To make us assist at the Apotheosis of Robespierre!" "A regular snare." While the poor father was striving to undo the mischief, he was thus addressed by the rough member. "Monsieur Chevassu, when a man aspires to be a political leader, he should let it be seen that he is master in his own family. I make no pretension to direct my colleagues; but let me see one of my four sons dare to open his mouth before me without leave! My receipt is at your service; I will not say as much for my credit at the chamber."

Omitting the little amenities of conversation that occurred between M. Chevassu and his marplot son, we pass to the agreeable information given to the elder gentleman by Dornier concerning Moreál's ready access to the Hotel Pontailly. He hurries to his sister, and despite his awe of that learned lady, he modestly insists on withdrawing his daughter from her charge. Contrary to his expectations she yields with the best grace, and Henriette is conveyed at once to a boarding school on the border of the city. The good-natured uncle is in a fury, when on his return he finds that his niece has been carried off, and reads a lecture to his scientific and sentimental lady which Balzac himself might have studied with profit. She is aghast at finding her secret turnings, and doublings, and weaknesses, all nearly as evident to her husband as to her own self consciousness; but nothing is gained. He will not ask her directly for the address of the Pension, and returns to Prosper and Moréal to "make them uneasy."

He then starts Moréal on the trail, hinting that if his lover's instinct does not direct him, he is not worthy of success. Our hero enters a jeweller's shop, gets a small commission executed, and presents himself to the tender but obdurate aunt of his lady love. A sentimental dialogue ensues, and Madame is enraptured to see the change for the better in the fickle lover. He is striving with seeming remorse to reconcile past and present appearances, and looks with a sigh on a double ring on his finger, having unconsciously removed his glove a few seconds before. The lady's attention being drawn to the same white hand, she lays hold on the fingers to tell his fortune, and slides off the ring as her fee. He feebly resists, but she succeeds in opening it, and finding Toujours on the inside of one-half, and an P. and a H. interlaced meeting that word on the same portion of the other. She makes some very moral remarks on the impropriety of his having obliged her niece to give him a keepsake of the kind; he depends himself and his forsaken lady in a very ineffective fashion; Minerva will not restore the ring, and brings the conference to a close.

The faithless swain hires a cabriolet, and waits perdue till he sees Madame's chariot coming out through the porte cochère, and then tells Automedon to keep it in sight, as he values his head or the expected bribe.

The virtuous aunt enters the gates of the pension in due time and place, and the lover hires at once a little house which fortunately overlooks the recreation ground. He soon sees aunt and niece coming towards a seat in the shade, but is too far to catch any part of the conversation.

The elderly lady exacts the pitying relative, reproaches the inconstancy of mankind, recommends the younger to forget her fickle admirer, and finally presenting the ring, asks if she recognises it. Henriette looks at the ornament with simple wonder, and denies all knowledge of it; her justly offended aunt requests her to open it, which she does, and then breaks out into raptures on seeing the interlaced initials and motto.

The surprised aunt is thunderstruck and asks her if that ring had not been given by her to Moréal: she very naïvely answers that she had never given him anything but her heart, which she hoped he was no way desirous of returning to her; and thanks her earnestly for the kind part she had acted in bringing her that proof of her lover's constancy. Mme. de Pontailly bursts into a fury on finding herself made a tool and laughing-stock, and insists on the ring being returned: she even seizes on Henriette's hand to dispoil it of its newly acquired treasure, but for neither wile nor force will she return it. Further, she is strengthened in her joy and resolution by a momentary apparition of Moréal at the window of the hired house.

Henriette is then removed to the neighbourhood of St. Denis, and Dornier having bribed the coachman, is carrying her off to a convenient house in the forest to submit her to a forced marriage; but the honest whip has previously turned traitor, and given a clue to Prosper and the uncle. Master Dornier gets a cut of a lash across his cheek, and is obliged to decamp, and comfort himself with the £5000 got from the Serious Man and the susceptible Madame de Pontailly to establish the newspaper. Henriette goes for refuge to another Pension, where she is looked after by her uncle, till her father, first properly terrified by the notion of her being carried off by Dornier or having eloped with Moréal, is well pleased to give her hand to that obnoxious nobleman. So, contrary to the general plan of French stories, we end with a marriage likely to prove happy.

On looking through the work, we find many other passages replete with pungent wit, and distinguished by vigorous handling, which we would gladly present to our readers if space allowed. Novel readers too lazy to keep up their knowledge of French, may consult three series of stories translated under the eye of Mrs. Gore, several years since, the greater number being from the pen of our author. Some of them are of a disagreeable character; but it is probable that in these he was influenced more by the prevalent taste than by his own inclination. He is thoroughly master of the expression of deep passion, without falling into the ferocity of Soulié or Sue. He draws the female portrait with truth, as well as a male critic can judge, but he never, like Balzac or Gulliver, delights to look on false locks taken off the bald scalp, or inspect soiled stockings. The plots of his tales are carefully constructed, and he never lets a suspicion of the improbable come near his reader. There are no extravagances a la Monte Cristo, nor protracted surgical operations, mental or physical, nor diabolical tortures, as with Sue. Taking the general character of the fictions of his day into account, we are more disposed to feel grateful for the healthy, vigorously told tales he has left, than to find fault with the few that offend good taste and Christian morality.

ART. III.—CHARLES MACKAY AND THOMAS IRWIN.

1. The Lump of Gold, and other Poems. By Charles Mackay. London : G. Routledge and Co., Farringdon-st. 1856.
2. Versicles. By Thomas Irwin. "Celtic Union." Dublin : W. M. Hennessy, Crow-st. 1856.

GOOD TASTE and SOUND JUDGMENT are such qualities of the "rara avis" order among British Poets of the present generation, that, like everything else difficult to be found, we hail their appearance with no ordinary satisfaction ; and, while we treasure them as they deserve, we feel bound to make no secret of their discovery, but to render it as widely known as possible. This is made an imperative obligation upon us for more reasons than one ; but our principal object in endeavouring to extend the knowledge of the beauties of those Poets we have selected for review should be, and is, that readers of poetry may have an opportunity given them of distinguishing what is really beautiful and true, from what is diametrically the reverse, and that those who are about writing poetry may be afforded examples which they would do well to study with a view to imitation. Having partially recovered from the horror experienced on receiving the information that Bailey's "Mystic" has actually appeared in a second edition, we feel, if possible, a stronger determination to continue in raising our humble voice in solemn warning to, we fear, that considerable class who are induced to read with seeming pleasure such works as those of Bailey, and to assure them that they will, sooner or later, have reason to regret the infatuation under which they laboured when they cultivated such acquaintances. Abstracting altogether from the numerous deficiencies and positive vices of the most remarkable of our Poets, they having formed themes for our previous dissertations, we come to the consideration of a question deserving of some reflection; and we fearlessly put it to the good sense of our readers, whether any respectable amount of matter, manifesting dignity in subject, wide creative power, and expressive strength, at all worthy of being placed side by side with the classic monuments which belong to the English language, has appeared in these countries within these last few years? Such platforms as have been generally selected whereon to base the structures which were, we suppose, intended to,

would account in themselves for the rickety nature of the buildings, and prepare the most unpractised eye for beholding their speedy demolition. It would be worse than folly to suppose that subjects devoid of interest in themselves, and incapable, from their unenviable peculiarity of admitting in their treatment the inoculation or engraftment of anything containing the germ of permanent interest and excellence, could possibly enable even great intellects to acquire enduring fame while employed in their development. If former Poets had unfortunately exhausted every congenial idea, had gleaned every grain in the poetical harvest fields, had collected every waif which lay scattered on the Ocean of Imagination, we might then forgive the necessitated wanderings of our men of genius, though we could not avoid deploring the circumstances that occasioned them; but such is not the case, as every reflective mind must obviously conclude. The earth is as beautiful to-day as it was in the days of Homer; as full of everything to charm the eye and delight the soul as it was centuries ago, and the legions of Poets who have sung its praise in all its regions have been merely what Newton described himself, “like to those who gather shells on the sea shore,” where generations of the human race yet to exist may come and gather more, and still leave myriads to be collected by those who will people the earth when they are gone. It would have been like an imputation upon the power of God to suppose that such a sublime creation of his as this our earth, with all the glorious properties it contains, both animate and inanimate, could cease to have any new attraction worthy of the Poet's pen after the lapse of a few centuries, and that we must fain have recourse to the analytic dissection of the most worthless attributes of the human mind if we desire fitting subjects for our inspiration. We trust such notions are not indicative of the gradual degeneracy of Man; they are certainly not of that character from which reasonable hopefulness in the progress of humanity are to be derived.

In the last number of THE IRISH QUARTERLY we have commented at some length, and, we believe, with no sparing hand, upon the alarming errors which our most eminent Poets have lately exhibited; and it is with the most sincere pleasure we now find ourselves possessed of an opportunity, in embracing which we may be enabled to demonstrate that there are yet men, both here and in the sister country, who have not abandoned the bright path in which all our bards have trod who have left names behind them; who have not, as yet, bartered for the senseless theories of the Spirit Rapper, the noble enthusiasm and sublime reflection of the Poet. Charles Mackay, long known to the literary world as the author of various poems of considerable merit, such as "Egeria," "Legends of the Isles," "The Salamandrine," &c. &c., has some time since presented us with a new work, namely, "The Lump of Gold and other Poems:" we have selected it for present notice, and we trust that our readers will have no reason to regret our choice; for though there is nothing very dazzling or wonderful in its pages, they contain far more than a sufficiency of desirable matter to render them an agreeable treat to every reader in the three kingdoms. Charles Mackay is a graceful Poet; without possessing an imagination of the highest order, he still commands enough to enable him to furnish his tales with no inconsiderable amount of interest; he has a good ear for musical cadences, almost invariably employs appropriate metres, and his diction is flexible and copious. But his most prominent and most admirable quality is his manly vigor; it is this which gives life to everything he writes; which leavens all his poetry with its animating properties, and stamps upon it the impress of originality.

It seems to us a matter to be regretted that Mackay has not written more on the late war; he is just the poet fit to continue what Dibdin and Campbell commenced; he is as patriotic as either, almost as pithy and as spirited, and he manifests a close resemblance to them in that happy power of calling up before the mind vividly, our dearest associations, and our most treasured remembrances of glory; reminding us by stirring allusion, brief, but luminous, and suggestive, of the heroism of our ancestors, and the greatness of their exploits. It is indeed surprising that an author of such vigorous lyric power in the construction of war ballads, would not feel impelled by an irresistible impulse to follow that course which Nature seems to have worked out for him; but whether he intends to devote himself to the creation of a collection of war songs, or not, we deem it right to assure him that it is our humble opinion, that there is no living poet at present in these countries more suited than he is for undertaking such a task. Mackay is generally fresh and pleasant, whatever be his theme; he is neither ponderous, sanctimonious, nor mystical, and the light of a clear intellect shines upon his pages with a steady lustre. Occasionally the pinions of his Muse come too near the earth, and get somewhat soiled by the unhallowed contact with our lowly sphere. Of this carelessness our author must beware; he must hold in mind, that we are, after all, but poor weak mortals, and that a tendency to closed eyelids, and temporary oblivion as to the actual state of external objects, is often unfortunately one of those traits by which we are characterized. Lavish ornament is the fault of some, poverty of diction is now and then the great mistake of Mackay. But it is not alone in his language that this is apparent; the matter sometimes is tame and prosaic, and wears the appearance of dullness. Like an old woman's tale, there is that introduced for which no adequate reason is apparent, and the reader is annoyed by being obliged to tread the avenues of circumlocution, which though easily distinguishable, are at times more disagreeable than wandering through a Cretan labyrinth. These latter commentaries may not belong to those of an agreeable order, but as we make it a rule to express our candid opinion on all literary matters, their insertion is unavoidable, and we shall now cheerfully proceed to a more pleasing task, which is to illustrate the poetical attributes of Mackay by some selected passages.

"The Lump of Gold," is a tale for which we must feel ourselves indebted to the rather unpoetical mania which seized the people of these countries some years since. A young man who has married for love, hearing like those around him of the golden harvests which were to be reaped in Transatlantic realms, becomes suddenly fascinated with the idea of seeking his fortune among the mines of Australia, and is buoyed up with the hope of returning at no distant day, a millionaire, to lay at the feet of his beloved, the wreath which is to place her on a level with an Empress. In the prosecution of his undertaking he sails to Australia in company with a friend, in whom he places the most faithful reliance. Arrived upon the arena where their energies are to have full scope, the friends separate, each to follow out the same object. One auspicious morning our hero discovers a small speck of gold barely visible above the earth; he digs round it, and to his unbounded joy, it assumes a size not less than the body of a human being. His delight, however, is quickly replaced by a feeling of an opposite nature; he finds all his efforts to raise it unavailing, and he becomes fearful lest some other eye may behold the treasure, whose existence he would preserve an inviolable secret. As he stands gazing upon his idol, in a mingled state of delight and terror, trembling at each leaf that stirs, and every bird that chirrup, imagining them to proclaim the advent of a human presence, the sounds of mocking laughter smite his ears, and almost paralyze his frame. He looks round, and lo! standing before him he beholds the form of the friend who had accompanied him from England, and sees the triumphant smile with which he proclaims the knowledge, of which the other so bitterly envied him the possession. His friend asks him to share the gold, which caps the climax of his rage, and taking up his mallet, he fells his fellow traveller to the earth, and leaves him there senseless and bleeding. Repentance comes too late, he is haunted with a perpetual vision of a murdered man, and in his agony flies the country, and returns to England. Even there the form follows him, and he finds no rest. In his wanderings one Sabbath day, he enters a church, while the clergyman is preaching, whom he recognizes as his father-in-law, and near him beholds his beloved wife. The remembrance of his former happiness overpowers him, he roams away into the forests to hide his grief, and entering the habitation of one of the neighbours in the evening, in a state verging on madness, a clue to his identity is obtained in his continual calls for "Parson Vale." The story soon concludes; he relates the tale to his wife, learns that his friend, of whom he had considered himself the murderer, is alive, well, and living in England, and scarcely has the joyful fact been communicated to him, when the man himself makes his appearance, who, when they have cordially joined hands, announces to the hero, that with his permission he will be enabled to bring over the gold from Australia, when it can be divided between them.

A soliloquy of the spirit-haunted wretch in the streets of London, and at midnight, forms the commencement of the Poem; he is then represented as wandering along, agonized and despairing, so much so that even the miserable outcasts that stalk the streets in that dreary hour, find matter for observation in the unexampled evidences of grief which are marked upon his features.

Under the doorways,
Screened from the weather,
Desolate women stood Crouching together;
They, as he passed them,
Wondered, and gazed;—
Said one to the other,
"He raves, he is crazed!—
Something has troubled him,—
Hark how he moans!
But why should we pity him
Here on the stones?
And yet who can help it?
Do you—if you can;—
I'd trample on Sorrow
If I were a man.
Men have no misery
Equal to ours!"
He saw not—he heard not—
Poor way-trodden flowers,
Your pity escaped him!
His world was within,—
A world—or a chaos—
Of anguish and sin.
The rain and the tempest
Were cool to his cheek,
Balm to his throbbing brow,— Hark! did he speak?
"Madness broods over me!
Kind-hearted Death—
Canst thou not shelter me?
Vain is my breath!
Take it and welcome—
And low let me lie;
Low in the quiet grave;
Deep in the doleful wave;

Wearied of living,
Unworthy to die."

Down came the drenching rain,
Bubbling and swelling—
Fierce blew the gusty wind,
Roaring and yelling.
The senate was silent,
Its orators fled,
The ball-room was empty,
Its roses were dead.
Listless or half awake
Through the dull town,
Fashion rode homewards
In ermine and down;—
Fashion and Beauty
All jaded and wan;
Fast through the tempest
The steeds gallop'd on.
Fire from their clanging hoofs
Heavily shod
'Mid the black rain pools
Flashed where they trod.
Indolent Fashion,
Wearied and warm,
Saw from its chariot
That desolate form,
Beating its rapid way
Deaf to the storm:
"Mad!" said the Countess,
"Of drink!" said the Earl;—
"Or love!" said his daughter fair—
Twisting her flaxen hair
Back into curl.

Onwards he travels through the murky night; the morning comes, and with it his memory of happier days; back flows the tide of his recollection.

Back to his moonlights,
His yearnings and sighs,
When the best heaven he sought
Lay in a maiden's thought,
Or her blue eyes ;
Back to the darkness
Clouding his morn ;

Darkness and discord,
And longings forlorn,
Errors and frailties
And sufferings keen,
With flashes of gladness
And glory between.

Here is a picture of his bride, simple, touching, and brimful of nature.

Sweet Lillian Vale ! if some denied
The splendours of her face,
Not one denied her perfect charm
Of gentleness and grace.
No dawning beauty fired her eyes,
But on her brow serene,
Enthroned upon that ivory seat,
Sat Goodness like a queen.

The quiet ripple of her smile
Revealed the peaceful mind,

The mellow moonlight of her eyes
Her sympathies refined ;
And when she spoke, the audible charm
Was Beauty for the blind.
Her gentle heart was wooed and won,
But he whose name she bore,
Adventurous for the sake of wealth
Had sought the Australian shore ;
And delved the mines of Ballarat
For undiscovered ore.

The attention of the congregation to the words of their pastor, on the day when the unhappy wanderer makes his appearance amongst them is narrated to perfection.

The stormy blast of breath was hushed,—
Like the ripple of a brook,
When the sudden frost comes flashing down
And fixes it with a look :—
So fast the silence as he spoke,
You might have heard the grass
Buckle and wave to the fiftful winds,
And the bee, in haste to pass,
Sounding a tramp like a martial call
On a chorus of brass.

You might have heard the sparrow cheep
Mid the yew-berries juicy red,
And the long rank nettles singing a dirge
Over the nameless dead,
Where they lay as calmly as the 'squire
With the 'scentuous o'er his head—
Calmly, calmly, pauper and 'squire,
Each in his narrow bed !

What would not Teniers, or Wilkie give for a peep at the following scene ?

Twos Monday morn at Micklethorpe,
And all its little world
Was up and stirring—out or in,
The mill resumed its click and din,
And the mill-wheel spun and swirl'd,
And the mill-stream danced in the morning light,
And all its eddies curl'd.

The mealy miller sniffed the breeze,
And boded pleasant weather ;
The sturdy blacksmith bared his arm,

And donned his apron leather ;
While the jangling bells of the waggons team
They all kept time together.

The hostler whistled a peaching tune ;
And the landlord of the " Crown,"
Ruddy and round, came out to greet
The coach from the distant town—
For the railway spared this nook of hills,
By leagues of park and down.

We will now produce a ballad, which for manly fire, noble independence of feeling, and unity has few superiors of modern date.

"Through great Earl Norman's acres wide,
A prosperous and a good land,
'Twill take you fifty miles to ride,
O'er grass and corn, and woodland.
His age is sixty-nine or near—

And I am scarce twenty-two, man,
And have but fifty pounds a-year—
Poor John Truman !
But would I change ? 'Tfaith ! not I !
Oh no, not I, says Truman.

"Earl Norman dwells in halls of state,
The grandest in the country;
Has forty cousins at his gate,
To feed upon his bounty.
But then he's deaf; the doctor's care—
While I in whispers woo, man,
And find my physic in the air—
Stout John Truman!
D'ye think I'd change for thrice his gold?
Oh no, not I, says Truman!

"Earl Norman boasts a garter'd knee—
A proof of royal graces;
I wear, by Nelly wrought for me,
A silken pair of braces.
He sports a star upon his breast,
And I a violet blue, man—
The gift of her who loves me best—
Proud John Truman!
I'd be myself—and not the Earl—
Oh that would I, says Truman."

Truly, versatility is a marvellous power; it resembles those omnipotent wands wielded by the Genii whom the Arabian Tales have surrounded with such mystic splendour, the magic of whose touch could transform the most uninteresting objects into forms of matchless wonder; like the expiring Dolphin, the number and beauty of its hues dazzle and confound us. Who could even momentarily suppose that the author of "John Truman," could handle the brush that painted thus so delicately.

And so it happened. "Lily," said her lord,
Ere passed the week, as, leaning on her arm,
He walked in sunshine through the leafy lanes,
And caught the odorous breezes on his cheeks—
"I feel new life; all joys that I had lost
Have come back greater, fairer than before;
To thee I owe them, and thy saintly sire.
When I am stronger, as I soon shall be,
I'll tell thee all the evil I have done
Since last I left thee for the golden land;
And all the good, I hope, full blessed with thee,
To do hereafter. Courage fails me yet—
But no, not courage;—only strength;—that comes

Daily and hourly. Meanwhile, the blue sky,
The wind that wantons 'mid the beechen boughs,
And sports amid thy hair, dear love, and mine;
The sunshine, and the wild flow'rs by the way,
The innocent carol of the heartsome birds,
Fill me with joy so deep, I dread to tell
How blest I am, lest telling it should mar.
And seem to invite the lurking fiends that watch
To strike the goblet from our thirsty lips,
And punish happiness that boasts too soon;—
As if they said—'since happiness can be
The fault is ours;—out with it from the world!'"

Mackay beautifully and ingeniously shews us the real object which Aubrey had in view in his travels to the gold mines; would that all who seek to amass wealth were influenced by notions a tithe as pure.

But Hope went with me; thou wert safe,
And I thought of a coming day,
When my Lily should bloom in a lordly bower,
The Queen of my life's glad May;
And built high palaces of cloud,
To gleam in the morning ray.
Palace and tower of changing form;—

Ever they fell and rose,
But ever amid their purple halls,
And corridors of snows,
I saw the gleam of thy spangled robes,
And thy feet like twinkling stars;
And heard thy voice, and saw thy face
Peering through golden bars.

Like the Albatross in Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," which ever accompanied the doomed ship, as it sailed under "The Copper Sky,"—like Poe's Raven, or like that creature of his own formation which perpetually haunted Frankenstein in despite of all his efforts to rid himself of his presence; so, the form of his victim incessantly appears before the eyes of the self constituting ted murderer, freezing him with horror, and filling him with despair.

A sudden frenzy raised my hair—
I knew not what I did;
But I thought the golden fiend arose
From the ground where it lay hid,
And chased me with convulsive steps
Over the land and sea,
Sitting beside me when I slept,
Eating its bread with me;
Mocking me with its yawning eyes,
Raising its yellow hand,
And driving, driving, driving me on,
Over the sea and land.

I fled—it followed; and though I knew
’Twas the creature of my brain,
Born of the agony of guilt,
I strove with it in vain:
Ever it followed, and ever I fled,
Over the land and sea,
Mocking me with its yellow hand,
Eating its bread with me;
And would have goaded me to the death,
Except for the love of thee.

A hideous likeness of myself,
A torture to behold;
Part was throbbing flesh and blood,
Part was senseless gold.
It stood between me and the sun—
It fouled the healthy air—
I looked to heaven, to fly its face,
And lo! the fiend was there.
I looked to earth, and at its feet
I saw a yawning pit;
It grinned, and pointed with its hand,
And said "Thy bones will fit."

And in the ship, as I hurried home,
I saw it in the shrouds;
It came and went from ship to wave,
From billow to the clouds;
It poisoned earth, it tainted heaven,
And dared, when sleep drew near,
To grasp me in its ghastly arms,
And whisper in my ear—
And say, "I've bought thee, body and soul;
Look in my face, and fear!"

"The Lump of Gold," is followed by a pretty piece, namely, "The Festival of St. Marc;" it contains an excellent description of the preparation of the inhabitants to celebrate the ceremony. The gay elastic metre almost conveys the idea of the whole city thronging forth in its holiday attire in honor of the festive day, beaming with joy, and light-hearted as a child. Our space will not permit us to insert more than the following:—

Be calm, oh, my spirit!
What though at the shrine
The prayers which they utter
May differ from thine:
A thought may unite them—
A thought unexpress'd,
Inspiring and lifting,
And filling the breast.
The form of the worship
Is rind on the bole,
The fruit of religion
Is Love in the soul.
Oh! selfish and wayward!
Oh! fancy run wild,
That will not and may not
Be trained like a child,
But wanders and frolics,
Like breeze on the hill,
To cloudland or daisy,

Wherever it will!
It sails with the music
To seas without bound;
It floats in the sunshine,
In darkness is drowned;
It climbs the high organ
Up mountains of sound;
Now hears the white pinions
That ruffle the air,
And voices angelic
That mingle in prayer;
Then earthwards descending,
Goes gathering flowers,
And welcomes the cuckoo
Returned to her bowers;
Then launched upon waters,
Goes down on the streams,
To regions ecstatic
Of slumber and dreams.

"The Column of Luxor," "The Old Magdalen at St. Stephen's," and "The Pageant in the Beech Tree Avenue," have many claims upon our attention, and will amply repay perusal; but did occasion permit we would prefer the introduction of, "The Lament of Cona, for the unpeopling of Scotland," to any of these. It unites the fire of Campbell with the pathos of Burns, and the suggestive, though gloomy imagery of Ossian; like the melancholy pipe of the curlew wheeling round the hills, or the sad sound of some distant waterfall tumbling in the glens, it awakens sorrowful associations and brings before us visions of Caledonia, in the days of her never-to-be-forgotten glory. We have selected the lines underneath as giving another apt instance of the nervous style and independent feeling of Mackay.

MAN TO MAN.

Stand up, man! stand!

God's over all.

Why do you cringe to me,

Why do you bend the knee,

And creep, and fawn, and crawl?

Stand up, man, stand!

If I thought our English land

Had no true-hearted poor,

To suffer—and endure—

And hold themselves erect,

In the light of their own respect,

I'd blush that I was English born,

And run away to the wilderness to free myself from scorn.

Stand up, man, stand!

God made us all!

The wine transcends the froth—

The living skin, the cloth—

Both rich and poor are small.

Stand up, man, stand!

Free heart, free tongue, free hand,

Firm foot upon the sod,

And eyes that fear but God,—

Whate'er your state or name,

Let these prefer your claim!

If there be anything you want—

Speak up! we may respect a churl, but we hate a sycophant.

Our author can be epigrammatic when he chooses, and exhibits a capacity to express plain facts in an impressive way, which is not an inconsiderable merit in a Poet. Sound moralists are difficult to be found at all times, but in our days it is not considered fashionable to moralize in verse on common subjects. We sincerely wish that, like many more of our modern fashions, this were also exploded, and that as speedily as possible. Good, plain truths cannot be too strongly impressed upon the mind, and evidently the most efficacious way to do so is by presenting them in a novel and agreeable form; the lines below are interesting as well as true.

SAFE PREDICTIONS.

Whene'er you hear a "patriot" spouting

Incessant gall,

Of vice assured, of virtue doubting,

In great or small;

Worth, talent, honesty denying,

Except in self;

Believe him not—he may be purchased;

His price is self.

Whene'er you see a widow weeping

In public sight,

And still in flagrant notice keeping

Her doleful plight;

Aye talking of her dear departed;

One truth is plain,

She will not languish broken-hearted,

But wed again.

Whene'er a rich man vows to lend you

All he has got,

Well knowing while he would bedread you,

You need him not;

You may be sure, should fate capricious

Deny you bread,

Your rich good friend, grown avaricious,

Will "cut you dead."

Whene'er a statesman, Whig or Tory,

Talks loud and long

Of serving country for the glory,

With yearning strong;

Needing no Sovereign to regard him;

Look in his face

And be convinced that to reward him

He wants a place.

Whene'er an author shows you meekly
 His last new book,
 And says all critics, daily, weekly,
 It faults o'erlook,
 And praise it far beyond its merits—
 On this decide,
 He ranks himself with choicest spirits,
 And buries with pride.

Whene'er a critic o'er his duties
 Still snarls and snaps;
 Affirms all faults, and speaks of beauties
 With cold "perhaps,"
 Hunts for small flaws with keenest pleasure
 From day to day;
 The man's a donkey; know his measure;
 And let him bray.

Whene'er a woman vows to love you
 In Fortune's spite;
 Makes protestations that would prove you
 Her soul's delight;
 Swears that no other love shall win her
 By passion stirred;
 Believe her not, the charming sinner
 Will break her word.

And if in this cold-hearted lyric
 I seem, in sooth,
 With voice ill-natured and satiric
 To doubt of Truth—
 Believe me not; I own her splendour
 Void of offence,—
 And merely struggle to defend her
 From false pretence.

Our last quotation from Mackay will be "The Battle of Inkermann," a piece of poetry which must be read with the most intense interest by all who remember the awful peril in which our troops were placed on that momentous morning, and by those whose unmeasured admiration has burst forth for those dauntless heroes who, by the force of their bravery alone, saved two armies from destruction, thus gaining we know not what besides for the maintenance of the liberties of Europe. With all our war songs and war waits, Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade" is the only poem on the subject of the war which we could think of mentioning in the same breath with "The Battle of Inkermann;" and even this much and deservedly praised lyric must yield to Mackay's poem in some particulars. In spirit and briskness they are about equal; in originality and conception Tennyson easily outdoes Mackay, but the latter is subjective while the former is merely abstract; the one reminds us of the trumpet sounding the charge, in tones that fill the heart with fire, and make the blood to tingle with a noble pleasure; the other pictures to us the general inciting his troops to battle, relating to them their former achievements, and placing in their hands the honor and safety of their country. However stirring and powerful Tennyson's may be, Mackay's is more natural, and its recital would be more likely to inspire troops, as well as to excite enthusiasm in a peaceful assembly.

INKERMANN.

Sebastopol lay shrouded
 In thick November gloom
 And through the midnight silence
 The guns had ceased to boom.
 The sentinel outworn
 In watching for the morn,

From Balaklava's heights
 Beheld the Russian lights
 In the close-beleagured fortress far adown;
 And heard a sound of bells,
 Wafted upwards through the dells,
 And a roar of mingling voices and of anthems from the town.

They prayed the God of Justice
To aid them in the wrong,
They consecrated Murder
With jubilee and song.
To the slain, the joys of Heaven—,
To the living, sin forgiven,—
Were the promises divine
That were passed along the line,
As they gathered in their myriads ere the dawn;
While their priests in full accord,
Chanted glory to the Lord,
And blessed the Russian banner and the sword for battle drawn.

Stealthily and darkly,
Amid the rain and sleet;
No trumpet-call resounding,
Nor drum's tempestuous beat—
But shadow-like, and slow,
Came the legions of the foe,
Moving dimly up the steep,
Where the British Camp asleep.
Lay unconscious of the danger lurking near,
And the soldier, breathing hard,
On the cold and sodden sward,
Dreamed of victory and glory, or of home and England dear.

Hark! Hear ye not a rumbling
On the misty morning air—
Like the rush of rising tempests
When they shake the forest bare?
The outposts on the hill
Hear it close, and closer still.
'Tis the tramp of iron heels,
'Tis the crash of cannon wheels,
And "to arms!" "to arms!" "to arms!"
is the cry.
"Tis the Russians on our flank!
Up, and arm each British rank!
And meet them, gallant Guardsmen, to conquer or to die."

Then rose the loud alarm
With a hurricane of sound,
And from short uneasy slumber
Sprang each hero from the ground;
Sprang each horseman to his steed,
Ready saddled for his need;
Sprang each soldier to his place,
With a stern, determined face;
While the rousing drum and bugle echoed far,
And the crack of rifles rung,
And the cannon found a tongue,
And down upon them bursting came the avalanche of war.

Through the cold and foggy darkness
Sped the rocket's fiery breath,
And the light of rapid volleys,
In a haze of Living Death;
But each English heart that day
Throbb'd impetuous for the fray,
And our hosts undaunted stood—
Beating back the raging flood.
That came pouring from the valley like a sea,
Casting havoc on the shore,
With a dull and sullen roar,—
The thunder-cloud above it, and the lightning flashing free.

On darkness grew the daylight,
'Mid the loud, incessant peal;
On the daylight followed noontide—
And they struggled steel to steel!
O ye gallant souls and true!
O ye great immortal few
On your banner, bright unfurl'd,
Shone the freedom of the world;
In your keeping lay the safety of the lands
Lay the splendour of our name;
Lay our glory and our fame;
And ye held and raised them all in your dauntless hearts and hands.

For a moment, and one only,
Seemed the Russians to prevail:
O ye brave eight thousand heroes!
Ye shall conquer! They shall fall!
They can face you—if they must—
But they fly your bayonet thrust,
And hark! the ringing cheer
That proclaims the French are near,
And is heard above the raging battle din!
Giving courage to the brave—
Striking terror to the slave,—
A signal and an omen of the victory to win

Break forth thou storm of battle,
With a new and wild uproar!
Beam out thou flag of England,
With thy sister tricolor:
For, fighting side by side,
One in spirit, heart allied—
In the cause of truth combined,
For the freedom of mankind—
France and England show the world what may be done;
And their star of glory burns
And the tide of battle turns,
And the beaten Russians fly, and the victory is won.

Thus fourteen thousand freemen,
Invincible in right,
Defeated seventy thousand,
In fierce unequal fight!
Thus Thermopylae of old
And its men of Titan mould
Were surpassed, at duty's call,
By the Briton and the Gaul; (May the splendour of their friendship never wane!)
By the men who fighting fell
With Cathcart and Lourmel, Or lived with placid Raglan, avengers of the slain.

And as long as France and England
Shall give birth to manlike men,
Their deeds shall be remembered
Should the battle burst again;
And to actions as sublime
Shall inspire each future time.
And when War's alarms shall cease,
And the nations live in peace,
Safe from Tyranny, its murder, and its ban,—
Let us tell with generous pride
How our heroes fought and died,
And saved a threatened world on the heights of Inkermann!

The "Versicles" of Thomas Irwin have come out under the auspices of the "Celtic Union," and that Society has every reason to be proud of the work which it has ushered into the world. It would be difficult to find, under such a modest title, a collection of Poems possessing the same intrinsic merit, and we anticipate no inconsiderable amount of fame for Mr. Irwin should he continue to favor us with the creations of his muse. As Irishmen, we must naturally feel proud of such valuable contributions to our literature as the "Versicles" contain, and it is encouraging to find that our Poets have, at last, discovered other sources of inspiration than those supplied by political agitation, and sectarian turmoil.

The poetry of Irwin is rich, soft, and musical; indeed, one of its greatest faults is its exuberance. A fancy teeming with beauties, and a diction occasionally oppressive from its ornamental tendency, are not sufficiently restrained; and nothing can elucidate with more satisfaction the evils which spring from such want of discipline than the fantastic extravaganzas which, under the name of poems, our modern poets have imposed upon the patience of the reading world. But we have no fear of the author of the "Versicles;" he seems to us to have evinced frequently no small amount of natural judgment, and we strongly surmise that we are not incorrect in attributing to him the possession of a mind, belonging to that elevated and capacious order, which, when it has sown its wild oats, will not permit any of its conceptions to be developed unless those which are clearly defined, and incapable of misconstruction as to the rationality of their object. There is one felicitous peculiarity in the Poetry of Irwin, and that is, that unintelligibility has no place there; in this the author has reason to congratulate himself upon his unfashionable habit, and we strongly advise him, even at the risk of being deemed an oddity, to maintain his almost isolated position with dignity and resolve; the time must come if the Muse continues to walk our portion of the earth, when the cap and bells of the buffoon must vanish, and then will come the triumph of those who preferred even an inglorious and monotonous obscurity, to the attainment of simulated laurels, and the questionable applause of those in whose eyes, the largest amount of incomprehensibility is deserving of the greatest adulation. There is much to remind us of Tennyson in Irwin's writings; the same luxurious fancy, dreamy thoughtfulness, passionate aspirations, and minute observation of natural objects, which characterize the Laureate, are scattered through the "Versicles." The rythmical character of both are similar, and also that easy grace, and freedom which lend such a charm to Poetry above all other arts. Such being the nature of his genius, we do not of course experience any difficulty in comprehending how it was, that Irwin has preferred to paint the glowing scenes of southern climes, rather than those of our cold and cloudy regions. Whatever the natural disposition of the Poet may be, always provided that it is a healthy one, to that should he cling with unswerving fidelity, and beyond all doubt, Irwin's seems to be for soft and happy scenes; for all that, the patriot breaks out here and there, and some choice specimens of tender pathos, may be taken from those poems of his for which Ireland afforded the inspiration. It were hard to expect men now to write much on Ireland; the spirit of the country has been worn out by the incessant agitations to which we have been for nearly a century a prey, and we know that nothing but prosperity, or the influence of intense political excitement, can kindle the spark of national enthusiasm in the breast of the bard. The causes in which originated the Ballad Poetry of Ireland, The Marsellaise in France, or the Song of the Sword in Germany, and the suddenness with which all compositions of the kind ceased to appear when those influences no longer existed, sufficiently attest the justice of this remark. Let us hope that the period is near at hand, when an advanced state of domestic prosperity will tempt our young men of talent to turn their thoughts to the enlargement of our literature; and place them in a position to expend that energy, that industry, and that intellect, which has hitherto been made the property of others, without either due acknowledgment, or reward, in gaining honor for themselves and in benefiting their country. Then will such men as Irwin find sufficient agreeable matter for the cultivation of their muse, in the merry groups of their native villages, in the rustic dances on the banks of their pleasant streams, or in the uncontrolled humour which bursts forth on every side, as they saunter through the happy harvest fields.

The volume opens with a poem called, "An Italian Holiday," and in it we are afforded abundant instances of the principal peculiarities of its author. It literally overflows with music, grace and richness; and if Italy be what we have always heard it is, the descriptions given of the land which possesses, "the fatal gift of beauty," are marvellously life-like.

We should wish much to give insertion to the whole of this beautiful composition; but since that cannot be done, we shall extract a portion of it, which gives sufficient evidence of his capabilities as a sketcher of foreign scenes, and of his warm admiration, even in Italy, of the grandeur and loveliness of "the poor old country."

Lo! southward, where sleep the faint cloudlets

Along the hills bronzed and brown,
Gazes hotly through heavy-showered sunlight

The roofs of the old tiled town :
Across the great corn-land's expanse
The shadows drift sultry and slow,
By the ebony-glossed carve of the river
And forest-skirt hazed in the glow.
While, far on the rim of the inland
The City's domes glitter on high,
And the long diary tracks of the roadways
Wind dimly away toward the sky.
Long roads where the dusty-leaved olive Pines drily through wide Summer noon,
And the spire of the black cypress dials
The slow silver hours of the moon ;
Where the vine in the midnights of Autumn,
As blackly the passing winds mourn,
Drops down the red leaflets that tinkle ;
And sadly the setting stars burn
With a wistful and weary brightness,
To pilgrims who cease on their way,
By the old marble Cross at the ruin,
To drink the well's waters, and pray ;
But now, through the festival shadows
That flick them through merry sunshine,
The gay Muleteer is advancing,
His heavy skins bursting with wine.
Now the Mountebank, glorious in motley,
Strolls on with his ass to the Fair ;
For the young he has bracelets and ballads,
For the aged folks physic and prayer ;
With a bosom as light as his pocket
He sings off the griefs of his soul,
While the bells of his beast in the sun light

Blend into the rich baronials.
All day to-and-fro from the orchards
The fruit-laden harvest girls ran,
All day through the gold of the corn-land
The sicklemen bend in the sun ;
All day the low wind of the Autumn
Blows dry through the blaze of the light,
Till snow-chilled through evening's stillness
It breathes from the Appennine's height.

Ah, well ! as we turn from the lattice
With eyes by the glory made blind,

A dream through our memory floating
Comes soft as the ocean-cooled wind :
A vision of temperate beauty
Far off, but for ever anigh,
Like Spring on the skirts of the Summer,
Is shaped on yon northern sky.
Rise, Realm of the heart and the fancy,
Old Land of the emerald sea !
Where the blue peaks of Wicklow are gleaming

Through soft rainy lights o'er the sea ;
Where drowse the dim Glendalough ruins
'Mid legends that live in their grey,
As fresh as the many-leaved ivy
That curtains their walls from decay ;
Where the rich palace spires of Killarney
Bend over the arbutus brakes,
And mirror their purples at sunset,
Along the sweet dreamland of lakes ;
Or northward, where sunbeam and shadow
Roll over strong Carlingford's crest,
The grey monarch shines from the ocean
One water of beauty and rest.

Sweet Bay, where we've wandered in Autumn,

By leafy old roads in the noon,
Or under the woods of Roostrevor
Sailed silently on with the moon ;
While the fisherman paused in his rowing,
And pointed beneath, as he told
Of the proud city merged in the waters
All scattered with armour and gold.
There oft have we seen from the casement,
When days of old festival came,
The bonfires in midsummer twilight
Drape Mourne's grey bastions in flame.
Oft watched as the dusk windy evenings
Fell blankly along the low bar,
The forms of the dim stormy shipping
Rock under some tempest-eyed star ;
While thunder-mists curled on the head-
land,

And luridly hung o'er the plain,
As the long-gathered heat of the inland
Swept seaward in lightning and rain.

A piece entitled, "A Group in Queen Anne's Time," gives a very excellent picture of the elaborate courtesy, and artificial bearing of the fashionables of that age; it is almost immediately followed by a beautiful and classical poem called, "An Antique Dream," which describes a group of Nymphs and Satyrs disporting in a valley. Nothing can surpass the rich colouring of every passage ; indeed we feel bound to express our disapproval of the lavish glitter, and profusion of purple words which are here expended. In the course of the poem, the following pretty song appears, and its voluptuous fancy is not inappropriate from the nature of the subject.

SATYR'S SONG.

Oh, 'tis sweet to be a god
Dancing on the dainty sod ;
Sleeping by the twisted vines,
Singing where the large moon shines.
Earth's a heaven to the spirits
Who can spy its rosy merits :
Passes day in joyous moving—
Passes night in feast and loving !
Follow us—follow us—
Where the fruited woods are bending—
Where the sunny stream is tending ;

Where the life-sounds, faint retreating,
Let us hear our bosoms' beating—
Follow us—follow us.
In a forest far away,
Peeps a fountain, plashing spray :
There, amid the trailers looping,
Fig, and gourd, and grape are drooping ;
There the honey-dews are shedding—
There the violet beds are spreading—
Follow us—follow us.
There are flowers to weave your tresses—
Flowers to answer love's sweet guesses :
Stars the scented sky enchanting,
Pulsing to our bosoms' panting—
Follow us—follow us.

"The Minstrel's Appointment" resembles "An Antique Dream" in almost everything ; "The Vine Song," which we now take from it, contains much spirit and wit, with an oriental warmth of imagination.

THE VINE SONG.

The grape is the only fruit of the skies :
'Tis suckled with dew in the springtime bright ;
Then, lapped in leaves, awhile it lies,
To learn their songs in the evening light.
Crimson sunsets lend it a hue—
Airs of summer, being and breath ;
Under the heaven's palace of blue
None that drink of it dream of death.
In each grape there dwells a sprite,
Born of fancy, pleasure, and light ;
Every bubble that sparks the bowl
Holds in its dome a starry soul.
Then would you think
Like a spirit, drink—
Drink, drink of the joyous wine,
Up to the brain,
Again and again,
Those wits of the stars shall mount and shine.
Lovers, shed your happiest smiles
Under the vine where'er you go.
The tendrils shoot like passion's wiles,
The blushes under their shadows glow.

Friends, who around the bright hearth
sing,
Pray by the vine where'er you roam.
That friendship, like his arms, may cling
For ever around the walls of home.

Poets, looking through fancy's glass
Round the world for beauty and light,
Wheresoever the day you pass,
Under some old vine rest at night.
Every bough shall guard their guest,
And bend to his lip their rosiest wine,
And every leaf that lulls to rest
Shall fill your spirits with dreams
divine.

Oh ! when this heart has ceased to blow,
Oh ! when its love has failed to burn,
Scatter it still in its wit-bright glow
Into some cup's funereal urn :
Songs and smiles that charmed and shone
Over its bright brim many a night,
Murmuring yet of pleasures gone,
Shall charm its rest with echo and light.

Among the poems immediately following this last, may be mentioned "The Little Bard" and "The Faerie's Child," both reflecting their author's principal beauties. From its inimitable harmony, and the buoyant elasticity of its rhythm, "The Serenaders of Sevilla," is well worthy of our attention.

SERENADERS OF SEVILLA.

Through balconied street and moonlit square—

By silent statued column—
We Serenaders sing through the air
Of the Spanish night
That, blue and bright,
Fringes the cork-tree leaves with light,
And silvers the fountain's volume.
The sky is streaming with Autumn stars,
And the moon on the sea is rounding
To the tinkling ehime of our wild guitars,
And the golden viol's sounding!

Haste, comrades, haste to the streamlet's side,
Where the orange grove gilds the water;
In a trellised casement o'er the tide,
With cheek of bloom,
In curtain'd gloom,
Alone in the hush of her moonlit room,
Rests Sevilla's rarest daughter!
Under the trees, through leaves and stars,
Let a pace with bosoms bounding,
To the tinkling tone of our quick guitars,
And the golden viol's sounding.

Lo! now from the heathy hill we see
The brown, sheep-drifted Prada;
Beneath the town, with its minstrelsy,

Fades in the blaze
Of the dizzying rays,
And the clear wind breathes o'er the moorland's haze
From the snows of the white Nevada:—
Sing, sing aloud to the sparkling stars;
With love our hearts are bounding,
And tenderly tinkle the wild guitars
To the sumptuous viol sounding.

See, how the moon, on the river space,
Under her casement lingers!
Oh! Love, could I watch her beauteous face,
Like the trusted light
Of the moon to-night,
As she draws aside her curtains alight
With tremulous almond fingers!
Shine through her chamber, moon and stars,
By roof and lattice rounding,
And tenderly tinkle, ye soft guitars,
'Mid the golden viol's sounding.

The blind withdraws to the small, white hand—
One look through the vine is gleaming;
'Tis gone—and lost in the night we stand—
But away, away,
Till dawn of day,
That smile, like Autumn's dusky ray,
Will light our spirit's dreaming:
Back to the town—the setting stars
Are dimly seaward rounding;
Silently hang our sad guitars,
And stilled is the viol's sounding.

Passing over some pieces of no extraordinary merit, we come to "The Forge," which for spirit, ingenuity, imitation in language of the sounds alluded to, and sustentation of interest, we have seldom seen equalled. It is well that Gretua Green is abolished, or we fear this Poem would not sensibly decrease the number of its votaries.

THE FORGE.

In the gloomy mountain's lap
Sleeps the village dark and quiet;
All have passed their labour-nap;
And the peasant, half awaking,
A blind yawning stretch is taking,
Ere he turns to rest again;
There is not a sound of riot,
Not a sound save that of pain,
Where some aged bones are aching;
Lo! the moon is in the wane—
Even the moon a drowse is taking.

By the blossomed sycamore,
Filled with bees when day is o'er it,
Stands the Forge, with smoky door;
Idle chimney, blackened shed—
All its merry din is dead;
Broken shaft and wheel disused
Scrow the unnumbered ground before it,
And the streamlet's voice is fused
Faintly with the cricket's chirrup,
As it tinkles clear and small
Round the glooming hearth and wall,
Hung with rusty shoe and stirrup.

Yes, the moon is in the wane:—
Hark! a sound of horses trampling
Down the road with might and main;
Through the slaty runnels crumbling,—
Comes a carriage, swinging, rumbling,
Round the steep quick corner turning;
Plunge the horses, puff'd and champing;
Like the eyes of weary ghosts,
The red lamps are dimly burning.
Now 'tis stopt,—and one springs down,
And cries unto the sleeping town—
"Ho! for a blacksmith—ho! awake!
Bring him that will his fortune make—
The best, the best your village boasts!"

Up springs the brawny blacksmith now,
And rubs his eyes, and brushes off
The iron'd sweat upon his brow,
Hurries his clothes and apron on,
And wakes his wife, and calls his son,
And opens the door to the night air,
And gives a husky cough;
Then hastens to the horses, standing
With hung heads, and hotly steaming,
And sees a dark eyed youth out-handing
A sweet maiden, light and beaming.

He strikes a lusty shoulder-blow :
 "Four shoes," he cries, "are quickly wanting:"

His face is in an eager glow,—
 "Take my purse and all that's in its Heart, if you in twenty minutes
 Fit us for the road." The smith
 Looks at the wearied horses panting
 Then at the clustering gold,
 And thinks, as he falls to his work,
 He dreams a mind-dream, rusty mark,
 That this is but some fairy myth—
 A tale to-morrow to be told.

But now the forge fire spirits alive
 To the old bellows, softly purring;
 In the red dot the irons dive;
 Brighter and broader it is glowing.
 Stronger and stronger swells the blowing;
 The bare armed men stand round and mutter

Lowly while the clinders stirring,—
 Ho! out it flames, mild sparkles dropping,
 Splitting, glittering, flying, hopping;
 Heavily now the hammers batter,
 All is a glaring din and clatter.

In the cottage, dimly lighted
 By the taper's drowsy glare,
 Stands the gentle girl benighted;
 By her side for ever bovers
 That dark youth, oh, best of lovers!
 Daring all that love will dare
 With an aspect firm and gay:
 Now the moon seems shining clearer—
 Hark! a sound seems swooning nearer
 From the heathy hills; the maid
 Lists with ear acute; and while
 One there, with brave, assuring smile,
 Smooths her forehead's chesnut braid,
 The danger softly dies away.

Now the forge is in a glow,
 Bellows roaring, irons ringing;
Three are made; and blow on blow
 Sets the patient anvil ringing;

"Another shoe—another, hark ye!"

Ra-ra, ra-ra, ra-ra-ra-rap
 Split the ruddy sheddings sparky,
 Ra-ra, ra-ra, ra-ra-rap!
 Strikes the quick and lifted hammer
 On the anvil, bright and worn;
 While amid the midnight there
 Beyond the ruddy streaming glare,
 With a yellow, misty glamour,
 Looks the moon upon the cern.

On the hill-road, moving nigher,
 Hurries something dimly shooting,
 Glances from two eyes of fire:
 "Haste! oh, haste!" they're working steady;
 Cries the blacksmith, "Now they're ready."
 Pats the pawing horses, testing
 On the ground their iron footing;
 Helps the lady, lightly resting
 On his black arm, up the carriage;
 Takes the gold with doubt and wonder;
 And as o'er the stones and gorges
 Tramp the hot pursuing horses,
 Cries with voice of jolly thunder,—
 "Trust me, they won't stop the marriage."

Scarce a minute's past away
 When, oh, magic scene, the village
 Lies asleep, all hushed and grey;
 But, hark! who throng again the street
 With roaring voices, brows of heat?
 Come they here the town to pillage?
 No. Across the road o'erthrown,
 Carriage creaks, and horses moan;
 "Blacksmith, ho!" the travellers cry;—
 Not a taper cheers the eye;
 While, a-top a distant hill
 Flushed with dawn-light's silent warning,
 Speed the lovers toward the morning
 With a rapid, right good-will;
 While, behind that father fretting,
 The pale night-sick moon is setting.

"Swift," is a touching narrative of the love of Vanessa for the great humorist, and of the melancholy catastrophe which that love produced.

Unfortunate indeed was poor Vanessa in conceiving an affection for a man, whom vanity could tempt to rob a weak woman's heart of its every happiness, and who has left no tangible proof upon record of bitter sorrow for his crime. The last interview between Vanessa and the Dean is sketched in a masterly way, and though we do not quite agree with the author as to the extent of the Doctor's grief for the loss of Stella, still it must be acknowledged that he has exhibited no ordinary amount of the most feeling pathos in the closing lines, in which Swift is represented as plunged in the deepest melancholy, while he contemplates the paper, containing a lock of Stella's hair, upon which he has inscribed the words,

"only a woman's hair." It is quite possible that Swift in writing thus, might be actuated by feelings of the most keen compunction, but to our mind one who acted as he did to both women, was not likely to indulge in any generous regret. The following is fanciful and pleasant :—

GRAPE SONG OF ITALY.

Poet Brothers, let's be happy—give me wine, give me wine!

Life cannot be all dolor,
Else 'twill blanch its heavenly colour,—

Let us leave the dusty highway, and recline
Where our cheek of melancholy

Shall be flushed with ruby fall

'Mid the jocund, mellow shadows of the vine—

Ha, ha!

'Mid the jocund, mellow shadows of the vine.

The star that we inhabit—let it shine, let it shine!

If the sun may light its day,

We through dark can cheer its way,

By the lustre of these ruby lamps of wine.

Dream the night through cup in hand,

While our barque and minstrel band
Surge along amid those autumn clouds divine—

Ha, ha!

Surge along amid the autumn clouds divine!

Fill my cup to overflowing with thy wine, with thy wine!

When last you pressed the grape

I could see the silver shape

Of the moon, through half this little chalice shine!

So: let's drink unto the days,

Rising full of Heaven's rays,

When man shall grow free, joyous, bright,
divine—

Ha, ha!

When man shall grow free, joyous, bright,
divine!

When Love shall speed his mandates from the brine to the brine,

And peace shall plenty bring,

Till the lands with laughter ring,

Far beyond the Guadalupe and the Rhine;

When Mind shall stamp the man

Who shall lead each nation's van,

And men shall know their Monarchs by
that sign—

Ha, ha, ha!

And men shall know their Monarchs by
that sign!

When the myriads of the nations shall combine, shall combine,

Not to struggle with the lords,

Or to wage the war of words,

But to seek the means to raise them and refine;

Then shall Art enrich the earth,

Then shall glow the poorest hearth

With the beauty drawn from picture, song,
and shrine—

Ha, ha, ha!

With the beauty drawn from picture, song,
and shrine.

What! thou'rt weary; weary waiting for that time, the bright time;

Well, if earth must linger so,

Here—a dream-cup ere we go!

Never yet while fancy's left us let us pine;

Hope, work, and love—a light

Soon will cheer the lands of night.

As the dawn is glowing o'er our cups of wine—

Ha, ha, ha!

As the dawn is glowing o'er our cups of wine!

"A May-day Revel," a pretty Irish fairy tale, was just the subject to give Irwin an opportunity of pouring forth the rich jewels contained in the sparkling casket of his fancy. The elfin king of Cloagh More, a mountain overhanging the bay of "sweet Rostrevor," is betrothed to the most beautiful sprite in the fairy realms of Carlingford; being asked upon what day she would wish the nuptials to take place, she answers eagerly, "the first of May," and the monarch, hardly able to express his approbation of her selection of May-day, immediately commands it to be proclaimed to all his subjects that the day of his marriage shall be, "A Joyous Saturnalia." The greater portion of the Poem is taken up in describing the manner in which the subjects of the fairy, the birds, and beasts, and insects, avail themselves of the indulgence granted them. The ensuing passage winds up the Poem, and is replete with minute and faithful sketches of evening scenes.

Now falls the hour of evening rest,
The fresh wind puffs the fisher's sails;
The bee is hived, the bird's a-nest,
The udder's spirt in foaming pails,
And twilight deepens past the bay,
'Till o'er the inland town afar,
'Mid flakes of cloud still rosed with day,
Sparks out some golden-cinctured star—
And strikes the river narrowing down,
With ruffled current as it flows,
By one old turret, lone and brown,
Sea-lapped and sentinelled by crows.
Now, 'mid the slopes of furrowed earth,
The peasant drives his wearied yoke;
Now from the crackling cottage heart
Mounts tranquilly the azure smoke;
Now, past the winding road anigh,
The drover guides his dusty sheep;
The lazy waggoner plods by,
Behind his slow horse, half asleep:
Now groups of rustic lad and lass
Beside the shadowy ferry throng ;

Now through the bright mid-stream they pass,
With oars that time some homely song ;
And beached at length above the sea,
Push homeward up each shadowy height,
While glimmers red and distantly
Their cottage window's welcome light ;
The farms are hushed ; beside their way
The dripping wheels of mountain mills
Stream in the leafy trickling ray ;
The bon-fires blaze along the hills ;
They hear the distant voices ring
In festal echoes of acclaim ;
They see the wild forms hurrying
In twilight dances round the flame ;
Till one by one each joyous sound
Dies off upon the lonely air ;
The red fires drowse along the ground,
The dances cease, the hills are bare ;
And as the sea-wind stirs the heath,
And silvery spring-tide floods the shores,
Nought save the moon on grey Omeath
Moves by the quiet cottage doors.

We cannot fail in finding cheerful thoughtfulness, graceful pleasantry, intellectual aspirations, and becoming independent feeling in the " Artists' Song."

VIVE LA BOHEME.

Ours is an Arab life, they say,
Sweet Fancy-friends, 'tis truth they tell,
Yet, somehow, can we find each day
A peaceful palm, and quiet well ;
Our wants are few where beauties shine,
And beauties shine o'er earth and sea ;
Let fate give others gold and wine,
But leave us Art and Liberty !
We speed each sorrow
Toward the morrow
Where the golden clouds have birth,
While, like the swallow,
Still we follow
Summer and freedom round the earth,

'Tis true, we smile at custom's form,
Art looks for truth in everything,
And birds that sing through sun and storm
Would lose, if caged, both voice and wing:
The bird that lives uncaged, unsought
(Our neighbour in the ivy tree,)
And sings his song each morn, is not More careless of the world than we ;
We may grow rich,
And win our niche,
And change our views, and change our mirth—
Till then we follow,
Like the swallow,
Fancy and freedom round the earth.

Our mansions, they are baseless yet,
The sunny fields our only pew,
A faithful dog our household pet,
Our " puble" but a friend or two ;
Yet poverty has many modes
Of doubling such sweet charms as come:
We've rambles o'er the pleasant roads,
We've moonlight songs returning home—
When we grow great
In carriage state
We yet may roll in gouty worth ;
Till then we follow,
Like the swallow,
Summer and sunshine round the earth.

Within the little chamber there
How many an hour we've won from fate!
Oh, glorious refuge ten feet square,
From all the mockeries of the great!
There rise our pictures like the dream
That soothes the poor man all the night;
Our systems, wonderful as steam,
Our strains, unknown as exquisite,
Some day divine
Abroad they'll shine—
'Till then we live in fortune's dearth,
And, like the swallow,
Follow, follow
Summer and fortune round the earth.

There oft our chorused voices roll—
 'Tis beer alone inspires our folk;
 There theories of Star and Soul
 Grow clear amid tobacco smoke.
 No watch have we, but o'er the town
 Time tolls the hour in crimson light;
 No princely company we own,
 'Tis Shakespeare only cheers the night;
     Our wit abounds,
     Each voice resounds,
 We yet may win a calmer hearth—
     Till then we follow,
     Like the swallow,
 Beauty and sunshine round the earth.

Yet have we something dearer, friends,
 Than hearts that pulsate fearlessly;
 Something diviner heaven sends,
 Like stars that light a lonely sea.
 Oh, we have hope for all who've flown!
 Oh, we have angels in the air,
 Beloved souls that, all unknown,

Still follow us from year to year—
     In mute despair,
     In silent prayers,
 We think o'er all who've blessed our hearth,
 And deem they follow,
     Like the poor swallow,
 All that they love around the earth.

Then let us dwell in such delight
 As heart and soul can give alone,
 And with wild fancy's charms to-night
 Revel, while time is yet our own;
 While yon rich autumn cloud unrolls,
 And fills with gold our casement nigh;
 While the great stars, like poet souls,
 Look in on Art and Liberty;
     Where nature beams
     We'll weave our dreams,
 Where folly struts we'll have our mirth,
 And, like the swallow,
 Follow, still follow,
 Freedom and Light around the earth.

The war is now over, and although it is trite to speak upon the subject, how few there are who have reflected much on the deluge of tears that has been shed, during its brief but mournful continuance! While the excitement continued, while the noise of cannon thundered in our ears, while the magic wires conveyed to us the news of victory or defeat, how little thought had we for widowed bosoms, and desolated hearths, and forlorn orphans! Well, after all, we are but human, and sorrow must be made our own case, before we can be got to understand its bitterness. The "Irish Mother's Dream," traces with touching fidelity the agonized suspense, and despairing woe of an Irish Mother, one of the many hundreds, should we not say thousands, of those whose heroic offspring have breathed their last before the walls of Sebastopol.

AN IRISH MOTHER'S DREAM.

One night, as the wind of the Winter blew loud,
 And snow swathed the earth, like a corpse in its shroud,
 An aged Mother mused in her dim cottage shed,
     O'er the young soldier-son of her heart far away,
     Where the cannon flames red o'er the low lying dead,
     And the desolate Camp bleakly spreads in the day.
 And near stood her daughter, with sad strained smile,
 And kind cheek of care, that long weeping had worn,
 As she whispered, "Now sleep, dearest Mother, awhile—
     God is good, and our Dermot will surely return."

The poor Mother turned on her pillow, and there
 Soon slept the kind sleep Heaven sheds on our care.
 Silence filled the dusk chamber—the low eazy hearth
     Sunk lower, and noiselessly lifted the snow
     O'er the white, spacious girth of the cold, solemn earth,
     Where the muffled moon fitfully glimmer'd below;
 But vanished the while are her visions of fear,
 And passed, for a space, is her sorrow and pain;
 For an angel has wafted her soul from its sphere,
 And in dreams she beholds her own Dermot again.

Dear joy, how she loves him! A long year has passed
 Since she kissed his pale forehead, and hung on his breast;
 She looks in his face—'tis the same, still the same—
 Still soft are those eyes as the dew on the sod:
 No thirst for the game of wild battle or flame
 Have lessened their love for her, thanks be to God!
 But away! they are speeding o'er mountain and moor—
 O'er city, and forest—o'er tempest and tide;
 But little she heeds of their terrors, be sure,
 While that son of her bosom seems still at her side.

Lo! at length they have passed the wild ocean, and stand
 On a summit that looks o'er a desolate land;
 Far off, the great fortresses loom o'er the spray,
 Anear, the black tents drift the slopes of the ground;
 And a sense of decay fills the solitude grey,
 For an army in ruins is scattered around.
 "And is it for this," said the poor dreaming soul,
 "My Dermot has wandered from home's blessed air?—
 Here Death fills the wind blowing keen from the Pole—
 Here the Pestilence strikes what the cannon may spare."

They passed through the streets of the tents lying still—
 They passed by the trenches that ridge the brown hill—
 They saw the pale faces that famine has worn;
 They pace where the wounded lie lonely and lost—
 Where the corse, cannon-torn, to its red bed was borne—
 Where the poor frozen sentinel died on his post.
 "Ah, why, Dermot, why did you cross the wide foam,
 To fortune, my child, in this land of the dead?
 Sure we'd plenty at home—there was better to come:
 Why, for this, did you leave me, acushla?" she said.

"I thought as you grew fond and brave by my side,
 No sorrow could cloud us—no fate could divide;
 I fancied the day when our home would grow bright,
 With the smile of some colleen I'd cherish for thee—
 When I'd sing through the night by the hearth's ruddy light,
 With your boy, my own Dermot, asleep on my knee;
 And when, circled round by a few happy friends,
 Old age drooped my head, after many a year,
 As I passed to my God, through the death that he sends,
 The kind Father would bless me, and you would be near."

Still close in the gloom seems he standing by her;
 But hark! 'tis the drum, and the camp is astir;
 And a sound fills the air, from the hill to the star,
 Like an earthquake, along the wild bastion it runs,
 While echoes afar roar the voice of the War,
 As it doubles its thunder from thousands of guns,
 And she wakes. In the gleam of the pale morning air
 One gives her a letter—soon, soon is it read;
 But a low piteous moan only speaks her despair—
 "Ah, Mother of God! my own Dermot is dead!"

The next in order is "The First Pyramid." Diodorus Siculus tells us that the pyramids were erected during the dynasty of a Scythian race, who having overrun Syria and Egypt, finally settled in Memphis and the neighbouring cities. The Poem, which is a long one, abounds in beautiful descriptions; an old man is represented as telling his youthful son, as they are both gazing upon the pyramid, the origin of its rise, which he declares to be owing to the death of the chieftain who conquered the country, and with whom he had marched hitherwards from Scythian realms, announcing that it was erected as a fitting mausoleum over the bones of the departed hero. The beautiful passage we subjoin is descriptive of the country of Egypt, as seen for the first time by the invading host.

"Around its marge a realm of plenty glowed,
With breadths of corn and regions rich with dew ;
While, to the south, a gloried City rose,
Deep harboured, and with many a marble round
Of citadel and turret, shrine and bower.
A space of splendour seemed it, a bright land
Of palaces and waters ; by its shores
A wide armada, many-masted, lay
Glooming the sea ; while inland stretching far,
Thick-fruited woods, with sultry tracts of spice,
Scented the sky up to the morning clouds.
Awhile, in wonder, gazed we on this scene,
Then pushing nearer to a shadowy steep,
That sentinelled the city, gazed below.
Broad through its streets a plenteous river flowed,
Fed with the rains of southern hills beyond,
And mirroring many a temple on its wave,
While conch-shaped barges ebony-ribbed with gold,
Came eared along the shining space beneath
The crimson floating of their gonfalons.
High o'er the roofs, just glittering in the morn,
A pillared shrine upon a steep arose,
White as some surging pile of Summer cloud,—
Levels of flashing steps ascending shone
Up to its spacious portal, swarmed with shapes
In many-coloured garbs, and glittering arms ;
While rolling outward from its doomed hall,
Filled with the dawn, a golden gong swung forth
Its globe of tone, widening in circles down
O'er hill and river and across the sea,
As though a Sun were sounding ; while afar,
Upon an azure-waved promontory,
The last of land that jutted oceanward,
An altar plumed with smoke arose, and priests
White-garbed around it in the sacred calm.

Our last extract shall be taken from the lively Poem, "China," descriptive of the habits and scenes, both urban and pastoral, of Chinese life ; in this last the author of the "Versicles" will be found faithful to those fascinating beauties which stud his every page.

Now rounds the western 'ing sun along
The hills where summer vapours curl
On Tchakiang, and strikes among Its mines of turquois, lakes of pearl.
Now from brown Tonquin's southern bowers,
Thick tasselled with the perfumed bean,
The tropic wind blows warm, and showers
The light o'er each veranda screen.
The peasant walks behind his team,
And slowly works the reaper brown
In rice fields skirting the blue stream,
From bridge to bridge, from town to town.
Gay groups of gleamers hurry home,
Their baskets piled with fragrant leaves ;
Or on the carts of harvest come,
High combed upon the golden sheaves,—
Mild sicklemen and girls a-row :

While soft the parting splendours fall
Upon each crescent pencill'd brow,
And eyes of glossy ebony small.
Now where yon blue pagoda's spires
Adown the hill their shadows fling,
The perfumes mist the altar fires,
The myriad bells of silver ring ;
And on the spacious river bright
The fishing bird is seen to dive,
And through the thymy air and light
The bee sails toward the garden hive ;
Till o'er the fretted temples brood
The sparkling orient stars, and soon
By many a stream and musky wood
Afflame with silver, floats the moon,
Though mighty azure ranges rolled,
Whence come from the Tartarean ice
The caravan with fur and gold,
The camel weighed with silk and tea.

We now bid farewell to Charles Mackay and Thomas Irwin, and in doing so, we take the liberty of wishing them God speed in their journey up—

“The steep, where Fame’s proud Temple shines afar.”

BOTH have their faults as well as their beauties, and strangely enough, one possesses in extravagant abundance a quality in which the other is often singularly deficient; in the one instance, the pruning shears must be used with no dainty fingers; in the other, the plants must be cultivated with care, well watered, and a warmer atmosphere induced. The essential properties of the poet belong to both, and with them it rests to use them in such a manner as may win for each an exalted rank among their tuneful brethern. What we have said as to the absence of mystification in Irwin, applies equally to Mackay, and it cannot be too often mentioned to the honor of these men, that when almost every poetical writer of the day, from Tennyson to the humblest poetaster, has been mumbling like the inmate of a mad-house, they have kept aloof from the “profanum vulgus,” and maintained inviolate, the dignity and majestic simplicity, which was bequeathed to them by the bards of a more inspired age. They have other claims upon our gratitude, and those are that they have evinced some deference to human sympathies and inclinations in the choice and treatment of their subjects; that they have succeeded in imparting instruction, as well as in giving pleasure; and above all, that they have been firm in their maintenance of truthful principles, cheerful hope, and sound morality. They are not indeed transcendental theorists, or the founders of chaotic systems, but they are the lucid expositors of those sublime realities, which are ever renewing and transforming, like the earth, their freshness and their beauty; and which like it possess at all times, new food for contemplation, new themes for wonder, new reasons to excite our love for him who has established them. They are not seekers after the philosopher’s stone, nor do they chameleon-like aspire ardently for the possession of those realms somewhere mid-way between earth and sky, where everything is subject to atmospheric influences, and where they may watch for ever the habits and customs of the stars; but on the contrary, their endeavour is to demonstrate how happily we may live in our own planet, and how, to use a homely but a golden saying, “we may go farther and fare worse." They seemingly prefer to unite more closely the bonds of universal love, to remove the fetters from our kindly impulses, and to scatter broadcast the seeds of a more generous confidence in each other, than to encourage scepticism in theological matters, openly promulgate pantheism, or insidiously endeavour to shake our faith in one another, and in God.

We have truly become very learned ! There is an immense amount of enlightenment in this nineteenth century ; nevertheless, we are no very sincere believers in the efficacious tendency of every phase of this learning, and of this enlightenment. We labor under "the atrocious crime of being a young man," and to us would not be applicable the proverb, "senes laudant antiqua ;" yet it is not at all so evident to us that there is more solid happiness in the world now than formerly. We do not sigh for Arcadian bliss, and the mellifluous sounds produced by shepherds' reeds ; but to our poor simple taste, men lived more wisely, and more pleasantly, before the remorseless chains of restraint flung their chilling links around us, checking the genial, healthy flow of social intercourse, and substituting pomp, prudery, and an artificial elegance, for natural grace and majesty, unaffected modesty, and the easy interchange of ideas. We shall soon become as stiff as mediæval painting, and will require all the assistance of our vaunted science to give us the use of our limbs again ; it is well for us, no doubt, that our locomotives form such a contrast to our languishing manners, or we know not in what it would all end. We fear the earth in its rotations would leave us behind it, and that we should roll down its sides, rather precipitately, into that "broad space," of which we have lately become such enthusiastic admirers. One thing appears to us quite clear, and that is that until we have unlearned much of our present so-called knowledge, we should not seek the acquisition of more ; we know a great deal upon matters which are neither calculated to improve our minds or to encrease our happiness, and utter obliviousness of such attainments would not be attended with the slightest disadvantage. We must endeavour to become more natural in an intellectual view, as well as in a social one, less guided by conventional rules, and more by kindly impulses ; more swayed by ideas which grow out of the consideration of humanity, than by those of an abstractedly mental order.

We must substitute practical philanthropy, for idle vapouring; acts coming from the heart, for words proceeding from the lips; candor for equivocation, and simplicity for affectation. If we can succeed in achieving this reformation, our literature will have "renewed its youth like the eagle," and will enter again into the possession of that freshness, that lucidity, and that vigor, which formerly adorned it. Our ambition must be truly great, if it aspires at outrivalling our predecessors in the sphere of poetry; but if such be the object of its aim, strict adherence to the rules which guided them is the sole method by which it can be attained. We can only hope and pray for the speedy arrival of such a desirable result, and should we be so fortunate as to behold its realization, no inconsiderable source of pleasure will be afforded to us in the fact, that in our humble way we have been among the very few, who have boldly and frequently held up to public reprehension, the fatal, and rapidly extending vices which disfigure the pages of our Poets of the present day.

ART. IV.—THE REV. CHARLES WOLFE.

A close investigation into the annals of literature, would, we believe, have the effect of shewing that many of the choicest productions in prose and verse, have emanated from authors, who, in their life-time, were scarcely known beyond the narrow circle of family relations, and personal friends. It is not, however, our intention to examine into the causes of that neglect, which so many writers have experienced, until death has rendered them famous; still less, to make any allusion to the now thread-bare topic of the "calamities of authors," they are familiar to everyone in the least acquainted with the histories of the literary worthies of modern days. The subject of the present memoir was a striking exemplification of our opening remark. His life, spent as it was in the quiet retirement of a student, and the unobtrusive discharge of his sacred functions, presents scarcely an incident of any interest for his biographer to recount; and were it not for the fame he has subsequently acquired, by the beauty of some of his poetical effusions, his brief career might—to use the language of Addison—“be comprised in those two circumstances, common to all mankind—that he was born upon one day, and died upon another.” But he deserves more than a mere passing notice, when in him we consider the poet who at an early age had produced one of the most beautiful odes in the English language, and whose talents promised to place him in the very front rank of living authors; and still more, when we revere in him the exemplary minister of religion, whose untimely death was, in great measure, caused by his zealous devotion to his sacred duties.

Charles Wolfe, the author of the well known ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore, was born in Dublin on the 14th of December 1791. He was the youngest son of Theobald Wolfe, Esq., a gentleman of the County of Kildare, who had married a daughter of a clergyman named Lombard. His father's family was one of respectability, and although it seems doubtful that it was in any way connected with that from which had sprung the illustrious hero of Quebec; Mr. Wolfe was certainly a near relation of Lord Kilwarden, whose tragical fate is so well known. Wolfe at an early age had the misfortune to lose his father, and soon after his death the family left Ireland, and resided for some years in England. When ten years old, the subject of this memoir was sent to a school in Bath, where, however, he remained but for a few months, as in consequence of the delicate state of his health, he was obliged to return home. His recovery seems to have been tardy, as we learn from his friend and biographer, Archdeacon Russell, that his education was interrupted for a year. When his health was sufficiently re-established to enable him to leave his home, he was sent to Salisbury, in which city he remained, under the tuition of Dr. Evans, until the year 1805, when he entered Hyde Abbey School at Winchester as a boarder. This school was then presided over by Mr. Richards, with whom Wolfe seems to have soon become a special favorite; indeed, from a very early age he appears to have displayed that sweetness of disposition and amiability of character for which he was always remarkable, and which justly endeared him to all who could boast of his friendship. With his mother he was deservedly an idol, and of his conduct towards her we have the following touching testimony from his sister:—

"He never received even a slight punishment or reprimand at any school to which he ever went; and in nearly twelve years that he was under my mother's care, I cannot recollect that he ever acted contrary to her wishes, or caused her a moment's pain, except parting with her when he went to school." At Winchester he soon became distinguished for great proficiency in classical knowledge, and displayed early powers of versification. "His classical attainments," observes one of his most intimate friends, John Sydney Taylor, "distinguished him when very young. The facility and elegance with which he wrote Latin verse excited admiration. With most boys it is a mechanical labour, and it is indeed absurd to make it a general practice at our schools. But the mind of Wolfe was keenly sensitive of the charms of the Augustan age of composition. He was such a master of Latin expression, and had so much of the spirit of the bard in him, that his thoughts shaped themselves with a grace and vigor like those of his native tongue into the language of the Roman Muse." Some specimens of his early essays in Latin verse are preserved, but although they do undeniably display a considerable facility of expression, and a more than ordinary degree of elegance, they do not appear to merit greater attention than is in general bestowed upon,—those most absurd of all scholastic exercises,—the classical effusions of juvenile scholars. Wolfe, however, displayed higher qualities than mere ability; and while his classical attainments caused him to be regarded as the pride of Winchester school, he was at the same time loved and respected by all his school-fellows, who always spoke of him in terms of the greatest affection. While under Mr. Richards his poetical talents also began to display themselves. Two of his earliest pieces are extant; one is a prize poem on the death of Abel, and was probably a Winchester exercise. This, though evidently the production of a youthful composer, contains some portions of considerable merit, and has one or two passages not deficient in beauty. Take for instance the following:—

"In purity and innocence array'd,
The perfect work of God was Abel made.
To him the fleecy charge his sire consigned:
An angel's figure with an angel's mind,
In him his father ev'ry blessing view'd,
And thought the joys of Paradise renew'd.
But stern and gloomy was the soul of Cain;
A brother's virtue was the source of pain;
Malice and hate their secret wounds impart,
And envy's vulture gnaws upon his heart:

With discontented hand he turn'd the soil,
 And haly grieving, murmur'd o'er his toll.
 Each with his offering to the Almighty came,
 Their altars raised, and fed the sacred flame.
 Scarce could the pitying Abel bear to bind
 A lamb, the picture of his Master's mind :
 Which to the pile with tender heart he drew,
 And wept, as he the bleating victim slew.
 Around, with fond regard the zephyr play'd,
 Nor dared disturb th' oblation Abel made.
 The gracious flames accepted, upward flew,
 The Lord received them,—for his heart was true.
 His first-reap'd fruits indignant Cain prepares,
 But vain his sacrifice and vain his prayers,
 For all were hollow : God and nature frown'd,
 The wind dispersed them, and the Lord disown'd ;
 He looks behind—what flames around him rise ?
 O hell ! 'tis Abel's, Abel's sacrifice !

The description of the death of Abel, with the horror and remorse of Cain, display the youthful genius of the poet.

—The stroke descended on his brow ;
 The suppliant victim sunk beneath the blow :
 The streaming blood distained his locks with gore
 Those beauteous tresses, that were gold before :
 Nor could his lips a deep-drawn sigh restrain,
 Not for himself he sigh'd—he sigh'd for Cain :
 His dying eyes a look of pity cast,
 And beam'd forgiveness, ere they closed their last,
 The murd'rer view'd him with a vacant stare,
 Each thought was anguish, and each look despair.
 "Abel, awake ! arise !" he trembling cried ;
 "Abel, my brother !"—but no voice replied.
 At ev'ry call more madly wild he grew,
 Paler than he, whom late in rage he slew.
 In frightful silence o'er the corpse he stood,
 And chain'd in terror, wonder'd at the blood.
 "Awake ! yet oh ! no voice, no smile, no breath :
 O God, support me ! O should this be death !
 O thought most dreadful ! how my blood congeals !
 How ev'ry vein increasing horror feels !
 How faint his visage, and how droops his head !
 O God, he's gone !—and I have done the deed !"

The "Raising of Lazarus" is another of the Winchester poems ; but this short piece is no-ways remarkable, except as being one of the earliest productions of Wolfe.

In 1808, Wolfe left Winchester, and returned with his mother to Dublin. He entered college in the following year under Dr. Davenport, and almost immediately distinguished himself by his academical honors. He did not, however, confine himself exclusively to classics : it was during his collegiate course that all his poems were written, before his devotion to higher pursuits had checked the exuberance of his genius. Wolfe indeed appears to have been essentially a poet ; and to have possessed all those fine sensibilities which generally distinguish those who are gifted with high poetical talents.

"It was the peculiar temperament of his mind to display its emotions by the strongest outward demonstrations. Such were his intellectual sensibilities, and the corresponding vivacity of his animal spirits, that the excitation of his feelings generally discovered itself by the most lively expressions, and sometimes by an unrestrained vehemence of gesticulation, which often afforded amusement to his more sedate or less impressible acquaintances. Whenever in the company of his friends anything occurred in his reading, or to his memory, which powerfully affected his imagination, he usually started from his seat, flung aside his chair, and paced about the room giving vent to his admiration in repeated exclamations of delight, and in gestures of the most animated rapture. Nothing produced these emotions more strongly than music, of the pleasures of which he was in the highest degree susceptible. He had an ear formed to enjoy in the most exquisite manner the simplest melody or the richest harmony. Sacred music, above all, (especially the compositions of Handel) had the most subduing, the most transporting effect upon his feelings. He understood and felt all the poetry of music, and was particularly felicitous in catching the spirit and character of a simple air or a national melody."

To this peculiar talent we are indebted for two of the most beautiful of Wolfe's productions; which we shall give as specimens of his skill in this kind of adaptation. Of the first, the "Spanish Song," we are given the following account by Archdeacon Russell:—

"He was so much struck by the grand national Spanish air, 'Viva el Rey Fernando,' the first time he heard it played by a friend, that he immediately commenced singing it over and over again until he produced an English song admirably suited to the time. The air, which has the character of an animated march, opens in a strain of grandeur, and suddenly subsides, for a few bars, into a slow and pathetic modulation, from which it abruptly starts again into all the enthusiasm of martial spirit."

SPANISH SONG.

The chains of Spain are breaking—
Let Gaul despair, and fly;
Her wrathful trumpet's speaking—
Let tyrants hear and die.

Her standard o'er us arching
Is burning red and far;
The soul of Spain is marching
In thunders to the war.
Look round your lovely Spain,
And say, shall Gaul remain?

Behold yon burning valley—
Behold yon naked plain—
Let us hear their drum—
Let them come, let them come!
For vengeance and freedom rally,
And, Spaniards! onward for Spain!

Remember, remember Barossa—
Remember Napoleon's chain—
Remember your own Saragossa,
And strike for the cause of Spain—
Remember your own Saragossa,
And onward, onward for Spain!

The poem to which we shall now direct attention is one, the words of which are adapted to the popular Irish air "Gramachree," which was one of his favorite melodies. This beautiful piece is altogether different from the martial

"Song of Spain," being peculiarly, almost painfully, pathetic. It is impossible to read it without being deeply affected by its plaintive yet tender strain, and we often feel surprised that this exquisite poem should be, apparently so little known.

If I had thought thou could'st have died,
I might not weep for thee;
But I forgot, when by thy side,
That thou could'st mortal be:
It never, through my mind had passed,
The time would e'er be o'er,
And I on thee should look my last,
And thou should'st smile no more!

And still upon that face I look,
And think 'twill smile again;
And still the thought I will not brook,
That I must look in vain!
But when I speak—their deat not say,
What then, ne'er let'st uspid;
And now I feel, as well I may,
Sweet Mary: thou art dead!

If thou could'st stay, e'en as thou art,
All cold, and all serene—
I still might press thy silent heart
'And where thy smiles have been!
While e'en thy chill, bleak corse I have,
Thou seemest still my own;
But there I lay thee in thy grave—
And I am now alone!

I do not think, where'er thou art,
Thou hast forgotten me;
And I, perhaps, may soothe this heart,
In thinking too of thee:
Yet there was round thee such a dawn
Of light ne'er seen before,
As fancy never could have drawn,
And never can restore.

One of the most remarkable circumstances connected with the above poem is, that in its composition, the poet had no real incident in view. It appears almost impossible that such pathetic lamentations could be produced by anything but the actual calamity so plaintively, and at the same time, so inartificially bewailed: yet when asked by a friend whether any real occurrence had prompted the lines, he replied in the negative, "but that he had sung the air over and over till he burst into a flood of tears, in which mood he composed the words." A strange instance of the extraordinary effect which music always produced upon him.

Another of his songs, which was composed at the request of a lady, a distinguished musician, is well deserving of insertion here:—

Go, forget me—why should sorrow,
O'er that brow a shadow fling?
Go, forget me—and to-morrow
Brightly smile and sweetly sing.
Smile—though I shall not be near thee;
Sing, though I shall never hear thee;
May thy soul with pleasure shine
Lasting as the gloom of mine!
Go, forget me, &c.

Like the sun, thy presence glowing Clothes the meanest things in light;
And when thou, like him art going,
Lowest objects fade in night.

All things look'd so bright about thee,
That they nothing seem without thee;
By that pure and lucid mind
Earthly things were too refined.
Like the sun, &c.

Go, thou vision wildly gleaming,
Softly on my soul that fell;
Go, for me no longer beaming—
Hope and Beauty! fare ye well!
Go, and all that once delighted
Take, and leave me all benighted;
Glory's burning—generous swell—
Fancy and the Poet's shell.
Go, thou vision, &c.

It is, however, to the lines on the "Burial of Sir John Moore," that Wolfe is chiefly indebted for his celebrity as a poet. Of this short but expressive ode there can be but one opinion ; criticism upon it is out of place. Who has ever yet read it without being affected by the strain, half martial, half plaintive which pervades it ? Who will hesitate to subscribe to Lord Byron's opinion, " that it was little inferior to the best ode that this prolific age had produced ?" Or who can doubt that it will take its place as one of the most beautiful poetical productions in the English language ? The circumstances which led to the composition of the ode, are thus described by one of the poet's earliest friends.*

" The poem was commenced in my company. The occasion was as follows : Wolfe came into my room one evening while I was reading the Edinburgh Annual Register : I think it was the volume for 1809, and which concluded with an account of the battle of Corunna and the death of Sir John Moore. It appeared to me admirably written ; and although the writer might not be classed amongst the very warmest admirers of that lamented General, yet he cordially appreciated his many great and amiable qualities, and eagerly seized upon every opportunity of doing him generous and ample justice.† In College we do not always lay down our books when visited by our friends, at least you know, to your cost, that such is not my practice. I made our dear departed friend listen to me while I read the account, which the admirable writer (I conjectured that he must be Mr. Southey) made to assume a classical interest ; and we both felt kindled and elevated by a recital which was calculated to concentrate whatever of glory or interest attached in our young imaginations to Chæroneæ or Marathon upon the spotless valour of a British soldier. When I had done, Wolfe and I walked into the country ; and I observed that he was totally inattentive to the objects around him ; and in conversation absent and self-involved. He was in fact silently composing ; and in a short time he repeated to me (without writing them down) the first and last stanzas of his beautiful ode, which, as you have truly stated, were all that he at first intended. I was exceedingly pleased with them ; and I believe the * Rev. Samuel O'Sullivan, well known as a writer in the University Magazine, died in 1851, in his sixty-first year, having been Chaplain to the Royal Hibernian School, Phoenix Park, for five-and-twenty years.

† The passage alluded to is in the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1808, p. 458, and is as follows :—" Sir John Moore had often said, that if he was killed in battle, he wished to be buried where he fell. The body was removed at midnight to the citadel of Corunna. A grave was dug for him on the rampart there, by a party of the 9th regiment, the aides-de-camp attending by turns. No coffin could be procured, and the officers of his staff wrapped the body, dressed as it was, in a military cloak and blankets. The interment was hastened : for about eight in the morning some firing was heard, and the officers feared that if a serious attack were made, they should be ordered away, and not suffered to pay him their last duty. The officers of his family bore him to the grave ; the funeral service was read by the Chaplain ; and the corpse was covered with earth."

admiration I expressed partly induced him to supply the other stanzas."

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE.

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried;
Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot
O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

We buried him darkly at dead of night,
The sods with our bayonets turning;
By the struggling moonbeam's misty light,
And the lantern dimly burning.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Not in sheet or in shroud we wound him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him.

Few and short were the prayers we said,
And we spoke not a word of sorrow;
But we steadfastly gazed on the face that was dead
And we bitterly thought of the morrow.

We thought, as we hollow'd his narrow bed,
And smooth'd down his lonely pillow,
That the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his head,
And we far away on the billow!

Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him,
But little he'll reck, if they let him sleep on
In the grave where a Briton has laid him.

But half of our heavy task was done,
When the clock struck the hour for retiring;
And we heard the distant and random gun
That the foe was sullenly firing.

Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
From the field of his fame fresh and gory;
We carved not a line, and we raised not a stone—
But we left him alone with his glory!

Wolfe was always remarkable for the more than fastidious judgment which he exercised upon his own compositions; this led him frequently to undervalue what his friends most admired. To this we must probably ascribe the utter indifference which he seems to have always displayed as to the fate of the above beautiful lines. Although they were a production that the most successful author might well have been proud to claim, and written when Wolfe was just of an age to be keenly sensitive to the charms of literary celebrity; yet he appears never to have taken the least step to vindicate, publicly at least, his title to them. Never has any poem appeared which has been ascribed to so many and such different authors. It was attributed to Moore, to Campbell, to Wilson, to Byron, and to Barry Cornwall. Although never published by Wolfe, it found its way, without his knowledge, to the press.

During his life it remained unclaimed; but after his death, some of his friends, who were well acquainted with the authorship of it, came forward to vindicate his title to it. However—

“While the friends of Wolfe were one after another stating their knowledge of his having written the poem, it was claimed in some unintelligible local hoax as the production of a rhyming horse-doctor in Durham. The letter written in his name by some provincial jester claiming it for him, was copied into the papers; and the laurels which Medwin demanded for Byron were now for a while awarded to Marshal. A more respectable parentage was soon after found, and gave rise to a conjecture which many thought probable enough. A volume of poems was printed by a young clergyman of the name of Barnard, who soon after died of consumption, who was supposed to be the author. In the Edinburgh Advertiser a letter, dated Temple, January, 1841, signed A. Macintosh, and addressed to the Rev. W. Muir, assistant minister of Temple, was printed; the writer, the master of the parish-school at Temple, states himself to have written the poem, and goes into a very minute detail of circumstances connected with his claim. Mr. Muir manifestly gave entire credence to Macintosh's statement, and the Editor of the Edinburgh Advertiser gave it also his sanction. This led to the publication of several letters on this subject, all from persons of considerable eminence who knew the fact of Wolfe's being the author of the poem. Macintosh published an impudent letter admitting that Wolfe must have claimed the poem, but still asserting himself to be the writer. He was unlucky enough to assign a date to the period at which he composed it; and though the precise date of Wolfe's poem is not ascertained, yet it is ascertained that it was written prior to the date which Macintosh chose to lay for his handiwork. While the discussion about Macintosh's claim was going on in the newspapers, Dr. Luby* luckily found a letter of Wolfe's† giving a complete copy of the lines in his own handwriting. Mr. Muir examined Mr. Macintosh, and succeeded in extorting from him a confession that his statement was ‘a lie’ from beginning to end.”

According to a statement made at a meeting of the Royal Irish Academy, by Dr. Anster—

“The letter, or rather fragment of the letter, had been found by Dr Luby among the papers of a deceased brother, who was a college friend of Wolfe and of Mr. Taylor, to whom the letter was addressed. The part found had the appearance of having been torn off from the rest of the letter. It contains the address; a complete copy of the ode; a sentence mentioning to Mr. Taylor that his praise of the stanzas first written led him to complete the poem; a few words of a private nature at the end of the letter ; and the signature. There is no date on the part preserved ; but the post-mark of Sept. 6th, 1816, fixes the time at which it was sent."

Wolfe's claim has never since been disputed ; indeed it had been proved to demonstration some time before by a letter addressed to the editor of Blackwood's Magazine, by Archdeacon Russell, in which the Rev. biographer states, in answer to some objection made to Wolfe's claim by a writer in the Magazine, "that Mr. Wolfe had expressly avowed himself the author." It is, however, time to return from this long disquisition.

Not long after his entrance into College, Wolfe had the misfortune to lose his mother, an affliction which he most keenly felt. At this period also, his pecuniary resources being limited, he resolved to have recourse to tuition, although, as we are informed by one of his friends, "an intimate acquaintance and fellow-student of his, who, on coming of age, had acquired possession of a small property of four or five hundred pounds, warmly and anxiously pressed him to accept a moiety of it, for the purpose of facilitating his progress in life ; but this generous offer Wolfe gratefully but steadily declined ; with a chivalry of feeling which always distinguished him, he determined to endeavour to win his way by the exertion of his own talents." He accordingly undertook the duties of a College tutor, duties which, although to one constituted like him they must have been peculiarly uncongenial, he discharged with the most conscientious zeal and devotedness. He did not, however, long continue to act as a tutor ; for in 1812 he obtained a scholarship, and with the highest credit, being the third on the list.

About this time he also carried off the Vice-Chancellor's prize. The subject proposed was Jugurtha—It is impossible to read this fine poem, without feeling regret that Wolfe had never attempted any dramatic piece. The vigor of expression and force of passion displayed in Jugurtha's Soliloquy, render it more than probable that he would have succeeded in the higher branches of poetry. Take for instance the following passages :—

I have attain'd that terrible consummation,
My soul could stand aloof, and from on high
Look down upon the ruins of my body,
Smiling in apathy : I feel no longer ;
I challenge Rome to give another pang.

What avails it now,
That my proud views despised the narrow limits,

Which minds that span and measure out ambition
 Had fix'd to mine; and while I seem'd intent
 On savage subjects and Numidian forests,
 My soul had pass'd the bounds of Africa!—
 Defeated, overthrown!—yet to the last
 Ambition taught me hope, and still my mind,
 Through danger, flight and carnage, grasp'd dominion;
 And had not Bocchus—curses, curses, on him!—
 What Rome has done, she did it for ambition;
 What Rome has done, I might—I would have done;
 What thou hast done, thou wretch! Oh had she proved Nobly deceitful; had she seized the traitor,
 And join'd him with the fate of the betray'd,
 I had forgiven her all; for he had been
 The consolation of my prison hours;
 I could forget my woes in stinging him;
 And if before this day his little soul
 Had not in bondage wept itself away,
 Rome and Jugurtha should have triumph'd over him.

I'll sleep no more, until I sleep for ever:
 When I slept last, I heard Adherbal scream,
 I'll sleep no more! I'll think until I die:
 My eyes shall pore upon my miseries,
 Until my miseries shall be no more.
 Yet wherefore did he scream? Why, I have heard
 His living scream,—it was not half so frightful.
 Whence comes the difference? When the man was living,
 Why, I did gaze upon his couch of torments
 With placid vengeance, and each anguish'd cry
 Gave me stern satisfaction; now he's dead,
 And his lips move not;—yet his voice's image
 Flash'd such a dreadful darkness o'er my soul,
 I would not mount Numidia's throne again,
 Did every night bring such a scream as that.

About this time he also became a member of the Historical Society, and immediately became distinguished by his oratorical as well as his poetical talents. One of his poems, "Patriotism," obtaining the Society's medal. On one occasion he was selected by the Auditor,* to deliver the inaugural address. This address was intended to unfold the advantages resulting from the Institution, and to expatiate at large upon its three leading departments—History, Poetry, and Oratory; and although at the time of its delivery, its composition had not been quite completed, it was received with great applause, and Wolfe was adjudged the gold medal for it. From the fragments which remain, we can judge how well it deserved that prize, and can form an opinion of what it would have been had the author bestowed sufficient care on its elaboration. Even in what remains of it may be discovered, not merely vigour of expression and originality of thought; but lofty sentiment and enthusiastic admiration of the fine arts. One brief extract we cannot refrain from inserting.

"But the science which Poetry loves most to study and to inculcate, is the philosophy of human nature,—the science of the human heart.

* William Brooke Esq., now one of the Masters in Chancery.

The man of the world will tell you that he understands it, and will send you to the world as the source of his knowledge. He has collected a few loathsome and selfish depravities, and bestows them, without distinction of character, as the attributes of the whole human race; and the result of all his important calculations, mighty researches, and accumulated experience, is caution, distrust, and a contracted heart. But do not you likewise; do you look upon your common nature with hearts full of sensibility; weak as it is, contemplate its grand and generous faculties as well as its baser ingredients;—let it be yours to pity—perhaps to improve it. Poetry, both ancient and modern, presents the heart and passions perpetually to our contemplation; and its criticism is perhaps the best introduction to an analysis of the human mind.”

And he continues, boldly and eloquently, to vindicate the majesty of virtue, insulted, as it too often is, by the fallacious and unjust conclusions drawn by the so-called man of the world from his own perverted heart: who, forsooth, inured to vice, and unable to trace within himself any but the selfish emotions of depravity, unjustly attributes to all men the same base sentiments by which he is himself actuated; and endeavours to solace himself with the thought, that the experience of all is fraught with the same melancholy results as his own. Wise and virtuous men, however, do not take such a gloomy, such an unfair view of human nature.

That Wolfe would have become a distinguished prose writer, had he applied himself to that line of composition, is evident from the fragments of his which remain. He has left behind him several unfinished sermons, which would acquire but little elaboration to become admirable specimens of pulpit eloquence; and Archdeacon Russell has also preserved a gem in the shape of a vision, entitled “The College Course,” which, written in the style so frequently adopted by Addison and Steele in the Spectator and the Tattler, is little inferior to many of the productions of those distinguished essayists. Indeed, one of his most remarkable traits was the versatility of his talents. We have already alluded to his compositions in poetry and in prose; we shall now advert to his success in that branch of study, which is in general considered the pursuit least congenial to a poet, namely, mathematics. The following account is taken from a very amusing, but scarce little work, called “College Recollections.”

“Wolfe had early acquired a very high reputation: for the first two years of his residence in college he had devoted himself to classical studies, which seemed more congenial to his fine taste and sparkling fancy; and during this time he had carried off all the prizes, and was admitted to be by eminence the most distinguished man of his day. In the third year, when languages are no longer objects of exclusive interest, he found that his inferiority in the sciences precluded him from his accustomed distinction. As usual his friends started to rush eagerly up to the hall when the bell announced that the examination had ended, and the multitudes issued forth at the opened doors; but not as usual did Wolfe receive their congratulations, and he had, examination after examination, to read in the countenances around him an expression of disappointment. This was not to be endured. However distasteful to him the sciences were, it was more disagreeable to be defeated, and to see his friends mortified. The division in which he happened to be was that in which the best science scholar in the undergraduate course had, for nearly three years, maintained an undisputed ascendancy. Wolfe might, if he pleased, have had himself transferred into a division where he would have had a fairer prospect of success; but this would not satisfy his ambition. It demanded a more noble triumph. He accordingly held his place in his class, and devoted himself only the more earnestly to what might almost be termed a new study. During the entire interval between the examinations, he kept his noble faculties concentrated, and in intense action, upon what had been a most distasteful pursuit, and felt himself, when the time of trial drew near, possessed of knowledge and power which he had, in the beginning, but faint hopes of attaining. During the examination (which was continued at intervals for two days) the interest and speculation respecting the result it is almost impossible to describe. At these trials of academic proficiency, no persons are permitted to be present except the examinant and their examiners. After the first morning it was noised abroad that Wolfe had answered with great ability, and had solved some difficult problems; and it was observed that his adversary did not pass across the courts to his room with his accustomed supercilious composure: the report at the close of the day was, that Wolfe had maintained, and indeed increased, the character he had made in the morning; and some said he had gained a decided advantage over his competitor. The next day passed in the same manner, the interest becoming more general through the college; and if a stranger, during the last hours of the examination, were to pass through the courts, he would have had his attention strongly arrested by the faces of the different groups scattered in various directions abroad, and by the restlessness with which single stragglers were in motion; now at the closed door of the hall, now looking up to the college clock, and seeing that there were still five minutes to pass; he would have felt certain that something of much more than ordinary interest was in agitation. At last the small bell tingled, and the doors were thrown open. It is little to say that the wave from within was met by a more precipitous rush from all the parts of the court without, to know the result; and although there were perhaps thirty premiums adjudged, yet the whole interest of the enquiries seemed to be centred in the fate of one; and for a moment the faces of friends and brothers were unnoticed in the eagerness to explore amidst the moving mass the face of ——— and his opponent, Wolfe. The first who came out was ———. His features seemed sunk and pale, and there was a bewildered air over his countenance, as if he was incapable of comprehending whether all around him was real. This was soon understood, when Wolfe was distinguished, with a suppressed enthusiasm breaking out in every feature and every expression of his countenance, and his friends now needed not to be told that he had been successful; and yet amidst all their joy and exultation, the appearance of ——— crossing the courts with a hurried and disordered air, and without taking notice of the few friends who accompanied him, had the power effectually to check any disposition which they might have felt of making a public demonstration of their triumph. It was on the evening of this day that I met him for the first time; I cannot but call it a proud evening for him. Every person in company, except myself, was a tried and valued friend, and he knew how truly I esteemed his character; there was not, therefore, an individual present whom he did not know to rejoice in his triumph; and I cannot conceive what can be called a proud moment, if that be not one in which a man feels himself surrounded by a group, in whose countenances he can trace a sympathy with his own rejoicing; and where he knows that in every heart, however elevated, and however full of frolic and of glee, there is under all its varied emotions a feeling of delight at his triumph, which ardent and exhilarated spirits cannot and will not chase away. As the night advanced, and as various guests one by one passed away, the conversation began to grow more serious and more interesting. Every one knows how much more full and unconstrained the communication of hearts becomes according as the social circle narrows. We spoke now no longer on general topics. We spoke of the day's triumph; we made Wolfe recount the various emotions and alarms which he had experienced; we heard of questions such as struck him for the moment with dismay, and of the animation with which his whole faculties had concentrated themselves as if into one powerful impulse, and borne him through the difficulty suddenly. From speaking of the event of the day, we were drawn on to speak of the future; and it became a general wish that he would devote himself to the study in which he had made so happy a commencement, and give himself up to the labour of fellowship reading. There were many reasons why his friends urged this upon him. He was of a very religious character, and would be an ornament to the clerical profession; and then for other professions he seemed little qualified, from his uncommon simplicity of mind and ignorance of the world. He was certainly very agreeable in manner, and possessed of a very high intellect; but he never employed his mental powers in judging of men; and although he could analyse with signal beauty and precision the characters which history set before him; yet he seemed to lay all this power of judging aside when it was to be employed in the affairs of daily life, and was always likely, from his candour and his unsuspecting temper, to be deceived by the least artful imposture. A fellowship therefore, it was decided, was the object towards which Wolfe should look ; and a fellowship, in the yielding kindness of his heart, through compliance with the entreaties of his friends, he determined to seek."

Anxious, however, as some of his friends were for Wolfe to devote himself to the course of reading requisite to procure a fellowship ; and highly as they approved of his intention of doing so, this determination does not seem to have met with the approval of all, as we are informed ; we quote from "College Recollections," that—

"Many a female voice was raised against this decision when it was communicated to his friends in town, for Wolfe was a very general favorite in female circles. Though his person was rather awkward and heavily formed, yet there was something in his look and air which said he was a gentleman ; and in his countenance there was such an expression of purity, and intelligence, and enthusiasm, that you never took into account against him the smallness of his eyes, and that the shape of his face was heavy. It was the triumph of mind over matter, and his constant cheerfulness of temper and easily excitable spirits, did for his features what they did for every subject he spoke upon—diffusing their own character and their own light over what might otherwise remain unnoticed or uninteresting. "Is it true," said a very pretty girl, "that Mr. Wolfe has decided on reading for a fellowship ? Mamma said last night that he had, and that he told her so—I am sure there are men enough to be fellows, and now I suppose he will never come out to a party any more ; and if we ever see him he will be so solemn and so dull that it would be better to be one of his books than his partner." However, Wolfe did not in the least alter his manner or disposition. During the day he was faithfully employed in his arduous labours ; but the moment night came on, his happy spirits rallied about him, and he was to be seen the most joyous and enlivening member of every circle which was happy enough to have a claim upon him."

For a short period Wolfe pursued his studies with great vigour and earnestness, and his friends were beginning to entertain the most sanguine hopes of his ultimate success.

"But the habits of his mind, and the peculiarity of his disposition, and the variety of his taste, seemed adverse to anything like continued and laborious application to one definite object. It was a singular characteristic of his mind, that he seldom read any book throughout, not even those works in which he appeared most to delight. Whatever he read, he thoroughly digested and accurately retained ; but his progress through any book of an argumentative or speculative nature was impeded by a disputative habit of thought and a fertility of invention, which suggested ingenious objections and started new theories at every step. Accordingly this constitution of mind led him rather to investigate the grounds of an author's hypothesis, and to satisfy his own mind upon the relative probabilities of conflicting opinions, than to plod on patiently through a long course, merely to lay up in his memory the particular views and arguments of each writer, without consideration of their importance or their foundation."

Nor was it merely the peculiar constitution of his mind which prevented him from prosecuting with perseverance his studies for a fellowship; the facility of his disposition and his love of society materially impeded his progress. He never could deny himself to a visitor, and great portion of his time was given up to, what he delighted in, conversational debate. Nor were these the only obstacles; about this time Wolfe became intimate with a family who resided in the country at no great distance from Dublin, and this intimacy soon ripened into an attachment to one of its members. The fellows of Trinity College at that period still groaned under the statutable celibacy which had been imposed upon them at a time when an anti-matrimonial Queen wished all her subjects to imitate her example; and Wolfe therefore gradually relaxed in his efforts, and finally abandoned altogether his intention of trying for a fellowship. The course of his love did not, however, run smooth. His prospects of obtaining a competency in any profession were so distant and so uncertain, that the young lady's family deemed it incumbent to put a stop to any further intimacy. This disappointment preyed deeply upon Wolfe. It pressed upon both mind and body, and to it some of his friends have in part attributed the disease to which he afterwards fell a victim, as up to this period his health had been robust; even his deportment became quite changed.

"No one," says the author of 'College Recollections,' "could now complain of his ardent and exuberant spirits, nor yet accuse him of being absent or abstracted. He paid a polite attention to everything that was passing in company; not a seeming, but a real attention, as long as he could keep down the strong sensations of his heart. I have seen him sometimes, apparently overcome, cover his eyes with his hand, and seemingly give a loose to his inward feelings; and then, when he roused himself to resume his place in company, I could see that the expression of his countenance was, as it were, a struggle between tenderness and severity, as if he had felt a tear rising to his eye, and had frowned it away indignantly. It was, of course, when alone that the power of his affection most over-mastered him, and then the influence of abstract studies was but a poor auxiliary against the impetuosity of a domineering passion. The reader will be able to form an opinion of the state in which he passed his private hours from a circumstance which occurred one evening, in a company where I was present. I had been sitting with some friends on a winter night, after our several studies for the day were over, when we were joined by a visitor whose character would well deserve a longer notice than I can here afford to give of it. He was very much addicted to mathematical pursuits, and had attained a high proficiency in them, but upon most other subjects was but very slightly informed. Indeed he had an inward contempt for all other studies than those in which he himself excelled, and more particularly for all connected with taste and imagination. "What have we here?" said he, looking at an open book upon the table.—"Wordsworth's Excursion!—This is the man that babbles about green fields. Well, gentlemen, don't let me interrupt your agreeable conversation. Don't, I beg of you, speak sense in compliment to me. I have got some papers of Wolfe's to look over, and so you may speak poetry while I am examining them." We resumed our conversation, and he proceeded to the examination of the papers. Some indistinct murmurs drew our attention to him, and we saw an expression of sarcastic triumph on his countenance. After remaining for some time silent, and apparently enjoying the discovery he had made, he said, "Gentlemen, some of you who are better acquainted with this kind of language than I am, may be able to explain an expression I have met with here, and which I do not think strictly algebraic." He showed us the paper, it was intended for a calculation of a comet's perihelion distance; but the calculation had been interrupted by some thought Wolfe had not been able to suppress, and he had given it expression.—

"That smile I'll remember for ever."

It was in this manner that his passion displayed itself in pursuits so seemingly uncongenial. In one place we found a most ingenious and beautiful solution of a very difficult problem. Even our sarcastic visitor muttered his applause; and just under the calculation there was written, "Oh, grief, grief." It was a painful thing to witness the proofs which these papers afforded of the anguish to which poor Wolfe's mind had become a prey; and to see that his virtuous struggles to disengage himself from the remembrances which were consuming him, were of so little avail."

The line, "That smile I'll remember for ever," quoted above, occurs in a song which we shall make no apology for giving in full.

Oh my love has an eye of the softest blue,
Yet it was not that that won me;
But a little bright drop from her soul was there—
'Tis that that has undone me.

I might have pass'd that lovely cheek,
Nor, perchance, my heart have left me;
But the sensitive blush that came trembling
there,
'O! my heart it for ever bereft me.

I might have forgotten that red, red lip—
Yet how from the thought to sever?
But there was a smile from the sunshine within,
And that smile I'll remember for ever.

Think not 'tis nothing but lifeless clay
The elegant form that haunts me—
'Tis the gracefully delicate mind that moves
In every step, that enchants me.

Let me not hear the nightingale sing,
Though I once in its notes delighted;
The feeling and mind that comes whispering forth,
Has left me no music beside it.

Who could blame had I loved that face,
Ere my eye could twice explore her?
Yet it is for the fairy intelligence there,
And her warm—warm heart I adore her.

It was also while his attachment was at its height, that he addressed the following stanzas, some of which resemble in animation the spirit-stirring strains of Burns, to George Grierson of the Irish Bar, who, as is stated by one of Wolfe's biographers, was the brother of the young lady of his attachment.

• TO A FRIEND.

My own friend—my own friend !
There's no one like my own friend ;
For all she gold,
The world can hold,
I wou'd not give my own friend.

So bold and frank his bearing, boy,
Should you meet him onward faring, boy,
In Lapland's snow
Or Chili's glow,
You'd say, what news from Erin, boy ?

He has a curious mind, boy,
'Tis jovial—'tis refined, boy,
'Tis richly fraught
With random thought,
And feelings wildly kind, boy.

'Twas eaten up with care, boy,
For circle, line, and square, boy—
And few believed
That genius thrived
Upon such drowsy fare, boy.

But his heart that beat so strong, boy,
Forbade her slumber long, boy—
So she shook her wing,
And with a spring
Away she bore away, boy.

She waxes unconfined, boy,
All wayward on the wind, boy ;
Yet her song
All along
Was of those she left behind, boy.

And we may let him roam, boy,
For years and years to come, boy,
In storm and ease—
In mirth and ease,
He'll never forget his home, boy.

O give him not to wear, boy,
Yea, wings of braided hair, boy—
Without this fuss
He'll think of us—
His heart—he has us there, boy.

For what can't be undone, boy,
He will not blubber on, boy—
He'll brightly smile,
Yet think the while
Upon the friend that's gone, boy.

O saw you his fire-side, boy,
And these that round it bide, boy.
You'd glow to see
The thrilling glee
Around his fire-side, boy.

Their story, poignant mirth, boy,
From feeling has its birth, boy ;
'Tis worth the groans
And the moans
Of half the doits on earth, boy.

Each soul that there has smiled, boy,
Is Erin's native child, boy—
A woodbine flower
In Erin's bower,
So elegant, so wild, boy.

The early clouds that roll, boy,
Will not for storms console, boy ;
'Tis the rainbow's light
So tenderly bright,
That softens and cheers the soul, boy.

I'd ask no friends to mourn, boy,
When I to dust return, boy—
'No breath of sigh
Or brine of eye
Should gather round my urn, boy.

I just would ask a tear, boy,
From every eye that's there, boy ;
Then a smile each day,
All sweetly gay,
My memory should repair, boy.

The laugh that there endears, boy—
The memory, of your years, boy—
Would more delight
Your heaving sprite
Than half the world's tears, boy.

We shall give one more of Wolfe's productions which must close our extracts :—

Oh say not that my heart is cold
To aught that once could warm it—
That Nature's form, so dear of old,
No more has power to charm it ;

Or that th' ungenerous world can chill
One glow of fond emotion
For those who made it dearer still,
And shared my wild devotion.

Still oft those solemn scenes I view
 In rapt and dreamy sadness;
 Oft look on those who loved them too
 With fancy's idle gladness;
 Again I long'd to view the light
 In Nature's features glowing;
 Again to tread the mountain's height,
 And taste the soul's o'erflowing.

Stern Duty rose, and frowning flung
 His leaden chain around me;
 With iron look and sullen tongue
 He mutter'd as he bound me—
 "The mountain breeze, the boundless heaven
 Unfit for toll the creature;
 These for the free alone are given,—
 But what have slaves with Nature?"

The rest of Wolfe's history can be very briefly told. Having given up all idea of a fellowship, he resolved to enter into orders; indeed he seems to have had for some years a tendency to the ministry. He accordingly commenced his divinity studies, in which, however, he does not appear to have distinguished himself as much as his brilliant success in other pursuits might have led his friends to expect. He was ordained in 1817, and was in a short time appointed to a temporary curacy at Ballyclog, a remote district in the County of Tyrone; here, however, he did not make any great stay, as in January, 1818, we find him permanently settled as a curate in the parish of Donoughmore. From his letters it may be gathered that his duties were very laborious; his parish being very extensive, and situated in a wild and hilly district, the population of which was so scattered that it was no easy task for Wolfe to keep up that intercourse with his flock which he thought it incumbent on a clergyman to maintain. His time was so occupied as altogether to preclude him from indulging his taste for literature; and what must have been the severest trial of all, poor Wolfe does not seem to have had a single congenial mind to commune with. He devoted himself with the most exemplary zeal to his multifarious duties, particularly during one year in which typhus fever prevailed to an alarming extent in his parish. He was most indefatigable in visiting the sick, and careless of his own health, exposed himself without precaution to every hardship; and thus unfortunately confirmed a consumptive tendency which had manifested itself while he was in college. In 1821, Archdeacon Russell was induced, from the accounts of Wolfe's failing health which reached his friends, to visit him at Castle Caulfield. He found him just returned from Scotland, where he had gone to consult a physician who was celebrated for his skill in cases of consumption; and witnessed the enthusiastic affection with which his poor but attached flock welcomed him back. The Archdeacon was shocked at the deplorable state in which he found his friend. We subjoin a brief account of it—an account which for the sake of religion, not to say humanity, we hope is not, at the present day, applicable to any of the curates of the Established Church :—

“The habits of his life while he resided on his cure, were in every respect calculated to confirm his constitutional tendency to consumption. He seldom thought of providing a regular meal; and his humble cottage exhibited every appearance of the neglect of the ordinary comforts of life. A few straggling rush-bottomed chairs, piled up with his books, a small rickety table before the fire-place, covered with parish memoranda, and two trunks containing all his papers—serving at the same time to cover the broken parts of the floor—constituted all the furniture of his sitting-room. The mouldy walls of the closet in which he slept were hanging with loose folds of damp paper; and between this wretched cell and his parlour was the kitchen, which was occupied by a disbanded soldier, his wife, and their numerous brood of children, who had emigrated with him from his first quarters, and seemed now in full possession of the whole concern, entertaining him merely as a lodger, and usurping the entire disposal of his small plot of ground, as the absolute lords of the soil.”

After a great deal of importunity, Wolfe was, with much difficulty, induced to return to Dublin where most of his friends resided. For a short time his health continued to fluctuate; and towards the approach of winter he was ordered to the South of France. He accordingly proceeded to Bourdeaux, where he remained for a month. On his return, his friends flattered themselves that he had derived benefit from the voyage; but their hopes were short-lived. The fell disease soon re-appeared in an aggravated shape. In vain did he, by the directions of his physicians, remove to the Cove of Cork for the winter; the symptoms gradually increased, his strength daily diminished, and on the 23rd of February, 1823, Wolfe calmly and happily expired.

It cannot but be matter of regret that Wolfe should have written so little, and should have discontinued writing at such an early age. The Ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore, which is stated on good authority to have been the last poem composed by him, was written in 1814, when Wolfe was but three-and-twenty; and had he, when his faculties had become more matured, and his excessive sensibility been somewhat blunted, applied himself sedulously to composition, there can scarcely be a question, but that he would have produced something superior to the few fugitive pieces which remain, beautiful as some of them undeniably are. Wolfe, however, seems never to have had any method in his writing, but to have composed his different poems by fits and starts, as the mood inspired him ; and being utterly indifferent to literary fame, he appears never to have taken the least interest in the fate of his productions ; not one of which we believe was ever published by himself. As soon as he had resolved to enter into orders, he at once discontinued every species of composition, but that which was requisite for his professional duties ; and when ordained he entered upon the discharge of his sacred functions with a zeal and an energy, which, though scarcely to have been expected from one with a mind constituted as his was, effectually precluded him from any other occupation. Unlike his brother clergymen, Maturin and Sterling, Wolfe never regretted his choice of the church as a profession ; nor was his life like theirs, one perpetual strife between the impulse of genius, and the dictates of duty. His brief career presents, as we stated before, scarce an incident of any interest to recount ; but we have thought that a short memoir of one, who as a poet, and still more as a man, reflects credit upon our common country, would not be uninteresting, or inappropriate in an Irish publication.

ART. V.—ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM.

1. Debates in Parliament on Administrative Reform.
2. Report of the Examiners appointed for examining Candidates for the Civil Service.
3. Meetings and Documents of the Administrative Reform Association.

That Change is the law of our being, is a truism which is enforced upon the mind at every instant of our mortal existence. We live, we breathe, we move in an atmosphere of change, and all things round us bear upon their front the signs and indications of transiiveness and instability. The moment in which we conceive a thought it passes from us, and is succeeded by another and another, ere that thought is developed. The act, however brief, that we perform occupies a succession of time in its accomplishment. The sounds that strike the ear are gone almost ere noted, and are followed by others equally fleeting and unenduring. The objects presented to the eye impress the same idea of mutability by their motion, intrinsic or extrinsic, as the motion and changes of position of the observer himself, and the variations of light and darkness, sunshine and cloud.

Events of public, as of private, life arise, pass on, and others come crowding after them, even like the flowing past of waters; and habit makes us see, without surprise, that the occurrence which but now was present has, in a twinkling as it were, become a thing of the past, leaving its place occupied by something else, which, in its turn, passes onward quickly and is gone. The minutes, the hours, have their never-ending, never-staying succession,—the days, the weeks, the months, the years, are ever similarly urging, or being urged forward, and fleeing by us in an endless train. Our fellow creatures change around us, and within ourselves we feel and find the same incessant change—that change to which all creation is subject from its birth, and which nothing in creation can for one moment obstruct or arrest in its decreed and perpetual course.

But if it be forbidden and impossible for man to stay this mighty and all pervading principle, he has, however, a power reserved to him in regard to it, of which he can make a large and a noble use, if he have but the intelligence and the will. If, instead of dreaming of a foolish and vain resistance, he foresee in time the inevitable approach of change; if in time he prepare and be ready to go with it, and seize with happy quickness upon the means that shall chance to present themselves of guiding and directing it, all shock and jarring may be avoided, and the movement will proceed easily and naturally, so as to give rather the idea of a developement than that of a substitution or a transmutation.

Happy, then, is the man or nation that recognises, and is prepared in due season to adopt and observe this policy. Particularly happy is England among the nations of Europe, that it is in the very essence and spirit of her constitution to accept and yield to change when the appointed hour has struck, without being liable to either of the errors which have elsewhere proved so disastrous—that of violent and frenzied anticipation, or blind and obstinate resistance. It were a needless waste of time to recapitulate the several instances in which this happy spirit has been displayed—instances multiplied within the memory of the existing generation, and several of them fresh in our minds at this moment. Catholic Emancipation, Parliamentary Reform, Reform of the Municipal Corporations of the three Kingdoms, abolition of the Test and Corporation Acts, abolition of the Corn Laws, Free Trade, and (despite of lawyers) Legal and Judicial Reforms of no mean magnitude, such have been, within less than thirty years, the important changes effected happily and beneficially, because taken up in their inevitable time and cheerfully accepted. And now again we see a large political change in progress of acceptance—a change not by any means “looming in the future,” but actually upon us and being proceeded with as we write. We allude to what its professed promoters complacently proclaim to be the terror of patronage lovers and seekers, the much talked of agitation for ameliorating the system of appointments and promotions in the offices and employments of the state.

“The French Revolution has resumed its onward march” said the Thunderer of the Press in February, 1848, on the startling, yet not altogether unlooked for intelligence, that the glass-palace-royalty of Louis Philippe, with all its sheen and splendor, had broken into fragments and gone down all at once in shivering ruin before the terrible hurricane of popular fury! "Reform has resumed its onward march"! do the advocates and abettors of the present Administrative Reform Movement cry out as oracularly and as magniloquently: but it yet remains to be seen if the flaws and cracks they so loudly denounce in the existing structure of our Public Administration, be forerunners of an equally wholesale shattering and scattering, or merely matters remediable at the cost of a little energetic effort, and without a total subversion.

To consider the movement in question, its professed objects, its management, progress, and prospects, is the purpose of our paper; and as the directest way to plunge at once in medias res, we shall set out with the text supplied to us by its chief Parliamentary promoters, and go on thence with its brief but not uninteresting history to the present time.

On the 15th of June, then, in the last year, 1855, we find Mr. Layard, M.P. for Aylesbury, bringing forward in the House of Commons a motion in relation to the subject, couched in the following terms, viz.

"That this House views with deep and increasing concern the state of the nation, and is of opinion that the manner in which merit and efficiency have been sacrificed in public appointments to party and family influences, and to a blind adherence to routine, has given rise to great misfortunes, and threatens to bring discredit on the national character, and involve the country in great disasters."

Upon this motion an amendment was moved by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton to the following effect:—

"That this House recommends to the earliest attention of Her Majesty's ministers the necessity of a careful revision of our various official establishments, with a view to simplify and facilitate the transaction of public business; and by instituting judicious tests of merit, as well as by removing obstructions to its fair promotion and legitimate rewards, to secure to the service of the state the largest available proportion of the energy and intelligence for which the people of this country are distinguished."*

The distinguished traveller and distinguished author, whose motion and amendment we have now set out, have themselves but accepted the movement and by no means originated it, or had any part in so doing. Twenty years ago and more, the concentration of opinion upon the subject—that concentration which carries everything in these countries upon which it can be got and brought to bear—had begun, and in the dreary course of the years that have since intervened, neither Mr. Layard nor Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton had made any demonstration even of being aware of what was in preparation. When at length the movement had acquired importance enough to engage parliamentary attention, they adroitly seized upon it, ut mos est, with Parliamentary aspirants to distinction, and have sought to make it their own. Credit may be given to them for their services, present and prospective, but they are not to cheat out of their proper fame the earlier advocates and promoters.

Exactly twenty years ago, in the year 1836, Henry Taylor published a work entitled, The Statesman, in which the following remarks occur :—

The far greater proportion of the duties which are performed in the office of a Minister are, and must be (!) performed under no effective responsibility, where politics and parties are not affected by the matter in question, and so long as there is no flagrant neglect or glaring injustice which a party can take hold of, the responsibility to Parliament is merely nominal, or falls otherwise only through casualty, caprice, and a misemployment of the time due from Parliament to legislative affairs. Thus the business of the office may be reduced within a very manageable compass, without creating public scandal. *By evading decisions wherever they can be evaded ; by shifting them on other departments and authorities wherever they can be shifted ; by giving decisions upon superficial examinations,—categorically, so as not to expose the superficiality in expounding the reasons ; by deferring questions till, as Lord Bacon says “ they resolve of themselves ; by undertaking nothing for the public good, which the public voice does not call for ; by conciliating loud and energetic individuals at the expense of such public interests as are dumb or do not attract attention ; by sacrificing everywhere what is feeble and obscure to what is influential and cognizable ; by such means and shifts as these, the single functionary granted by the theory may reduce his business within his powers, and perhaps obtain for himself the most valuable of all reputations in this line of life, that of “ a safe man,” and if his business even thus reduced, strains, as it well may, his powers and his industry to the utmost, then (whatever may be the theory), the man may be without reproach—without other reproach at least than that which belongs to men placing themselves in a way to have their understandings abused and debased, their sense of justice corrupted, their public spirit and appreciation of public objects undermined.—*Page 153.

It is one business to do what must be done, another to devise what ought to be done. It is in the spirit of the British Government, as hitherto existing, to transact only the former business ; and the reform which it requires is to enlarge the spirit so as to include the latter. Of and from amongst those measures which are forced upon him, to choose that which will bring him the most credit with the least trouble, has hitherto been the sole care of a statesman in office ; and, as a statesman's official establishment has been heretofore constituted, it is care enough for any man. Every day, every hour, has its exigencies, its immediate demands ; and he who has hardly time to eat his meals cannot be expected to occupy himself in devising good for mankind. "I am," says Mr. Landon's statesman, "a waiter at a tavern where every hour is dinner time, and pick-a-bone upon a silver dish,"—the current compulsory business he gets through as he may ; some is undone, some is ill done ; but, at best, to get it done is an object which he proposes to himself. But as to the inventive and suggestive portions of a statesman's functions, he would think himself an Utopian dreamer if he undertook them ; and such he would be, if he undertook them in any other way than through a re-constitution and reform of his establishment."—Page 159.

This, then, is the great evil and want,—that there is not, within the pale of our Government, any adequately numerous body of able statesmen ; some to be more externally active, and answer the demands of the day ; others to be somewhat more retired and meditative, in order that they may take thought for the morrow. How great the evil of this want is,—it may require peculiar opportunities of observation fully to understand and feel ; but one who, with competent knowledge, should consider well the number and magnitude of those measures which are postponed for years, or totally pretermitted—not for want of practicability, but for want of time and thought ; one who should proceed with such knowledge to consider the great means and appliances of wisdom which lie scattered through this intellectual country, squandered upon individual purposes—not for want of applicability to national ones, but for want of being brought together and directed ; one who, surveying these things with a heart capable of a people's joys and sorrows, their happy virtue or miserable guilt on these things dependent, should duly estimate the abundant means unemployed, the exalted ends unaccomplished, could not choose, I think, but say within himself, that there must be something fatally amiss in the very idea of statesmanship on which our system of administration is based ; or that there must be some moral apathy at what should be the very centre and seat of life in a country, —that the golden bowl must be broken at the fountain, and the wheel broken at the cistern.

Yet such is the prevalent insensibility to that which constitutes the real treasure and resources of the country, its serviceable and statesman-like minds ; and, so far are men in power from searching the country through for such minds, or men in Parliament from promoting or permitting the search, that I hardly know if that minister has existed in the present generation, who, if such a mind were casually presented to him, would not forego the use of it rather than hazard a debate in the House of Commons upon an additional item in his estimates.

Till the Government of the country shall become a nucleus of which the best wisdom in the country contained shall be perpetually forming itself in deposit, it will be, except as regards the shuffling of power from hand to hand and class to class, little better than a Government of fetches, shifts, and hand-to-mouth expedients.

Till a wise and constant instrumentality at work upon administrative measures (distinguished as they might be from measures of political parties) shall be understood to be essential to the Government of a country, that country can be considered to enjoy nothing more than the embryo of a Government,—a means towards producing thorough changes in its own structure and constitution, and in the political elements acting upon it, something worthy to be called a Government, at some future time. For governing a country is a very different thing from upholding a Government, "alia res sceptrum, alia plectrum."

This is going a little higher perhaps than the exact pitch of the present aspirations of Administrative Reformers, but their large souls "have stomach for it all"! They profess to desire and hope to see accomplished or attained this pitch of perfection, but for the present confine themselves to the narrower and more practical point of obtaining "the best men in the right place" in the minor appointments of the state.

It certainly does not very clearly appear how the perfection aimed at by Henry Taylor in the extract just quoted, can be reduced from the domain of theory and speculation to that of experiment and practice. No doubt there is unfortunately only too much truth in his description of the "hand-to-mouth" system under which the higher administration of imperial affairs is carried on. No doubt present emergencies are thought more of than abstract fitnesses. No doubt the louder and more energetic and more pressing, whether individuals, bodies, or those corporeal incorporeabilities, public movements, carry the day in the realms of administration, as they do in minor spheres of life. But these are incidents inseparable from human affairs, necessities of our imperfect state of being here below, and until angels shall come down and take on themselves the task of earthly government, these things will go on and recur again and again, and at best we can only mitigate what it is really not given to us to correct or prevent.

There is no Royal road even to this mitigation. It must be a work of time, of labour, of the aggregate of an infinitude of small efforts in detail constantly and perseveringly made, and perseveringly carried out in despite of opposition, difficulties, discouragements. A reform in the minor appointments of the State, if it progress successfully, would largely conduce towards ultimate ameliorations in the higher departments, according as the parties selected for fitness below should gradually approach the top of the ladder. An increase and enlargement of political education and ideas in the general body of the community, would operate as the due preparing of the soil, and providing of the necessary materials, and binding mortar wherein and wherewith to lay the secure foundations and upraise the structure of the new edifice. The first of these postulates is the immediate object and purpose of the present agitation. The second of them is yet a matter of theory, or, we should perhaps say, of many theories, for many and various indeed are the schemes and theories for general improvement and enlightenment that are constantly being "ventilated" in society.

A cursory review of the Debate in which Mr. Layard and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton made the motion and amendment respectively which we have already given, will best shew the light in which the movement is publicly considered, and the general nature of the expectations entertained of its progress and possible results.

Mr. Layard assumed the fact which was not contested, that a feeling was abroad, very generally, of dissatisfaction with the existing system of administration, and remarked that whether that feeling were justifiable or not, the House would do well and rightly by giving it a fair consideration.

He then proceeded to explain his personal opinions on the matter, by stating that he considered the Government of the country to be a class monopoly in the hands of a few families absorbing occasionally those who had gained notice as leaders of the people and representatives of popular opinion, and thus getting rid of their opposition and silencing their denunciations. The consequence of all this was, a general loss of confidence in the Government. This want of confidence was felt, first as to the management of the Army—second, as to that of the Diplomatic and Consular Services, and third, as to the Civil Service at home.

In reference to the first of these divisions or departments, he read, amongst other letters, one from Lieutenant-General Sir William Napier, which contained the following remarkable passage viz. :—

With respect to favoritism generally, it certainly pervades the British Army to an inordinate degree, seeing that no officer of high or low rank, no man below the rank of an officer, no civilian related to or interested for an officer by relationship or friendship, or seeking himself to enter the army, but whose first thought and immediate course is not, very vehemently to beseech some person privately to use influence to obtain by favor what is sought for. The universal constant prayer is, 'Let me have your interest!'

Sometimes indeed, some poor forlorn officer merely states his long and arduous services, his wounds, and the number of his relations who have been killed in action;—but this only to sway the influential person addressed, not as grounds for acceding to his claim!

Why is this? Surely because the absolute necessity of private interests apart from merit is universally felt to be dominant.

The English composition of the foregoing quotation is not the very best in the world—not exactly what has won the fame of the "History of the Peninsular War,"—but the stubborn English facts which it puts forward cannot be mistaken, nor denied. Mr. Layard proceeded pointedly to illustrate them:—

Colonel Hardinge entered the army as Ensign in 1844. In direct violation of the regulation requiring two years regimental duty before staff appointment, he was made aide-de-camp to his father, and served with distinction as such in the Indian Campaign. He was then made Lieutenant without purchase. Hundreds of poor Ensigns went through that campaign with no such reward. Shortly after, he was allowed to purchase a Company in another regiment, over the heads of all the Lieutenants, and was not in his new regiment many days when he got an exchange into the Coldstream Guards, and thence advanced rapidly through the Staff to his present position.—Now take the case of Lieutenant Henry Buck, who entered the service about the same time. He not only served through all the Campaigns in the Punjaub, but was likewise at Goojerat and other battles, and obtained several medals and clasps. He is still a Lieutenant!

Lord Eustace Cecil's promotion was excused the other day on the ground that he had shewn a meritorious desire to "See Service." But he exchanged out of every regiment which was seeing service. His regiment is actually at the seat of war, and he is placed in a battalion which is at this moment in London. I was accused of inaccuracy in the case of Captain Blackett, but his father has written to the "Times," to say that his son was not promoted for merit; but that it was by the influence of Colonel Upton, with whom he had gone on some pleasure excursion!!

I have a long list of Lieutenants who have served for years and years without having been promoted—I will call the attention of the House only to a few cases; avoiding as much as I possibly can the mentioning of names where it may be considered painful to individuals to do so. There was a Lieutenant Edwards who went to the Peninsula in the year 1811—was at the storming of Badajos in 1812—and was engaged throughout the whole of the Peninsular war. He was in six medal actions, and he was thirty times under fire, and was twice wounded. He was subsequently with the army of occupation in France, and was engaged on service nearly ever since. And yet, notwithstanding a most earnest appeal to Lord Hardinge by Sir William Napier in his favor, he has remained a Lieutenant!

Let me mention another case—that of Lieutenant D——: that officer made application for promotion to the rank of Captain, without purchase. He was an Ensign in 1839. He is the son of an old officer, and has himself served some twelve or fourteen years (out of his seventeen years in the army) on Foreign Service, having been that time in India and in the China Campaigns, and he has a medal for the Chinese war. He has a family, and has exchanged into the present regiment because it was impossible for him to support his family in England. He is now the oldest subaltern in active service, and he has applied to be appointed to an unattached company. But no;—he has no friends at the Horse Guards, and therefore, he still remains a subaltern.

I will now read to the House a most touching letter furnished to me by Sir William Napier, who has applied in vain on behalf of the writer to Lord Hardinge, the Commander in Chief. The writer is a Captain in the 44th regiment, and has been forty-four years in actual service:—

“This day is the fortieth anniversary of the battle of the Nivelle—How few survive of those whom you so gallantly led that day! Am I not privileged as one of your old followers to address you. . . I have been recommended for a brevet majority (1s. per diem). My Lord Hardinge rejected my claims to this trifling boon with the inconsistency of admitting that he entertains a full sense of my merits! He has promoted a legion of youngsters over me . . . Cependant n'importe la vie est si courte et si triste qu' on ne doit pas s'en chagriner!”

Mr. Layard then stated a case of a very opposite description; of a Captain S——, promoted without services stated, in 1853, to a Majority over the Senior Major of his own regiment, who had entered the army years before him, and had been in the Afghanistan and Punjaub Campaigns, and been severely wounded in the Kafir war. In 1855 this lucky individual was made Deputy and Quarter-Master-General and Lieutenant Colonel, with the certainty of full Colonel's rank in three years, he meantime retaining his company in his own regiment. This step put him over the head of a Lieutenant Colonel who was six years his senior, and had several times distinguished himself and been wounded in action. It also put him over the head of Brigade Major Simmons, who entered the service nine years before him, and was also several times distinguished and wounded in the Indian battles.

The honourable member went on to read a return by which it appeared that out of 116 Staff Officers, only seven had received certificates of competency from the senior department of the Royal Military College.

Turning to the second branch of his subject, the Diplomatic and Consular Services, he thus summed up his chief grounds of complaint against the first of those services :—

Heads of missions 21 of noble families—nearly all being the large and important missions. Private gentlemen 7, and chiefly in small missions. Secretaries of legation 17 belonging to the nobility, 7 of the other class. Fourteen paid attaches against 10. The Hon. Mr. Stanley of the Derby family made Secretary of Legation in three years; while Mr. Alison, confessedly a man of genius, has been kept in the Turkish Embassy since 1839 without rank as Secretary of Legation, or any increase of pay. In the Consular Service, there is no promotion, and the chief posts of it are given to men who have not served in the Subordinate posts. Men of ability are kept 30 years in insignificant positions, and are mulcted in their miserable salaries not only for income tax, but for what is called the “ Foreign Office Clerks’ fees,”—an abomination in itself.

Mr. Layard’s case in respect of the “ Civil Service,” the third division of his subject, was mainly rested upon the Reports of Commissions and Committees that have from time to time examined directly or incidentally into the system pursued in that service. He first quoted Mr. Romilly’s opinion—one of the gentlemen at this moment sitting as an “ Examiner ” under the new arrangements for testing the qualifications of candidates.

Active exertions in obtaining votes in the House of Commons, large sums of money spent in Elections, a sturdy adherence to one political party, at last followed by one adverse vote, just to indicate that the former unswerving devotion ought to be duly appreciated; these and similar considerations actuate the Minister of the day in dispensing receiverships, secretaryships, commissionerships and chairmanships, according as they fall vacant. In all cases, the men so chosen are appointed, not because they are peculiarly fit, but because as political adherents they must be provided for,—they look upon their appointments not as imposing new duties and opening an important field for fresh exertions, but as a reward for the past, and an agreeable and easy retirement for the future.

Sir James Stephens, of old and long established authority in matters official, especially when connected with the Colonial office, was the next witness cited, and from him Mr. Layard quoted the following description of the three classes into which the clerks of the Colonial Office are practically not technically divided.

The first, a very small minority, displayed qualities worthy of the highest admiration, large capacity of mind, literary powers of rare excellence, sound scholarship, indomitable energy, mature experience in public affairs and an absolute self-devotion to the public service. These men had been nearly all sought out and appointed on account of their well-ascertained fitness. * * *

The third class, greatly exceeding in number the two other classes united, possessed only in a low degree, and some of them in a degree almost incredibly low, either the talents or habits of men of business, or the industry, zeal, or knowledge required for the effective performance of their appropriate functions. * * * They were without exception men who had been appointed to gratify the political, the domestic or the personal feelings of their patrons.

The members of the second class, (much smaller than the third, though a little larger than the first) were chiefly, though not exclusively, indebted to nepotism for their introduction to the department.

Testimony of generally a similar nature was also given by Sir Charles Trevelyan and others.

One instance of evidence given against Mr. Layard's views was mentioned by him with considerable contempt. However, without agreeing with the opinions therein expressed, we shall hereafter, when noticing the remarks of a distinguished foreigner upon the Administrative Reform Movement, take occasion to shew that the evidence in question is not altogether so unworthy of consideration, as Mr. Layard and others of his rather advanced politics would have the public to believe. The person quoted is Mr. Romilly, one of the existing "Civil Service Examiners."

Admitting all the evils of patronage, I do not think the Civil Service should be made the instrument of the political regeneration of the country unless it be directly good for the service itself. Parliament ought to be able to cure its own diseases, without having recourse to the Civil Service * * * It seems to me that the result of open competition will be a democratical Civil Service side by side with an Aristocratic Legislature.

Open competition must necessarily be in favor of the more numerous class. The natural abilities of that more numerous class, the less rich—are not inferior to those of the higher. Inducements to cultivate those articles will not be wanting. The comparatively moderate prizes of the Civil Service rise in value as you descend in the scale of society. I therefore believe the great majority of the appointments will fall to those who are in the lower social position, and the more the Civil Service is recruited from the lower classes the less it will be sought after by the higher, until at last the aristocracy will be altogether dis-associated from the permanent Civil Service of the country."

The nature of the examinations actually existing in the various departments of Government, was then spoken of by Sir C. Trevelyan; and these we take from a Parliamentary Return on the subject, Number 216 of the Session of 1855, moved for by Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P. for Pontefract, and ordered to be printed in May of that year:—

TREASURY.

The candidates are examined in the common rules of arithmetic, such as the rule of three, vulgar and decimal fractions, interest, and discount; and they are required to make an abstract of some official documents, to test their intelligence, and to show that they are able to write and compose correctly.

The general nature of the examination is verbally explained to the candidates, and they are allowed any time not exceeding one month to prepare for it.

CUSTOMS.

Persons nominated to clerkships in the Customs, upon presenting themselves to take up their appointments are at once required to write from dictation in the presence of a properly qualified officer or clerk, and are examined in the principal rules of arithmetic, and the first four rules of decimal and vulgar fractions.

If upon this examination there should appear reasonable ground to believe that they will be qualified, they are placed on probation for three months; at the expiration of that period they are subjected to a further examination.

EXCISE.

No person is fully admitted as a clerk in the Excise (Inland Revenue) Office until he has been examined, and his proficiency has been ascertained in reading, writing, vulgar fractions, decimals, book-keeping by double entry, writing from dictation, correspondence, geography, and the history of the British Empire.

In the metropolitan post-offices, every person nominated to a clerkship is subjected to an examination in penmanship, orthography, and arithmetic; and if to a clerkship in the Secretary's department of the London office, the candidate is also required to draw up a summary of some official case from the original documents.

A candidate who passes the examination described above receives a conditional appointment, but at the end of three months a further report is made as to his competency before his appointment is confirmed.

No formal notice is given of the first examination, but on passing it the candidate receives notice of the second.

In regard to provincial post-offices, the appointment of the clerks is entrusted to the local postmasters, subject to the approval in each case of the Postmaster-general; and before any appointment is authorised the postmaster is required to send a specimen of the candidate's writing, and to make a written report on his qualifications.

The foregoing is an abbreviated statement (under the different headings of the various departments of Government) of the efforts made sponte sua by the Government in the direction of Administrative Reform. To these efforts Mr. Layard gave a certain degree of credit; but found fault with them in most instances as being too vague and general, and not sufficiently testing particular qualifications for particular offices.

Sir Stafford Northcote (M.P. for Dudley,) whose competency from official connexion and knowledge as well as other circumstances cannot be contested, spoke next upon the subject, and complained that Mr. Layard, according to a practice by no means uncommon with popular denunciators of grievances, had not suggested anything likely to be a practical remedy for the evils he complained of, confining himself nearly altogether to their exposition. His own suggestions (which he had mainly embodied in a joint Report drawn up by him in conjunction with Sir Charles Trevelyan in November 1853—viz. a Report “on the Organisation of the Civil Service,”) were “promotion by merit—division of labour in the offices and appointments by competition.”—appointments by patronage to be done away with—the scale of remuneration to be raised—and the existing system of superannuation so to be altered, that the deductions on that account from the annual salaries of the employes shall not be, as at present, lost to their families in case of death ere the period of active service is attained.

There are few grievances affecting the ordinary crowd of servants of the State, which so loudly call for reformation, as that involved in the system of superannuation thus alluded to by Sir Stafford Northcote. It is now some twenty years ago or more since the Act was passed which established it, and certainly it reflects but little credit upon senatorial wisdom that the consequences should not have been in some degree at least, foreseen and provided against. By that Act five per cent. was to be, and has been, deducted ever since from the annual income or salary of Government officials, to form, as was said, a fund for retiring allowances, and thus to save the country from the burthen of pensioning off her worn-out servants. How this worked we can most easily present to our readers by supposing a case of a similar system applied to private life.

A private gentleman then, we shall suppose, who has engaged a servant at the nominal rent of £20 a year wages, reserves to himself the power to retain five per cent. thereon, or £1 annually, in order to make a sum to give the man for his support when no longer able to work. In the first place, the reflection will suggest itself at once, that it would be better to let the man make his own economies, rather than thus strive to teach himself prudence in spite of himself. In the next place, assuredly if the man's services were worthy of £20 a year, he ought to get that sum for them, and if his long and faithful service deserved subsequent consideration, it would be no more than a fair and natural thing for the master to pension him out of his own pocket.

But supposing this servant, after some eight or nine years or thereabouts of good service should happen to die, and thus be of course beyond all requirement of superannuation allowance, would not the reader think it hard and gripping indeed if the master, instead of paying over to the widow and family of his deceased servant the £7 or £8 stopped as before mentioned from the man's salary during those years, should convert that sum to his own use, being enabled to do so by the want of express engagement to the contrary.

Yet this, of which we trust there is not an instance in private life, has been the constant practice of the great and enormously wealthy state of Great Britain and Ireland during the twenty years since the passing of the Act! and the case is rendered far worse by the fact, that although in consequence of the precariousness of human life, so many have died before accomplishing the period of public service to entitle them to compensation, that the fund created by the deductions mentioned has accumulated vastly—in fact, in something of a geometrical ratio of progression in successive periods of at most three or four years during the interval, there has been not the least abatement in the exaction, nor a single case of deviation from the iron rule and practice, no matter what the hardship may have been in hundreds of instances, and the large overplus of money resulting has been laid hold of by the State, and appropriated to other purposes!

The reader will surely agree that this is a point which ought to be very particularly borne in mind by the promoters of Administrative Reform. It is one thing to economize the public money, but it is quite another thing to detain and appropriate, as the State has evidently done, so much of the justly earned wages of those in its employment.

Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in moving his amendment, approved of a good deal that had been suggested by the Government Commissioners in reference to our subject, as also of the progress, such as it was, that had been made by the Government in carrying out their views; but found fault with them for want of originality, vigor and comprehensiveness of plan. He insisted much upon the advisability and propriety of requiring tests and examinations for high offices, as well as for those of more humble position, and for, as a general rule, shutting the doors of those high offices to all who had not graduated below; and he more than insinuated that in his opinion the conservative party, with whom he generally acts in the House, would furnish (including himself) the only safe statesmen to have the guidance and working out of safe Administrative Reform.

To the movement of which Mr. Layard has constituted himself the type and exponent in the House, Sir Edward Lytton thus objected:—

I do not think that those who are now so fiercely agitating against the influences of Party and of Parliament are aware of the logical consequences to which their agitation may lead. Talk thus loosely, yet thus fiercely, of the influences of party! The influences of party are the sinews of freedom! Party and freedom are twine. Oh yes, without the influences of party you might indeed have able and efficient men in your bureaux, but you will have exchanged the nerve and muscle of popular government for the clockwork machinery of despotism!

But, sir, to judge by the language out of doors, it is not meant to clear away the obstacles that beset the career of a clerk in a public office. No! it is meant to make the Queen's Government independent of the influences of party,—in other words, independent of the opinions of parliament.

That is the only way in which I can interpret the language we hear out of doors: why, sir, if it be meant that the crown is to appoint to the higher offices of state free from the influences of party and the opinions of Parliament, the Crown would become as absolute as in the time of the Tudors. And if these agitators say, "oh no, we did not mean that; we mean that the people are to dictate to the Crown, according to their ideas, who are to be ministers of state through other channels than parliamentary parties, through patriotic associations, and audiences accustomed plausu gaudere theatri." I tell them that they would root out the durable institutions of liberty to make room for the deadly ephemerals of the jacobin clubs. But if they say, "oh no, we mean neither the one nor the other"—what do they mean—except to bring Parliament into contempt and trust the chance of a substitute to the lottery of Revolutions!

But let the House enquire if the Government is not in some degree responsible for the loud cry which has been raised against family patronage and party influence? It has ever been the peculiar characteristic of the Whigs to concentrate power as much as possible within their own narrow and exclusive coteries, and to make a marked distinction between the great body of their supporters and the high bred materials from which they construct their cabinets * * * Now it is because the public have seen this exclusive principle, this pressure of family connexions, that now the cry has arisen against the governing classes.

As soon as possible this question must be taken out of the hands of agitators, and be turned to safe directions in the hands of statesmen.

Mr. Gladstone spoke the sentiments of the Peelite section of the House on this occasion.

There has been in the proceedings of the Administrative Reform Association, a tendency to fasten on the aristocracy of the country, and on a peculiar class known as the privileged class, the responsibility of the deficiencies and the weakness of the public service. It is only natural to construe the motion of the hon. member for Aylesbury as having to a certain degree the same tendency. I am not prepared to join in a proposition of that kind. * * * With regard to the motion of the Hon. Baronet by way of amendment, it takes no notice that for the last five years there has been a most searching and uniform investigation and revision of the public establishments. * * My main objection however is the vague and unmeaning language of the amendment * * The country I think is in danger of being misled by a number of feeble and illusory remedies.

On the part of the Government spoke the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir G. Cornwall Lewis, to the following effect.

So long as a popular assembly exists in a free country there must be a distinction between the Executive and Legislative Authority, and the executive must be entrusted with certain duties which the Legislative authority is incapable of discharging. * * * Could it be possible in any popular Government altogether to exempt appointments to administrative offices from party and political considerations? If we look to the United States we shall find the system of party and political influences carried to a much greater extent than ever in this country.

The necessity of a careful revision of our various official establishments is not justified by any omission on the part of Government. In 1844 a revision took place of the Home Department; and the result was the introduction of various reforms. In 1849 a revision of the Treasury took place, and also of the Colonial Office, and reforms were introduced into both. In 1852 an investigation was made with regard to the Irish Chief Secretary's Office, the Privy Council, Dublin, and the Fines and Penalties Office in the same city. Since then there has been a revision of the War Office, The Board of Trade, Committee of Council of Education, Colonial Land and Emigration Office, Copyhold Enclosure and Tithes Commission, Board of Ordnance, Office of Works, Post Office and office of the Registrar General. In all these cases extensive reforms have been the consequences.

"I cannot but think that the Order in Council (under which the "Examination" system was established) gives a practical proof of the efforts of Government for securing efficiency, and goes much further in that direction than the very general recommendations of meetings out of doors. .... So far as measures for the advancement of the cause of Administrative Reform are concerned, we have gone as far as it is in the power of any one to embody practically the suggestions that have been made.

The young and able, and somewhat enthusiastically Radical Lord Goderich began by attributing the cry throughout the country for Administrative Reform to the revelations of the Sebastopol Inquiry Committee. .... He complained that the Government had made no declaration of purposing to deal with the important branch of the subject which involved Army Promotion, and particularly found fault with their silence upon what appeared to him the most needed reform in military matters—the placing the whole War department under the undivided control of a minister sitting in and responsible to Parliament. He desired to see the total abolition of Government nominations in respect to offices in the Civil Service; and protested against the system of confining the high offices in the Government to one class.

The people of this country were becoming more and more inclined every day to say, "The Aristocracy have had the monopoly of employment, things have gone wrong under their rule ; we will hold them responsible," and he was afraid the time would come when the people would say, "as the Aristocracy have hitherto had too large a share of the administration of public affairs, for the future we will exclude them altogether."

There might be danger to free institutions unless Parliament performed the task set before them, of proving that free institutions and good administration were not incompatible.

The eccentric Mr. Drummond, member for West Surrey, cited a number of cases to prove that the charges of bad selection of officials from the exercise of patronage, motives of favoritism, corruption, &c., and the consequent blunders and failures in large enterprizes and establishments, were as applicable to the managers and directors of private affairs, as to those of the public.

Lord Palmerston cited the fact of Mr. Layard's own appointment to the under-secretaryship of the Foreign Department as an instance that routine and favoritism and aristocratic influences were not so omnipotent as was asserted. He bore testimony to the strictness with which the examination system was enforced, and mentioned the case of a young man recommended by himself who had been rejected under it. He then proceeded to call to notice several appointments to high offices of men whose merit could not be contested—warned the House against expecting too much from the competition, and examination system, as in such a country as England there were too many openings in private enterprize and the professions for young men of talent and energy, to make it likely that any great proportion of that class would seek the small and tardy rewards of the Civil Service, and concluded by adopting the wordy and vague amendment of Sir Bulwer Lytton "as a pledge," he said, "that Government would direct its serious attention to a continued revision of the different offices connected with the state."

We have now given the marrow of the Debate which first fully and fairly placed before Parliament the question of Administrative Reform. Since then, and down to within not very many days of that on which we are writing, there have been various debates and motions on the same subject—some dealing with one branch of it, some with another, and some with it as a whole, but none more clearly setting forth what is sought to be accomplished by the movement than the Debate which we have endeavoured to epitomize. The question meantime has not only held its ground, but gained fresh ground, and on the last occasion alluded to, Lord Goderich has managed to surprise and win a victory over Ministers on a motion which directly goes to do away with patronage altogether.

Whether this extreme principle can be successfully or to any great extent practically, carried out—as also whether it ought so to be if it could—are grave questions for consideration. If it cannot, then it ought not to be so much agitated, and rising men in Parliament ought to think in time of the responsibilities they are incurring in their high-pressure agitation in respect of it, and see whether it would not be more in the public interest, and in that of their own future career, to practice a little self-denial on this exciting and popular topic, and seek to make their way to distinction by another road.

On the point as to whether the extreme principle ought to be carried out if it could, or can be, there is much to be said—much to be most carefully reasoned upon and examined.

One aspect—for there are more than one—of the danger which may not only with plausibility, but with not a little sound reason, be predicated of so total a change in the mode of distributing or attaining public employment, has been casually touched upon in the extract we have given from Sir Balwer Lytton's speech, but is more developed in the following remarks on the subject by M. le Comte de Montalembert in his recently published Pamphlet entitled, “De L'Avenir Politique de L'Angleterre.”

Le mouvement qui se résume sous le nom de la Réforme Administrative est l'indice d'une tendance dangerouse chez le Peuple Anglais. Autrefois le nombre des fonctions publiques était plus restreint qu'aujourd'hui. Le fonctionnaire nommé et rétribué par l'Etat semblait un être tout à fait exceptionnel ; il n'inspirait ni estime ni envie à l'immense majorité des Anglais qui ne demandoient point des places, n'en éprouvait pas le besoin, et se résignaient sans effort à ce que le petit nombre de celles qui existaient fussent l'apanage exclusif des clients de l'aristocratie ou des parvenus du monde politique, cet état de choses a changé comme en France, l'extension de l'éducation chez les masses, en déclassant une foule d'individus, a créé une foule d'aspirants à la bureaucratie, et d'un autre côté les progrès lents mais incontestables de la centralisation administrative a augmenté le nombre de places à donner. La demande est et sera toujours très supérieure à l'offre ; mais l'un et l'autre se sont accrues.

C'est le plus grand péril de la Société Anglaise ; le mal est loin d'être aussi grand que chez les Nations du Continent, mais l'An-glotture est déjà sur la pente fatale. Il est temps pour ses hommes d'Etat de reconnaître que le désir universel et immodéré des emplois publics est la pize des maladies sociales. Elle répand dans tout le corps de la Nation une humeur vénale et servile qui n'exclut nullement, même chez les mieux pourvus, l'esprit de faction et d'anarchie. Elle crée une foule d'affamés capable de toutes les fureurs pour satisfaire leur appétit, et propres à toutes les bassesses des qu'ils sont rassasiés. Un Peuple de solliciteurs est le dernier des peuples. Il n'y a pas d'ignominie par où on ne puisse le faire passer.

La Vritable Réforme Administrative consisterait donc à réprimer énergiquement la tendance démocratique qui multiplie les emplois, qui fait remplir par les agens salariés, nommés et révoqués au gré du gouvernement; les fonctions naguère gratuites, inamovibles ou électives; qui augmente indéfiniment la responsabilité du pouvoir, et qui finit par l'accabler, sous le poids des cupidités impatientes, des rancunes implacables, et des dévouemens impuissans. Tous Les Anglais dévoués à la grandeur de leur pays devraient se liguier pour refouler ce flot continental de la bureaucratie qui mine peu à peu ses antiques institutions et qui finira par engloutir sa prospérité, sa liberté et sa gloire!

Quant à la Réforme qui consiste à tenir plus largement ouverte la porte des carrières où l'intervention du pouvoir est obligatoire telles que l'Armée, la Marine, la Diplomatie, elle est dans les nécessités du temps; et elle se fera comme se font toutes les réformes en Angleterre, graduellement et sincèrement. L'Essentiel est de ne pas accroître démesurément le nombre des candidats avec celui des primes à décerner."

Mais qu'on ne se le dissimule pas—dans l'état actuel des mœurs anglaises il ne s'agit guère que d'une lutte entre deux catégories de fils cadet—ceux des familles titrées et des grands propriétaires fonciers et ceux des nouveaux riches sortis des classes moyennes.

The answer that has by anticipation been given to these well reasoned fears of M. de Montalembert is, that Administrative Reform does not seek to multiply places, nor to render them more attractive, but to substitute talent and merit for favoritism and interest in the selection of the men to fill them. But when once it shall be declared, as by the success of Lord Goderich's recent motion in the House of Commons it practically is declared at the present moment, that the narrow channels of favoritism and interest are no longer at all to exist, but utterly to give place to the broad river of unlimited competition, there is too much reason to fear that multitudes who can now command no interest, nor count upon a patron, and therefore have resignedly and manfully committed themselves to the industrial battle in the more difficult and laborious, but finally more remunerative, and at all times more honorable careers of the professions and callings of private life, will turn from these, and seek a shorter, and what appears to them an easier way towards emolument, by contending for place.

All cannot be successful, many cannot be successful—nay of course but a small minority can possibly be successful. But all will think themselves entitled—few—very few indeed, will acquiesce quietly in their own rejection, and whatever Government may rule the day, will have in the merest self-defence to enlarge the field of public employment in the hope, whether well founded or not we will not now stop to predict, of lessening the number of the disappointed applicants or assailants, as we may with a not inaccurate synonymy, designate them.

The injurious effects of "Bureaucracy," as is compendiously designated the system of multiplying public offices and employments, are too plainly visible in Prussia and in France to need much comment. It spreads as it were a vast network of official superintendence and interference over those countries, which embarrasses and represses all individual and communal action; the main strings of the whole being necessarily in the hands of the central Government, to be by them tightened or relaxed at pleasure, and according as it may suit their purposes and policy.

How this "Bureaucracy" or "Functionarism" as it is sometimes called by English writers, grew up to its present rankness and intricacy and mischievousness on the Continent, is well shewn by Mr. Laing in his "Second Series of the Notes of a Traveller"; (being "Observations on the Social and Political State of European People in 1848 and 1849,") published in London in 1850.

Continental sovereigns after 1815 appear to have felt as by a common instinct, that their kingly power was in a false position in the new social state which the general diffusion of landed property had produced. It wanted a barrier and a support. They all attempted as by common accord, to create a third element in the social structure, and to replace the class of nobles having large landed property with more or less of the social influence belonging to such property, by substituting functionarism for aristocracy as a support of their thrones.....The art of Government has been described to be the making two-thirds of a nation pay all it possibly can for the benefit of the other third. This is realized by the functionary system. All this functionarism, with its numerous ranks and gradations filled with a staff of clerks and expectants in every department looking for employment, appointments of promotions was intended to be a new support of Government, a third class in close connexion with the people by their various official duties of interference in all public or private affairs, yet attached by their interests to the governing power.

In France, at the expulsion of Louis Philippe, the civil functionaries were stated to amount to 807,030 individuals.....In every modern state functionaries are necessarily numerous. But we would be rather surprised to hear our own collectors, comptrollers, assessors, tidewaiters, gaugers, considered as a high and influential class, or considered as a class at all in any way distinct from the respectable middle class in which they are merged.....The general movement in 1848 in every country governed by this Bureaucracy, to get rid of it and obtain liberal constitutions, proves that it is not the true intermediate element required in the new social state of continental Europe. In countries that had constitutional or representative assemblies the movement was not less violent than in the most autocratically governed states.

The functionary class wants the moral dignity of character which has influence with a people in times of social disruption, and forms a dangerous machinery not only ready to inflict misgovernment and oppression on the country but ready to support any one who gets hold of the reins of Government at the point in which they are centralized.....In a Monarchical Government it serves neither king nor people, and it is dangerous to the liberty of the more democratical states. (pp. 183-193.)

Mr. Laing goes on to remark that two states, democratical Norway in the old world, and the United States in the new, have endeavoured by opposite means to check and correct the dangerous tendencies of functionarism. Norway has tried it by giving public functionaries a vested right in their offices, from which they cannot be dismissed by the Executive without a previous enquiry and sentence by an independent court. Claims to promotion and the fair selection of the most deserving for first appointments are under the guardianship of Committees of the Legislative Branch of the State. Under these circumstances public functionaries are emboldened to speak, act and vote against Government wherever they have the opportunity and the will. In America the whole staff of Government from the very highest to the lowest is changeable, and is generally changed every four years, usually with every change in the presidency, and where changes do not occur, it is only by the goodwill and sufferance of the new president. Not ignoring the disadvantages that attend on either of these two systems, he yet prefers either of them with all their inconveniences or evils to the system before described in Prussia, France, &c., upon which he makes the following further remarks:—

The indirect effects of the functionary system deteriorates the character and retards the prosperity and industry of the people of Germany, &c. &c. as much as its direct effects. The whole youth of the country are kept in a state of dependence, looking for an appointment to a public office, instead of depending upon industry and exertion in the useful arts.....A great proportion of the small capitals gathered by tradesmen, shopkeepers, farmers, functionaries, clergymen, and others in the middle station of life, is thus wasted in maintaining these expectants in idleness. The same capitals would be applied here in extending business. Such savings as we have with us the foundations of almost all our commercial and manufacturing prosperity, while in Germany they are spent in supporting sons at a university to qualify them for office, and then in supporting them in some inferior office of the state, till a higher step and salary can be obtained. The prospect of office turns away the industry and capital that might be employed with more advantage to the country and the individual in the humbler paths of trade. (Laing, p. 198, &c)

The evils thus well and truthfully described by Mr. Laing and prognosticated for England by her encomiast M. de Montalembert, notwithstanding all his anxiety to see everything belonging to her and every movement of hers in the most favorable and coulour de rose point of view, would surely be bad enough in themselves, but there is a very probable, if not inevitable, circumstance of aggravation which is further to be taken into account.

The question arises, what would be the influences of this system upon the form of Government? This consideration evolves another face of the danger to be predicated of the state of things likely to ensue from the extreme principle embodied in Lord Goderich's motion.

It is to be borne in mind in the first place, that although the revolutionary whirlwind of 1848 passed without violent result over England, no person who is acquainted with the real state of feeling and tendency of mind among her people doubts that revolutionary principles and ideas are very rife amongst them. M. le Comte de Montalembert, somewhat superficial observer as he is, does not escape being struck with it. At page 224 of this Pamphlet he says:—

Personne ne se fait illusion sur le péril que présente d'un côté la propagande des idées démocratiques par une presse que rien ne restreint, de l'autre l'accroissement prodigieux de la population ouvrière des villes et des fabriques, étrangère inabordable à toute influence religieuse et enfantée par le développement de cette production houillère qui a dépassé toute attente et renversé toutes les proportions de l'ancienne société anglaise.

It is all very well talking of the barrier which the numerous classes in England having an interest in the existing state of things, would oppose to any organic change. It is very plausible to cite the occurrences of the 11th of April 1848, when householders of high and low degree turned out with special constable batons to stay the "fierce democracy." In the latter case the "fierce democracy" consisted of about a hundred "gamins" with a large intermixture of pickpockets, and about as much represented a grave popular movement, as the five or six scene-shifters who come in with Richmond and with Richard the III. alternately, represent the armies that held bloody argument on Bosworth field.

It should and it ought for common safety to be borne in mind, that not only the wild and distracted and most disastrous movements on the Continent in 1848, but notably the Great French Revolution itself, began with the middle classes—with the classes who had an interest in peace and order, and who never for one moment contemplated giving rein and opportunity to the hideous excesses that followed. They thought it no harm to take a short cut towards removing the social inequalities between themselves and the class immediately above. They never dreamt that the same views might actuate the classes below them, whose wild energies and passions they excited and used for their own purposes, but found they could not restrain when the desired point was attained, and so in their turn had to succumb and share the fate of the fallen aristocracy. At this moment there is in the hearts of the rich and powerful middle class of England a similar desire for some sudden movement that shall raise them, as they think it would, to the topmost platform of the State, but they forget that the volcano's workings are ever sure to upheave from its lowest depths the desolating lava that sweeps away the pleasant villa as well as the lordly castle. Unthinking of this, or deliberately ignoring it, the middle classes of England, like the bourgeois class of Louis the Sixteenth's reign—like the "gros épicier" class of Louis Philippe's reign—like the "moderate liberals" and reformers of other countries in 1848, will go on with their coquettings with democracy, till in their turn—which may Heaven long avert—they, and all like them, will be suddenly crushed and overwhelmed.

If the Charing Cross riot of 1848—in which we repeat that none but a set of boys and pickpockets were really engaged—tended to inspire, by its easy and total rout and suppression, a feeling of confidence in the resisting and controlling power of the higher and middle orders of the State, the occurrences in Hyde Park on the occasion of the introduction into Parliament of Lord Robert Grosvenor's obnoxious and intermeddling and hypocritical Sunday trading bill, ought to disabuse us to no small degree of that confidence. Police, upper and middle classes, and all authority, was set at nought, and His Majesty the People loudly proclaimed and rather roughly proved that he would have his own way, and punish in his own way those who wanted to interfere with his pleasure. And the Parliament of England succumbed to this real popular movement—succumbed unconvinced, sorely against the grain, but succumbed absolutely, undignifiedly, and instantly! It has now established a precedent against itself—it has taught the movement-classes the secret of their own power, and if the latter do not better the instruction, it will be against the experience of the world hitherto, which has uniformly shewn that hasty and extortionate concessions were but made the groundwork for fresh demands and exactions.

Taking, then, into serious consideration the temptation and tendency inseparable from a wide-spread and unmixed system of competition for public offices, towards, in the first place, diverting young men's energy and capital from independent enterprise to venal and idle expectancy—in the second place, towards compelling the Government of the day to enlarge continually the circle within which that expectancy is to be gratified by multiplying places and its own patronage, and, finally, towards working a mongrel and disastrous, yet effective, revolution of its own by the overpressure of the crowd of applicants—the ingratitude of some, the exasperation of others—the grasping cupidity of all—the whole resulting in the overthrow of successive forms of government till the most reckless or the most iron of all is reached;—taking also into consideration the predisposing tendencies of the potent middle classes of England towards revolutionary change, and their very questionable power of checking or moderating that change when once begun—taking further into consideration the unquestionably Republican tendencies of the lower classes and the unhappy precedent given them last year of how they overawe and control the Legislature and the Executive—surely cannot be denied that there is something to "g pause" to all who do not mean Revolution and Republicanism ; and to induce them not to press too fast and too extremely a movement like that for Administrative Reform ; which, if judiciously, moderately, and seasonably handled, is capable of most beneficial results, but, like everything else, and more than most things, is capable of most serious abuse and evil if pushed on too fast and too far.

It would surely be better to bear for yet a while longer with the small remnants now existing of undue aristocratic privileges—the ills we know—rather than to open blindly and rashly the Pandora's box of democracy with its single gloomy hope at bottom, that of finally finding refuge in the stern quietude of despotism.

A good deal has been accomplished already, quite enough to ensure that, even if no further progress was made (a thing impossible), still there would be left permanent traces of the movement upon the surface of our political society, and permanent ameliorations of much that was unsound or defective before. That our readers may have a sufficient general idea of what the Civil Service Commission of last year—the first forced fruits of the Administrative Reform Movement—has been about, and what experiences it has had, we shall proceed to give extracts from their first Report, this year presented to Parliament by command of her Majesty.

Sir Edward Ryan, Assistant Comptroller General of the Exchequer, Mr. John George Shaw Lefevre (brother to the Speaker of the House of Commons) Clerk Assistant of the House of Lords, and Mr. Edward Romilly, Chairman of the Board of Audit, were the Commissioners appointed about a year ago.

Early in their first Report, after mentioning the steps taken by them, in conjunction with the heads of Public Departments, to establish or extend a system of examination of candidates for appointment to junior situations, they give the following summary table of the number of examinations in the ten months that their system was fully at work :—

It would be going into unnecessary detail to give the Commissioners' explanations of the particular causes of rejection. We may record, however, that 69 out of the 300 cases and upwards where that decision was come to, were, on account of deficiency in the most ordinary and elementary branches of education—spelling, writing, and simple arithmetic, and upwards of 2 more on account of deficiency in spelling, conjoined with deficiencies in the not very abstrusive requirements of knowledge of book-keeping, history and geography.

At page xix of their Report the Commissioners offer the following general observations upon the subject of their labours.—

The great differences which exist in the situations for which certificates of qualification are required render it obviously desirable that there should be corresponding differences in the standards by which the knowledge and ability of candidates are tested. It will, however, be apparent, on reference to the tables printed in the Appendix, that the schemes of examination there collected have been framed with little regard to this principle. There are, indeed, numerous variations, but they have arisen principally, if not entirely, from the circumstances under which the schemes were framed. It has already been stated that we deemed it expedient to adopt, not only in substance but with almost literal exactness, the suggestions furnished by the authorities of the several departments, and it was not to be expected that these suggestions should be in all respects identical.

* During the same period there were 381 candidates examined in the provinces, making a total of 1,078. The number of certificates granted in the same interval was 676, and the number refused, 309.

As the duties and prospects of a junior clerk in a large proportion of Your Majesty's Civil Establishments are nearly the same, we consider that greater simplicity of standard would be desirable, and at the same time easily to be attained. With the view of obtaining this simplicity we propose to place ourselves in communication with the heads of the departments, to ascertain clearly from them the specialités which they regard as necessary, and to submit for their consideration schemes of examination in which these specialités will receive due attention, while at the same time the ordinary attainments required by all alike are defined in uniform terms.

There are some qualifications, however, which appear to us to be indispensably necessary to a junior clerk in every Government office, and, with very few exceptions, to all persons appointed to any junior situation; viz. :—

To write a good hand.

To be able to spell correctly.

To be able to write a simple letter grammatically.

To be conversant with the elementary portions of arithmetic.

There is doubtless some little difficulty in deciding what shall be the minimum of handwriting. We know no better definition than that which we find in the rules for examination authorized by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, namely :—"that good handwriting should consist in the clear "formation of the letters of the alphabet."

Having regard also to the use, in several departments, of copying machines, we conceive that the requirement of the Committee of Council of Education in this respect, "that the handwriting should be rapid, neat, and of that even stroke which allows legible copies to be taken by pressing," would be reasonable and useful in various cases.

We regret to say, that hitherto we have found it impossible to place the standard of writing generally on this satisfactory footing. Had we insisted on it the public service would have been obstructed by the rejection of the great number of candidates whose writing does not satisfy either of these conditions.

We hope, nevertheless, that in a short time when it shall have become publicly known that such good handwriting as is above described is indispensable, the candidates who are sent to us will have made themselves masters of an accomplishment which we believe it to be within the power of every diligent person to attain.

The requirement of correct spelling is not only necessary in order that the correspondence of the department may not be discreditable, but also as shewing whether the candidate has received a good education.

The most frequent of these failures have been of course among the candidates for the lower class of situations, especially tidewaiterships.

With regard to these, we have, in accordance with the rule prescribed for their examination by the authorities of the Customs, limited their requirement of orthography to "tolerable spelling only;" and we think that it will be admitted, on inspection of the Table G. in the Appendix showing the spelling in various cases of rejection, that we have not excluded any one who satisfies that definition.

The numerous cases in which we have been obliged to refuse certificates on account of bad spelling might, unless otherwise accounted for, lead to an erroneous impression as to the general state of education of the youth of the country. There are, however, other causes to be taken into account, &c.

And so the Commissioners go on to endeavour to assign somewhat recondite reasons for the not very creditable fact to which they have been forced to bear testimony. It is, as may well be imagined, not worth while to follow them in this part of their subject, and we shall therefore go on to what is of real interest and importance, in so far at least as their own fitness for the business with which they have been entrusted is concerned, namely, their statement of the general principles on which they have proceeded.

We do not wish to be understood as holding the opinion that an intellectual examination, however carefully conducted, affords a complete and unerring test of the qualification of candidates for official employment.

We admit that there are aptitudes for the transaction of business which cannot be discovered or measured by this process; but it is nevertheless certain that our examination furnishes the means of excluding the incompetent, and where competing examinations take place or the candidate submits himself to voluntary examination in extra subjects, his intellectual qualities may, to a great extent, be accurately ascertained. In this manner the departments are supplied with information as to the capacity and special acquirements of their clerks, and are better able to judge of the most advantageous mode of applying their services in the transaction of public business and of the relative merits of parties, which have to be weighed in cases of promotion.

We have satisfaction also in knowing that if, notwithstanding the examination by the Commission, any incompetent person should find his way into the public service, the period of six months' probation which the Order in Council requires, will afford an opportunity to the department to ascertain his deficiencies, and to dispense with his services. We expect to derive advantage from watching the results of this probation, and accordingly we propose to request the several departments to inform us of every case in which candidates who have received our certificates shall have been found inefficient, so as not to justify the confirmation of their appointment. We think that this information may enable us to ascertain and to remedy defects which may exist, either in the principle or the practice of our examinations.

We have thus far addressed ourselves exclusively to that portion of our proceedings which relates to the examination of candidates for the purpose of ascertaining their intellectual qualifications.

This, however, is only one of the points to which we are required by the Order in Council to direct our attention.

We shall proceed to offer some observations on the other points which that order requires us to ascertain, (namely,) age, health, and character.

There is at present some variety in the rules in force in different departments with respect to the minimum and maximum ages of admission.

With regard to the minimum, it seems to us desirable that it should not be fixed so low as to encroach on the ordinary period allotted to education, inasmuch as the amount and nature of the official occupations of a junior clerk is generally such as to leave but little opportunity to him of supplying deficiencies in his previous general education.

It is more difficult to arrive at a definite opinion as to the maximum age at which a candidate should be admissible on the permanent establishment of the departments.

The age most usually prescribed by the several departments as the maximum for admission is 25, and we do not think that a higher limit should be adopted.

With regard to health, we have in general been satisfied with a certificate from a respectable medical practitioner who had personal knowledge of the candidate, and could declare that he was not subject to any disease or infirmity which would be likely to interfere with the proper discharge of his duties.

The duty of ascertaining the character of the candidate is attended with considerable difficulty.

To obtain accurate information on that point, to correspond with his referees, would require such an interval as to create serious inconvenience by the long vacancy of the office. Even a single week, which is barely enough for the intellectual examiner, has given rise to enquiries as to the cause of the delay.

We have tried to meet these difficulties by regulations in a circular addressed to heads of departments which will be found in Appendix IV. ; but we are well aware of the proverbial facility with which favourable testimonials are obtained from partial or good-natured friends, and we think that although some security against the admission of unworthy persons will be derived from our arrangements, care should be taken that the individual who actually nominates should not be relieved from responsibility on this point, by transferring it to the Civil Service Commissioners.

The following few extracts from several pages (in the Appendix of the Report) of similar blundering, will give an idea of the mistakes in orthography made by candidates :—

Then follow specimens of a dictated theme and of official papers to make a précis or abstract of. Next in order come portions of Cicero and of Tacitus, Horace's Odes, "Angustus tam amici pauperiem pati," and "Cur me querelis exanimatus"—an extract from Charles the First's address to his judges to be translated into Latin—French into English, and vice versa translations. Ditto German, prose and poetry—Dates required, as of "The Deluge," "The Exodus," "The Building of Rome," "The Peloponnesian War," "The Hegira," "The Coronation of Charlemagne," "The Invention of Printing," "The Revolution," and "The Separation of the Crowns of Great Britain and Hanover." 18. Mention any beneficial changes accomplished at the commencement of the first French revolution.
19. The last hundred years being altogether excluded, what was, in your opinion, the most glorious and what the most disgraceful era in English History? Give your reasons in detail.

The concluding question of the above series is one that we should imagine likely to draw forth a rather striking diversity of opinions from the candidates, according to their bias, political and religious, especially in reference to the latter. The Protestant will, of course, triumphantly pronounce that the "Reformation," or the Revolution of 1688 in its most ultra-Protestant aspect, was the most glorious; and that king John's submission to the Pope's legate, or the reign of Philip and Mary, furnished the most disgraceful. It is unnecessary to speculate on the widely discrepant views of the Roman Catholic, but that they will be widely and utterly discrepant there cannot be the shadow of a doubt.

The appendix on these subjects is very long, and contains a variety of papers for candidates of various branches, but the general character of the examination is similar to the specimen we have given in the case of the junior situations of the War Department. This appendix concludes with several lithographs of MSS. purposely or accidentally misspelt in various places, or deficient in punctuation, which the candidate is called upon to correct in both particulars, and to copy out clean.

At first perusal of this Report and its Appendices, one would be inclined to think that a very considerable step has been made towards the desired Reform of the Civil Service in some of its most important branches. But the Administrative Reform Association appear to think otherwise. In one of their earlier of their publications they say:

"To expect Administrative Reform to be wrought out by such hands (i.e., the present high officials of Departments) is idle and Utopian. The Reform must be compelled from without: way must be made for the ablest men to every office in the State, by force of the public will.

"The recent appointment of the Examining Board is no real measure of Administrative Reform. It retains to the political chiefs of offices, the patronage and rights of appointments, and by them and the permanent officials of Departments, that portion of Administrative Reform comprised in the new order in Council for the establishment of an Examining Board will be mainly entrusted."

In order to see exactly what it is, that this Association which has taken upon itself the championship of the question of Reform requires, we extract the prayer of their Petition on the subject, presented last year to the House of Commons. After a long preamble, in which they set forth the conclusions they deduce on the state of the Public Service from "The Report of the Committee appointed to enquire into the condition of the Army before Sebastopol"—the Report of 1850 of the Committee "on Official Salaries"—that of the "Committee of Enquiry into Public Offices" in 1854, and other "sources of authentic information," they—

1. Pray—"That the system of nomination to offices through the Secretary of the Treasury may cease.
2. That the Bill at present before Parliament for regulating the appointments of junior clerks may, with such amendments as may be thought fit, be passed into law.

3. That admission to the public service may be opened on equal terms upon conditions of character, fitness, and merit to all subjects of Her Majesty.

4. That there may be established a system of promotion based upon fitness and merit, which shall include the whole of the non-ministerial offices of the Civil Service.

5. That fitness and merit for appointment may be determined by public competitive examination.

6. That the grounds of promotion may be determined by testimonials of Heads of Departments and by public competitive examination.

7. That Examiners may be appointed to hold public competitive examinations, grant certificates of fitness and merit, and confer certain distinctions.

8. That all appointments may, in the first instance, be made by Heads of offices, in conformity with recommendations of the Examiners for a period of probation only, and may be confirmed only at the close of the term of probation by the nonministerial Heads of offices or departments.

9. That to the Heads of offices and departments may be entrusted the entire office arrangements, power to dismiss for incompetence or neglect of duties, and that they may have placed at their disposal full means for the conduct of the business of their department, and shall be held responsible for its full and punctual performance.

10. That a Royal Commission may be appointed to inquire into the present condition and efficiency of the Civil Service with a view to the complete reorganization of the offices and departments, and the removal, on equitable terms, of such persons as may be found, from whatever cause, incompetent for their duties.

11. That the Commissioners may be required to lay before your Hon. House at an early period a complete list of the whole of the Government departments and offices, their duties, staff, expenditure, and entire number of persons employed; and may be authorized to transfer such persons as may be found wrongly placed to offices better suited to their acquirements.

12. That a better scale of payment may be adopted in the public service.

13. That the system of superannuation, stoppages, and retiring allowances, may be materially altered. That in the Diplomatic Service there be established the profession of a British interpreter.

14. That care be taken to appoint fit men to the office of consul. The system of consular fees to be abolished and fixed salaries established.

15. That measures be taken to establish a self-supporting system of military education. Commissions to be conferred for fitness and merit.

16. That staff appointments be given as the prizes of the highest military service and ability.

17. That promotion from the ranks may be more widely thrown open, and be based upon a system of achievement and efficiency.

18. That the rule of promotion by seniority, which puts men advanced in years in the positions of commander in chief, Generals of Division and Brigades &c. be forthwith rescinded, and that men in the prime and vigour of life be appointed.

19. That the pay of all ranks be placed on a more equitable footing.

20. That the exclusive power of appointment and promotion in the Navy be withdrawn from the first Lord of the Admiralty.

21. That certificates for Naval Cadetships be obtainable by merit, determined by open and competitive examination.

22. That no assistant surgeon in Army or Navy be appointed unless fully qualified, and that medical pay and rank be increased.

23. That competent medical authorities be appointed to grant certificates under special circumstances to parties presenting themselves to act as assistant-surgeons.

24. That a dispensing department be constituted as a distinct branch of the service.

25. That the jurisdiction of Parliament upon railway and private bills may cease, and that tribunals be established, with power for the adjudication of such bills in the cheapest and most expeditious manner.

26. That the several changes in the civil, diplomatic, military, and naval services be effected without unnecessary delay.

And your Petitioners will ever pray!

It will be seen that the demands of this Association are not likely to be charged with want of comprehensiveness at any rate. The Army, the Navy, the Diplomatic Service, all the Departments of the Civil Service at home and abroad, the Medical Service, Civil and Military, the powers of Parliament, and to a certain extent those of the judicature of the country also, come within the sweep of their net! And the whole is crowned by the request, or rather demand, that the several changes mentioned be effected without delay!

Now, with every regard for the certainly very respectable names that appear on the muster roll of this Association, and for the doubtless most patriotic motives that have animated them one and all in thus coming together to consult for the public weal, we cannot think that the body they belong to has altogether achieved that position in the country, which would entitle it to assume the tone of dictation and extreme urgency which its demands betray. Even in a proved case of needful changes there is a slowness in what the Americans would call the "action taken upon them," in England, characteristic of the cool, reasoning temperament of her people, and however irritating to enthusiasts, very salutary in its ultimate effect, as it ensures the maturing of any change, and avoids the many evils that attend upon rashness and sudden innovation. And the demonstrations of the Administrative Reform Association will, unless very judiciously conducted indeed, and successful in securing a greater amount of general support and sympathy than it has at present, in nothing tend to hasten matters, but rather, if they have any effect, to suggest the propriety of even increased caution and care in making the next onward step.

The vote of the House of Commons on Lord Goderich's motion of last month, was undoubtedly calculated to give the impression that this "next onward step" should be taken at once. But the practical good sense of England has come to the rescue, and in effect nullified that vote by denying to its promoters and supports the weight and influence necessary to compel the carrying out of its objects.

The "Administrative Reform Association" have published many tracts, in several of which there are no doubt sound principles advocated; but still oftener there is but the reproduction of trite and stale truisms and vague enunciations, and wordy and unnecessary vindications of general principles. We would propose to them a more practical course, and one that will far better subserve the end they have proposed to themselves than the course they have hitherto pursued. Let them no longer waste time in undisputed generalities, sweeping animadversions against all who do not at once bow their judgments to the Association's dogmas, and theoretical speculations of the loosest kind. Let them apply their intellects to shewing, if they can, that the extreme reforms they would so hastily urge, are not likely to be attended by the dangers predicated of them by men as sincerely anxious for real reform and effective (but sound) progress as the members of this Association can possibly be. Let them demonstrate if they can, that the open, unbridled, untempered system of appointment by competition, and competition alone, will not operate to introduce the evils of Bureaucracy to which we have such unexceptionable witnesses, and will not increase and largely develop the already formidable tendency there is in public affairs towards centralization, with the ultimate and inevitable consequence of making the Government all in all, and adding new incentives to ambition and rapacity to seize upon it and use it for the purposes of despotism.

The well known Prussian statesman and writer, the Chevalier Bunsen, for so many years the Representative at the British Court of the Prussian Government—a man whom an English Periodical, the "North British Review," speaks of in the following quaint but highly laudatory terms, viz :—"a thoroughly educated, highly accomplished, well-experienced, pious, patriotic, healthy-bodied, healthy-minded, and in every respect harmonious and well-rounded German gentleman" (!)—has lately published in his own country, a work entitled, "Signs of the Times : Letters to Friends on Freedom of Conscience and the Rights of Christian Congregations :—" in which the following occur, pertinent to our subject, and relating to a portion of his own.

On my return to my own country last summer, after fourteen years' absence, I began to compare the impressions with which I had left Germany with the more ripe views which, through more extended study and a more large experience, had obtained.....I confess as a German and as a Prussian not without sorrow, that experience and reflection have convinced me of the truth of the political principle, that the system of centralization is inconsistent with the education of the people to true freedom, and is a system which, in the long run, weakens more than it strengthens.

It will be for the pamphleteers of the Administrative Reform Association to shew how they purpose to avoid this "rock ahead" of centralization. If any Government at all is to be carried on, there must be "places" and "offices" under it, and these "places" and "offices" no matter how appointed to, must in their management and in reference to the duration of tenure, be absolutely under the control of the Government of the day. Let then the sphere of appointments be enlarged as it inevitably must, under the influence of the clamour of the multitudes disappointed in the open and general competition for office to which the youth of the country are now to be invited, and the influence of the Government of the day must, so long as it holds together as a Government, be proportionally or perhaps we should better say, out of all proportion, increased. But the energies which will have been thus seduced and perverted from the plain and open and honorable road of industrial enterprise, or professional ambition, to what is really neither more nor less than place hunting under the deceitfully alluring form of the reward of merit, will prove as unruly in fruition of their success as in the struggle to obtain it. The immediate authority, or actual form of Government will then have to enter upon a battle for existence, and "weakened more than strengthened," as the Chevalier Bunsen remarks, by the extreme centralization, it will have to give place to another form, in its turn to be forcibly changed, and changed again, by the operation of the same ungovernable impulses, till the rude and primal instinct of the commonest safety makes men accept any form, however stern and restrictive, that promises to ensure order and security from perturbation and convulsion.

We neither attempt nor wish to make disguise of the fact that we are very much indisposed indeed to wish success to any movement tending to eliminate the aristocratic element from the constitution. There is nothing in the history of the experiment wherever it has been made, of a chief of the State and a "People" class, with nothing intermediate, to reconcile us to making the essay here at home and in the present day. Not a slight objection to it in point of practice is, that it inevitably is a state of transition and totally destitute of permanency. The monarchy may survive the fall of the aristocracy, but only like Ulysses in Polyphamus' cavern, "to be devoured the last," by the insatiate and overweening democracy, or on the other hand, the popular power badly seated and ill founded, may be annihilated under the iron pressure of autocracy. But the two powers, monarch and people, never remain for any long continuance in equipoise, either assuredly kicking the beam in the long run, unless a third and middle power to regulate and moderate between—the power of a constitutional aristocracy—be in existence and operation.

In a country so circumstanced as Great Britain with all her institutions, that of her aristocracy in particular, so long settled, so deeply rooted and embedded in the soil, nothing could be more injurious, more entirely disastrous, than a suddenly compelled change tending ultimately and not remotely to uproot any of those institutions. A modification no doubt there ought to be in proper time, as the very best institutions of human foundation have the inevitable imperfection and liability to decay that is inseparable from all that is human, and must certainly stand in need of periodical revision and amendment. But our great fear is, that the Administrative Reform Association is going not a little too fast, and is prone and eager to throw away the power of effecting a moderate but certain good, in the grasping effort at a victory of a larger but far less beneficial character.

To the extent that these Reformers go in ameliorating and amending what is existing without too radical a change, we also are Reformers, earnest and sincere. But the moment that the cry, already too unmistakeably raised by their over-excited partizans, becomes distinct, urging further and faster progress, and the dangerous policy of total subversion, for the wild purpose of random substitution or creating anew, or giving undue preponderance to a part of what is existing already—that moment we must be permitted to draw back and decline the responsibility of results easily to be foreseen, and most earnestly and seriously to be deprecated.

Upon full and calm consideration of the whole of the subject, taking into account the existing and long established state of things in England, the dangerous and volcanic aspect of affairs abroad, and all the considerations we have been urging in the present paper, we are bound to express our firmly seated opinion that change, in the direction to which the agitation points of the Administrative Reform Association has for the present gone far enough, and that a sufficient pause ought now be made to give a full opportunity of testing the efficacy for good or for evil, whichever it may prove to be, of what has already been accomplished. We do not hesitate to say, that up to the period of the recent parliamentary advancement successfully made by the over ardent Lord Goderich, we think the progress of the movement had been entirely beneficial and laudable. The undue and excessive preponderance of the aristocratic body in the state had received a salutary and wholesome and very needed check. Nepotism and favoritism and abuse of patronage had not indeed been put an end to and done away with, but they had been exposed and in public condemnation, and the counteracting principle of encouraging, fostering and rewarding merit had been proclaimed and was being acted upon. The really monstrous practice of filling the public offices with nominees of influential individuals,—these nominees in a very great multitude of cases possessing in reality no other qualification in the world for public employment than the mere fact of being recommended by individuals of position and influence—has been nearly altogether stopped, scarcely a single appointment now occurring without the previous test of an examination of a real and practical, and in several instances a severe nature; and a crowd of candidates who failed under the test, having been rejected for that cause, notwithstanding the influence of their patrons. This alone is a great step—wonderful change from the constant and immemorial custom theretofore existing, and a change effected with marvellous rapidity and success. It would be well—it would be wise—it would be safe—here for awhile to make a pause, and give fair play to an experiment not only promising so well, but that has already produced such unexpected and excellent results.

In fact the impatient pushing onwards, upon which we have been remarking, has, along with its darker characteristics and tendencies, one trait and one tendency enough in itself to abate our disposition to yield to and help it forward: "ôte-toi de là que je m'y mette"! is the epigrammatic phrase in which our good allies and neighbours of France convey their appreciation of the motives actuating, in their opinion, the middle class reformers or perturbators, who have twice so seriously shaken the social edifice in that country. "Let the aristocracy make room for us"! would be the candid and literal application of this expression, translated and applied to the aspiring reformists of the middle class in England. They object to the state furnishing employment and means of emolument to the scions and protégées of the aristocracy. They have not the slightest objection, or rather they have the direct intention, that the State shall transfer its favors and its advantages to the aristodemocracy, or plutocracy as we may term them. But fortunately there is, besides that formidable third party, the real Democracy (to whose ultimate profit all the restless scheming and cabaling of the plutocratic class are ever sure to tend), yet a fourth party in the case—the rational, moderate and disinterested friends of reform, and up to this they have succeeded in delaying a little the unseemly rush of those whose motives in clamouring for administrative ameliorations are at the best so open to heavy suspicion and distrust. All who are true friends to salutary change, which inevitably implies (in order to be salutary) that whatever is good, stable and necessary in the existing state of things should be maintained and defended—ought to rally at once and determinedly to those who have taken the temporarily unpopular, but manly and constitutional part, of insisting that our Institutions shall not be rashly and suddenly changed to suit a theory, or a party-purpose, but that each step in alteration, while taken with a due alacrity of obedience to the national will, when fully and fairly ascertained and enunciated through the proper organs, shall be taken also with a full consideration for the rights and interests of all parties and classes in the State, and a clear and just appreciation of, and preparation for, the results which are naturally to be expected to ensue.

In one direction there is perhaps less danger to be presently anticipated from an energetic movement onwards than in most others, and thither we would fain direct the excess of energy from which we anticipate evil consequences in those others. Military Reform offers a wide and fair field for action—a field wider at least just now, and more requiring attention for the time, than the Civil Service, inasmuch as while there is in the latter a positive and incontestable manifestation of willingness to accept, or (if the phrase be thought more suitable) a submissiveness in adopting ameliorating changes, in the administration of the Military Service there has, on the contrary, been displayed an equally decided, or still more marked tendency to relapse into all the old abuses and mischiefs of that administration. It will be seen that we by no means propose a suspension of action ; and that those who having once tested the aigro-dolce of public agitation, are longing for its seductive piquancy again, need not fear that we propose to them to starve their tastes, but rather to turn to where they can still more abundantly gratify and satiate them. There is no stone of Sisyphus to labour at continually and vainly in the Civil Service, or if there were, up to the present time, it has, contrary to all the traditions of Tartarus, at length been pushed over the summit—if only a little way, still enough to save us from immediate recoil. On the other hand, all the upheaving and straining and upheaving again, that has been used with the dead weight at the Horse Guards, threatens to terminate only in a heavier and more hopeless rebound than ever before. Thither then—thither let every one turn who is earnest in the cause of Reform—thither let them bring and muster all their energies, for there all will be wanting, if we are to judge from the very determined, and, considering the bent of public opinion, the not a little audacious retrograde demonstrations of the ruling powers in the administration of our Military Affairs.

The appointment of Lieutenant General the Earl of Lucan, Lieutenant General Airey, and Colonel Gordon to high military posts and honors at home, immediately upon their return—(a return too made while the war was fiercely raging)—from the Crimea, where their utter and amazing incapacity, perverseness, and blundering were productive of such disastrous results, are scarcely to be spoken of with ordinary patience. In truth those appointments have, by their enormous incongruity and impropriety, in a manner paralysed the public mind and rendered it as yet, as it were, almost speechless with astonishment. While the indignation they have excited is perfectly well known and already not a little dreaded at head-quarters, the practical demonstrations of it have been as yet few and limited—a matter, however, in which, if we do not very much mistake the signs of the times, there will very speedily be a most unmistakeable change.

The incriminating Report of Colonel Tulloch and Sir John McNeill—criminatory of the three officers mentioned in the preceding paragraph—has sunk deep into the public mind, and received as it deserved the fullest credence as an honest, unbiassed, careful, and searching exposé of misconduct, that escapes the deeper stigma of (in effect,) murderous criminality, only by the somewhat mercifully allowed plea of incapacity. "The Enquiry into an Enquiry"—or virtual trial of the Crimean Commissioners themselves, for daring to speak the truth about the monstrous doings and still more monstrous omissions of the Military Chiefs in the late campaigns, will, instead of mitigating the popular resentment by blinding our eyes and misleading our judgments, as there is but too much reason to believe was the intent with which it was set on foot, and is being carried out, must only tend in reality to increase still more the general and just exasperation, and not very improbably occasion ere very long, an explosion that will not only shatter to pieces the frail and rickety defences that have recently been set up, but open a wide and ruinous break into the very heart of the grim and frowning old citadel itself, of military mismanagement, favoritism and maladministration.

There were and are a number of circumstances about this really most unnecessary Commission of Enquiry into the Crimean Commissioners' Report, calculated not merely to breed suspicion of it and of the motives of those who forced it upon the Government, but actually to condemn them. In the first place, if the shallow pretext be depended upon, as it has been to a considerable extent, that in fairness towards the inculpated parties, such an enquiry ought to be made in order to give them the opportunity of defending and if possible clearing themselves from the charges brought against them, the answer is prompt and full—that these men had that opportunity when the Crimean Commissioners were actually sitting in the camp before Sebastopol, where all necessary witnesses were on the spot, or within easy reach of summons from Constantinople.

The evidence already given before the new Commission or Inquisition in the hall of Chelsea Hospital, has established, in spite of the attempted denial—(a denial not repeated when the refutation proved so unexpectedly at hand)—of Colonel Gordon as to his having had full warning and notice of the extent and nature of the questions he had to answer,—that the amplest opportunity was given by Colonel Tulloch and Sir John McNeill to all parties implicated to make their own case in defence. But if even after this it had been really necessary to give those parties further opportunity, as has now been given, for the same purpose, surely the Crimean Commissioners themselves should have been shown equal fair play, and got equal facilities to bring forward any evidence they might deem necessary to bear out the Report which they have so honestly made. This, however, is denied to them! Some of their most important witnesses are yet in the Crimea or otherwise absent from the country. Six, or perhaps even three months' delay, would ensure that all persons whose testimony might be considered at all necessary, should be brought within reach of call; but the aggrieved dignity of the three high-placed favorites of the Horse Guards would not brook even that delay, and their favor at head-quarters has made their impatience prevail. On which side the advantage of this highhanded promptitude is, there cannot be any doubt.

In the second place, there was a most significant demonstration of unwillingness, on the part of several general officers to be members of the Chelsea Court of Enquiry. We do not mean to say that the medical certificates, under which so many were excused, were altogether unfounded; but one glance at the old officers who have ultimately had this onerous duty put upon them, will at once convince the observer that quite as much justification for such certificates could be found among those who do sit as for those who have escaped the task. It may seem strange to the civilian, that men who have attained high rank in their profession after a long period of well recognized service, should yet appear to shrink, like a half-fledged ensign, from the chance of coming in contact with the Horse Guards; but there is a difficulty of overcoming the effects of early and constant training in every profession, and the principle and practice of unreasoning obedience and submission gets to be implanted so deeply in the bosom of a military man as to become as it were a second and stronger nature. Accordingly there has been a decided shrinking from the chance of having to maintain the conclusions of the Crimean Commissioners' Report against the known will of the high Military Authority to whom Lord Lucan, General Airey, and Colonel Gordon owe their most questionable appointments.

In the third place, there have been demonstrations by the fashionable audiences attending in Chelsea Hall, which if the members of the present Court of Enquiry be at all impressionable, may have their effect upon the verdict—an effect unfavourable to the Crimean Commissioners, in consequence of those unbecoming and most improper demonstrations.

In the fourth place, the over readiness and sweeping assertions of some of the chief witnesses has a peculiar significance. High officers of one service seem to think it necessary at all hazards to defend their equally fortunate brethren of the other. It is true that, as always happens with over-earnest (and possibly not over-sincere) witnesses, the excess of zeal betrays into strange mistakes and contradictions. A Naval chief of old and long service suddenly finds himself ignorant of what the youngest "reefer" in his fleet will know, the number of yards of canvas that his ship can spread! And this obliviousness takes place exactly when it was of importance to the Crimean Commissioners that such a fact should be accurately stated, while it was of equal importance to the other parties in the trial or "enquiry" to have it left in doubt! Again, the fact known to the most casual traveller, that Constantinople is a city of wood buildings, and therefore must have a number of carpenters among its population, is deliberately ignored under the same circumstances by one who, from his position, must have had peculiar opportunities of being aware of the fact. It was, however, a troublesome fact for the inculpated land-officers; and the same high naval authority, in an outburst of professional zeal, boasts of a small party of his seamen, (without carpenters among them) having erected shelter for five or six times their number of soldiers in a very brief space of time, forgetting in his haste that he had before said, (when it was convenient to do so,) that without carpenters shelter could not have been constructed for men or horses—that he had no carpenters to spare,—and that sailors sent on shore for the purpose would be useless.

We have been betrayed into some length on this subject, for it is one on which it is but natural to feel strongly and therefore to speak freely. We do not regret the delay, if it operate, as we hoped it might, to draw the attention of our earnest Reform-agitators to the grievous defects and evils of the Military Administration of the Empire, and, as before remarked, to the large and wide field for their exertions which it exhibits. He who runs may read in the appointments to high position at home of the officers inculcated by the Crimean Commission, and in the manner in which it is sought to throw discredit upon the honest and truth-telling Report of that Commission, that whatever might be the progress of Reform in the Civil Service, however great or limited may be the concessions regarding it that have been and are being made to public opinion—(and those concessions so far as they have gone, are real and valuable)—it seems to be determined not merely to resist its progress in military matters with the vis inertie of that less responsible and most arbitrary of Government Departments the Horse Guards, but as it were to put into active practice the military tactics of “carrying the war into the enemy’s country” by boldly and in the face of day rivalling the most flagrant and unblushing deeds of the old corruption-times. Surely our ardent Reformers will not be daunted by this plain defiance, daring though it be, but will accept the gauntlet thrown down, and proceed to teach Lord Hardinge, and whoever were his accessaries, in this outrage upon public opinion that the day is gone by for ever when such practices could be allowed to escape with impunity.

A significant though rude and coarse phrase, which is said to have been frequently heard in the lines of our Allies during the long siege of Russia’s southern stronghold, should help to call the attention of our Reformers to Military matters:—“The English are an army of lions, led by asses”! was the pithy sentence pronounced upon our forces by the French. Whether our epigrammatic neighbours meant to include the regimental officers or not, under the not very complimentary designation just given, we cannot say, but there is of course no doubt that they meant it to apply in its full force to the leaders of our army; and as these have in their time been regimental officers, it is not easy to see that any line is drawn at all between the grades. And certainly whenever and wherever any separate responsibility has chanced to fall upon a mere regimental officer—one of those opportunities which the Frenchman, soldier-born and soldier-bred, is ever sure to turn to advantage and to personal distinction—our officers of the subordinate, as of the higher grade, have won the praise of most chivalrous gallantry and most unhesitating self-devotion, but not one iota more. Military science has been shown to be to them as it were a sealed book, owing to the grievous defects of their military education. It is true matters have in some slight degree been improved theoretically in this respect, as a certain examination formidable on paper to men of imperfect teaching, has been established now some years, but in practice and reality there has been little value in it, as a few months' assiduous cramming has helped scores of incompetent men over it, and enabled them to attain the desired object of promotion, when they as quickly forgot the ill-assorted and undigested lesson they had to get up in such haste.

To examine into the causes of the inefficiency of so many of our brave officers—inefficiency not only as to the higher branches of military knowledge, but often as to matters of the commonest necessity in the field—(it being always understood that we do not speak of mere fighting at close quarters)—is then an object of vital interest and importance. Incapacity and blundering in military affairs has assuredly cost us the loss of at least one half of the gallant little army we sent to the Crimea—the very flower of our army as then existing. No man can with any confidence predict, in the present lowering state of the political firmament of Europe, that peace will be enduring. No statesman will deny that there are elements of confusion and disruption abroad, that may ere many months set roaring war once more between powerful states, and once again task all our resources to bear our inevitable part well and effectively in the strife. It therefore instantly imports us to look to the administration and management of our military affairs, to see if the defects and evils therein proven by the bitter experience of the war just concluded are being remedied. Perhaps, fortunately for us, the Horse Guards have given a very startling proof that such is not the case. We might have gone to sleep in over confidence, we are suddenly awakened to increased distrust and more energetic action. Here then is the field, and a good and wide field for our Administrative Reformers, where all their energies will find employment, and where, by well directed and well sustained agitation, they must accomplish most important and most beneficial alterations and reforms. To aid them in the task, by exposing so far as our ability permits, the evils most crying for immediate remedy, will be our task and a labour of love, in the succeeding number of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

ART. VI.—IRISH FISHERIES.

The Fisheries, considered as a National Resource, with Comments upon the Laws relating to them; being a collection of Articles on the state of the Irish Fisheries. Published at different periods. By Robert Worthington, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. Dublin: Edward J. Milliken, 15 College Green, 1856.

IN the last Number of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, we commented at some length upon the able pamphlet of Captain Symonds, respecting the objects of "The London and West of Ireland Fishing and Fish Manure Company." We now turn with much pleasure to a little volume which has very lately made its appearance, and which is a compilation of articles, written from time to time by Mr. Worthington, an Irish Barrister. Unlike the work of Captain Symonds, Mr. Worthington's treatise relates principally to River Fisheries, though we must not omit to state, that he devotes no inconsiderable space to the discussion of those of the coasts and deep seas, and to the insertion of excellent suggestions for their full development, and of well-grounded beliefs in the highly remunerative results which would be likely to follow the adoption of such a course. Those who are even moderately acquainted with the valuable nature of our Salmon Fisheries, must see at once the usefulness of any undertaking set on foot for the purpose of reforming the abuses which have almost threatened their speedy extinction, and there are few Irishmen with any pretence to patriotism and just feelings, who would not gladly behold such an important element of the wealth of the country preserved from this fate. If any analogy could be instituted between the right of the commonalty to fish our rivers "ad libitum," and the right of the tenant to receive adequate remuneration for the permanent improvements which he has made upon his holding, under such circumstances, many grave doubts might be entertained as to whether any restrictions which interfered with this natural and just right should be suffered to exist. But such a comparison would be ridiculous in the extreme, and could not last a moment; properties of this nature are as sacred, and as well founded as any others can be; as they are not parcelled out here and there in small divisions, the public can have no claim whatever upon them, and a demand upon the proprietor to relinquish his right to reap the benefit of his fisheries, would be as reasonable as to ask him to deliver up his mansion, and his landed estates. A fitting proof of the wise intention of Providence that this source of wealth should be regulated and developed by individual, or commercial enterprise, is afforded in these plain facts, first, that it would forfeit its existence by the establishment of any other system; and secondly, that the effective carrying out of either of these legitimate plans, would be necessarily attended by advantages to the country at large, a thousand fold greater in the increased abundance and cheapness of the Fish Markets, than those to be obtained under the auspices of communistic principles. Mr. Worthington, it will be easily observed in the passages which we will subsequently cite, brings to his work much practical knowledge, talent, energy, and skill, added to which he evinces no ordinary amount of information regarding the ancient Irish Fishery Enactments. Occasionally we receive unmistakable evidences of his patriotic nature, and behold vivid signs of an ardent longing for the appearance of what in many instances he justly supposes would confer solid benefits upon his country: and it is with the most unaffected sincerity, we offer him our humble sympathy, at the same time entertaining a reasonable hope that his excellent suggestions may be acted upon at no distant day.

In his opening chapter Mr. Worthington, having descanted upon the almost total decay of the English Salmon Fisheries, and the great falling off of those in Ireland and Scotland, showing how, owing to its scarcity, Salmon is a dish almost unknown to the poor, and dwelling upon the fact that England is completely dependant upon Ireland and Scotland for this fish, while by the aid of steam we are enabled to lay the produce of every river in the country, on the London tables, in such a state of freshness as to satisfy the most fastidious appetites, then favours us with some interesting historical matter, relative to the ancient charter and patent weirs of Ireland.

This leads us into a short digression, and a few observations, concerning the history of the ancient charter and patent weirs of this kingdom. No doubt, at a remote period, a necessity arose for a fixed mode of capturing salmon in our rivers, for the supply of markets in chief cities or towns: the imagination must be vivid, which can conjecture a time when the rude angling tackle of our ancestors was alone regarded as a means adequate to the supply of the public wants. We learn from undoubted records, that at a very early period of our history, purprestures, or weirs, were used in this country for the capture of salmon, and were, for many centuries, subjected to legislative control; hence the origin and the title of the Salmon-weirs, or great Salmon-fisheries of this kingdom; they existed certainly when the Danes held sway in Ireland, and were subsequently confirmed, or granted by the Crown, by charter, or patent, to corporations and others, who had acquired territorial rights. In this manner rights of several fishery were founded; a large proportion of these fisheries falling into hands of monastic institutions—being annexed to abbeys, and other religious houses. The weirs of Lismore, of Gill Abbey, and many others, were amongst the ancient possessions of the Church. The Abbots of Mellifont possessed three weirs upon the Boyne, and upon a writ of Monstrans de droit, in the reign of Edward III., their title was held good. St. Mary's Abbey at Dublin, enjoyed a special grant of fishery in the waters of the Avon Liffey; and in the year 1220, the lordly Prior of Kilmainham had to submit to an inquiry, respecting his title to the structure, which forms the present Island-bridge weir. At Limerick, in the recent trials respecting the title to the great lax-weir and Fishery, now the property of the Limerick Corporation, the title was deduced from a charter granted by King John, in the year 1202, to William de Bradosa. These, not to mention numerous other instances, will be quite sufficient to carry back the title of those obnoxious purprestures, at all events, into a pretty remote antiquity.

An act passed in 1842 interfered materially with acknowledged rights, and declared that those ancient weirs and fisheries founded by our ancestors, and handed down to us by corporations, were monopolies. According to Mr. Worthington, a bill introduced by Mr. Connolly, the member for Donegal, is calculated to remove the injurious effects of that act, and to substitute others in their place, by means of which these fisheries may be placed in a position from which unexampled prosperity can be derived.

The Bill proposes to prohibit the use of fixed engines within the mouth, or within two miles of the mouth, of any river or harbour, in all cases in which a prescriptive title to use such engines cannot be shown; and the length of possession which should constitute a prescriptive right, is proposed in this (and in all other cases relating to fisheries) to be a period of forty years. For this proposed period of limitation, there is a precedent in the English Act, 2 & 3 Wil. IV. c. 71, which shortens the period of prescription in certain commonable cases, and enacts that it shall not be necessary, in proving a prescription, or that a right has been exercised from "time immemorial," to include the whole period of time from the commencement of the reign of Richard I. The Act we refer to, substitutes shorter and more reasonable periods for proof. It cannot be argued that those engines which have sprung up, mushroom-like, since 1842, are recognized by the law, or were lawfully erected according to a sound construction of the provisions, even of the statute which introduced them. The 21st section of the Act of 1842, prohibits their erection, in any manner, so as to be injurious to navigation; and we have abundant evidence before us, that those recent fixtures in the tide-way have interfered with navigation,* and that more explicit legislation respecting them is demanded. Again; to interfere injuriously with the public fishery, is contrary to the common law; and, that these novel engines of destruction do so interfere, requires little argument or elucidation: they have had a most pernicious effect upon the fisheries at large; they have reduced the gross produce to an alarming extent; and being placed near, or inside the mouths of rivers, they take precedence of all ancient modes of capture, and deprive not only the charter weir of its existing rights, but swallow up those public rights of fishery in the estuary, which belonged to the cotman, and which are derived to him by a prescription more ancient than the parchment which secures the landed proprietor, on the shore, in his possessions.

A description of the bag-net will give us a tolerable idea of its destructive nature.

This machine—invented by some cannie Highlandman—was first introduced into Ireland about fifteen or eighteen years back. It is a most ingenious contrivance; but fated, we fear, unless timely restrictions be interposed, to annihilate the genus salmo. It is a trap made of netting, extended upon poles in such a manner, that when immersed in the sea, it sinks to its upper surface, and then floats, so as to form beneath the water, a cage, or compartment like a chamber, some ten or twelve feet square: this chamber is entered by a narrow door, which is so adapted to the instincts of the salmon, that though he enters freely, there is a slight labyrinth which bewilders him, and prevents his egress. A "leader," or curtain of net-work, one or two hundred yards in length, extends from the shore to this chamber, and as the salmon is known to keep close to the shore, and in proceeding towards his native river, to traverse the indentations of the coast, and the innermost recesses of bays, it follows that in his progress along the coast, he strikes against the leader of the fixed net, and being thus turned off into deep water, he goes along the leader in the same way that he was before traversing the shore, and in this way enters the chamber, where he remains until captured. This engine is so certain and destructive in its operations, that the capture of 50, or 100 salmon, was by no means an unusual performance a bag-net during a single tide : but salmon lately have become scarce. The number of these engines now in use, and their efficiency will give some idea of the drain thus put upon the fisheries : a drain so effectual, that it has almost overthrown all property in Salmon fisheries ; and the engine now becomes almost suicidal, and threatens its own existence—at least, many of them have ceased operation merely from the dearth and paucity of salmon which they have themselves occasioned.

The author goes on to show the extensive depredations committed by seals and porpoises, owing to the bag-net system, the former lurking about the net, and often succeeding in getting in and out with safety, carrying off the imprisoned salmon, and the latter who frequent the deep water, being afforded an opportunity, by means of the leader of the net, following their prey, whose instinct it is to hug the shore, but who are compelled by this curtain to travel seawards in the prosecution of their journey. He dismisses with a few pertinent observations the specious pretext in favor of the bag-net, which insinuates that by its instrumentality, the fish can be captured in better condition than it could otherwise ; showing how many cases the salmon reach the river charter weir in less than more than an hour after they leave the sea, as may be proved by the animalcule or parasite, which adheres to the scales of the fish, and which can live only a few hours after its arrival in fresh water. He then proceeds with fresh arguments against the bag-net.

“ A practical observation or two, may here be made respecting some peculiar localities on the sea-coast, in which those fixed engines are sometimes erected, and in which the use of them has a most prejudicial effect upon the fisheries, and for which a remedy is provided in the Bill. The enabling words of the Statute are, that such engines may be erected “ attached to the shore ” adjoining the land, right of which the engine is erected ; but under this power fixed-nets have been erected from the ends of piers, and artificial breakwaters projecting perhaps a mile or more, into the sea. A provision made in the present Bill, to prevent this practice, which is an abuse of the enabling power ; and we proceed to show why this may be considered to be a judicious and proper restriction. When a fixed-net is erected from the extremity of a pier, the pier acts as leader of the net, and it is to all intents and purposes the same with respect to it, as if the curtain, or leader of the net itself, was of similar length with the pier, which may, perhaps, be a mile or more. This gives the fixed-net so circumstanced an overwhelming advantage ; its capture is most destructive, and it engrosses, monopolizes, or, so to speak, takes the wind out of the sails, of all fixed-nets in the same locality, properly and legally erected. We omit to take any notice of the injury to navigation, which may be feared, from encouraging the erection of fixtures in the sea, in the immediate vicinity of piers and artificial harbours; the present observations are confined merely to the monopolizing effect of such an engine, as a fishing engine; and to the equity and policy of not extending the enabling power beyond its strict letter, by providing, that the net shall be "attached to the shore" adjoining the land, in right of which the party uses it, and not otherwise. This provision will supply an evident omission, and prevent a destructive monopoly, and will secure equal rights to all entitled to use those engines on the shore."

The question as to what time the close season should commence is discussed with much ability, the period mentioned in Mr. Connolly's Bill, namely the first of August, meeting the approval of the author. Some admirable suggestions for the preservation of salmon ensue; such as protecting from capture all fish under a certain weight, and making such alterations in weirs as would enable the fish to pass through them. The matter of outlay is important, and receives due attention.

But the expense of these structures will, after all, be a material consideration. The funds for these purposes at the disposal of Boards of Conservators are very limited; and as mill-weirs in some rivers are numerous, many years might elapse before anything effectual could be done, if estimates should range so high as £50, £100, and even considerably higher. We think economy, therefore, indispensable in the allocation of the funds applicable to this purpose. In any of the plans we have proposed, we should say £40 will be the outside of all expenses, but in the most effectual plan suggested, namely, that in the sluice itself, one-half the above amount will amply suffice; while in numerous old, ill-constructed, and uneven weirs, by slight aids or very simple adaptations, passes effectual for every purpose intended, and permanent as the rough old structure itself, can be completed at an expense not exceeding ten pounds.

This calculation is followed by hints as to the restriction of anglers, and by reflections on the jurisdiction in Fishery cases to be given to Assistant Barristers. Much important information is contained in the calculation which we now lay before the reader.

"In concluding our remarks upon the subject of the Salmon-fisheries, we shall submit a few observations as to the aggregate deficit of the Irish Salmon-fisheries since 1842, which is the matter the public has to deal with. Upon this point we are really afraid to make an estimate, as any calculation of ours might appear incredible, but the reader may form some estimate himself from the following data:—The average take of salmon annually at the chief Salmon-fisheries, at that period, may be taken at about 200 tons each; the

Foyle fishery, in 1842, produced nearly 300 tons, and it is a remarkable fact that in the reign of Charles I., (according to a return made by Lord Strafford), the produce of the Foyle is stated at 240 tons for the year 1688; the Bann, at Coleraine, previously also, had been equally fruitful; and the Shannon superior to all. Shortly anterior to 1842, in one town on the Shannon (the town of Glin), £3,000 worth of salmon was sold in one season. The great fishery of the Moy at Ballina; the Blackwater, at Lismore; and last, not least, the Erne, at Ballyshannon—produced also their hundreds of tons. Perhaps those now mentioned might be placed in one category, and be styled first-class rivers: in another may be placed the Slaney, Lee, Suir, Nore, Barrow, and some others, which may be termed second class rivers; the average here also will range high, though accurate returns cannot be given, as public rights of fishery prevail so largely in those rivers. Then we have in great abundance third-class rivers such as the Laune, the Maine, the Boyne, the Liffey, and a host of others; in all, we believe, about 120 salmon rivers. Most of the third-class rivers will average from ten to twenty tons each; and even the most inconsiderable mountain streams of Kerry, and other districts, will yield, or rather, we should say, did yield, their five or six tons annually, of salmon and sea trout; and all this exclusive of the capture of salmon in the sea, and at the mouths. Here, then, is a vast aggregate, the annual produce of our Salmon-fisheries down to 1842. But how stands the matter now? Let the proprietors of the large Salmon-fisheries above mentioned state what amount of rent they now receive from fisheries, which previously had paid each an annual rent of one, two, or three thousand pounds. The Irish Society, or London Company, can inform us what rent they got for the Foyle fisheries previous to that year. We believe we are right in saying the rent was £3,200 per annum; but what is the rent now? The Foyle fishery was set up to be let last February, in the Guildhall, London, and no bidder could be found rash enough to take it. In every district of the country ruin has stalked among the fisheries: from the records of the Court of Chancery, in a case where a receiver was appointed, we could show an instance in which a fishery, in the hands of the receiver, has not produced any profit whatsoever, which down to 1842, produced, beyond wages and expenses, a clear profit of £600 per annum. In the late movement connected with the fisheries, the Committee appointed at a General meeting, sent printed queries to the owners of all Salmon-fisheries in Ireland, both in rivers and upon the sea-coast; and one of the queries was, as to whether there had been an increase or decrease of produce since 1842; the answer from all was “decrease.” In some cases, the decrease was stated at one-half, in others, two-thirds, and in some the produce was stated at literally nothing. We have all the documents before us, and with impartiality and accuracy we can declare the result of our examination to be, that the produce from all the Irish Salmon-fisheries has dwindled to one-third, within the last ten years.

The second chapter is devoted to a dissertation on, “The Sea and Coast Fisheries.” The writer having referred to Holland, Norway, Newfoundland, England, and Scotland, as instances of countries which have prospered by the cultivation of their Fisheries, draws this sad picture of our unhappy Island.

Let us now take a view of our Irish sea-coast. Behold the roofless cottage—the boat stranded on the beach—the coast almost depopulated—the poor house full. How is this? Do the herrings turn tail upon us, or shun our shores? or have the turbot, the sole, and all the finny tribes, forsaken us? No such thing. Is our coast population indolent or cowardly? believe it not: they want instruction and culture; they want encouragement and aid; but they are not deficient either in courage or in energy. Our fishermen will go to sea in “cots,” or face the Atlantic surge in “currags” made of canvass, in which the well-equipped mariner of other countries would not venture to set a foot. Neither have the fish deserted us; they abound upon our shores or visit our bays in never-failing profusion; even while we are penning these lines, a fleet of Cornish fishing boats is leaving our shores, laden with the fit reward of their well-requited toils. Two hundred sail of these vessels dropped anchor in Howth Harbour this season, and fished under the friendly ray of the Poolbeg and Baily lights, almost within sight of our metropolis; and each summer they carry off a golden harvest in the presence of our starving fishermen. Our fishermen attend upon them, land their fish, or carry it to distant markets, and the utmost harmony prevails between them. We have seen and conversed with these intelligent Cornishmen; we admire their skill, their energy, their superior equipments, and fishing-gear—but, above all, their mild and orderly demeanour. Their fleet, as we have said, consisted of about two hundred sail, and frequently in some seasons consists of much more: these boats, with their equipments, are worth about £200 each, so that the whole fleet will represent, in round numbers, a capital of about £40,000. They arrived at Howth this season on the 23rd of June, and were all off on the 1st of September. Having fished our Dublin coast, they leave the herrings still abundant behind them, and hurry back to Cornwall to be in time for the great pilchard fishery on that coast, which only lasts a brief period, when they reap another abundant harvest; and some of them this season again returned to our coast, and again met the herrings. But confining our inquiries solely to their catch of herrings on our own coasts during the months of July and August of the present year, we find from careful inquiries that most of those boats captured and sold about £200 worth each; thus clearing almost the whole floating capital of their fleet within a period little exceeding two months, and carrying off from our shores, in hard cash, an amount little short of £30,000.

Mr. Worthington proposes a grant in aid of a loan-fund to encourage our poor fishermen, bringing forward the town of Howth as an instance, to prove what results would follow a successful carrying out of some simple measure of this description.

We shall begin our exposition with Howth, as we are partial to its blue cliffs. We take upon us to say there is not in the British empire, a town to surpass Howth in all the concomitants of a first-class fishing-station. Its harbour cost half a million; a few miles in the offing a "ball" of herrings, eight or ten miles in length, and one or two miles in thickness, moves annually along in its huge and mysterious migration. The Cornishmen take a handful or two out of them (some £20,000 or £30,000 worth) each season, and then leave them unmolested to wend their way in slow and successive shoals along our coast. A railroad has its terminus close to the harbour; we have stepped the distance, and it is just forty paces from the turn-table of the terminus, to the gunwale of the fishing-boat. Our Dublin Billingsgate, the wholesale fish-market, is reached in forty-five minutes, and, as a market, is not perhaps equalled in advantages by any in Great Britain; the fish are sold by auction at an early hour to the trade, and if a glut of herrings, salmon, turbot, or other fish is poured in, the bulk of it is on board a steamer in three hours afterwards on its way to Liverpool. Not to waste time in details, those fish next day are exposed for sale in Manchester, Birmingham, and other inland towns, "bleeding fresh," to use a market phrase, in which state the commercial value is greatest, and thus the most remunerating price is obtained. Such is Howth, and such are its natural advantages. No town in Great Britain, neither Yarmouth, nor Wick, nor Stornoway, nor Helmsdale, nor any other fishing locality, in situation or natural advantages will be found to surpass Howth in all the requirements of a great fishing-station.

There are about 150 resident fishermen in the town—a hardy and stalwart race of industrious men; they occupy their time in the long line fishery, and when not fishing, prepare their hooks and lines. There is not a net in the town, nor has there been a net made in it these forty years.

With these facts before us, what must be our astonishment when we reflect that out of a population of 300,000, living in a city within a few minutes journey by railway of such a place as Howth, not half a dozen individuals of sufficient energy can be found, to exert themselves in favor of the proper development by native hands of this splendid fishery! Mr. Connolly's, bill proposes that the lords of the Treasury be empowered to advance money on loans in aid of the Coast-Fishing population; a measure which we think would be attended with every success. Thus argues the author—

A grant in aid of the industry of the coast population, will be a humane and long demanded remedial measure, and a safer investment than advances for labour-rates or poor-law unions. We would suggest, then, a limited grant, in aid of a loan-fund, in localities selected for the experiment; the sums advanced to bear a small rate of interest, and to be repayable in four years, by annual instalments of 25 per cent., each instalment to become due on the 1st of September in each year. If it be asked, what security can the impoverished coast fisherman give—we answer, he can give a mortgage upon the ocean, and draw almost at sight upon the treasures of the deep. A loan-fund office, with savings'-bank annexed, will, therefore, be the only machinery we shall suggest, and a bottomry bond, with sureties, the security. We have little doubt as to the results, or of the validity and efficiency of the security; nor do we fear that our fishing population, temperate as they now are, and industrious and persevering, will have any difficulty in meeting these instalments—nay, we are convinced, many of them would anticipate their obligations, and place themselves, in a shorter time than the period we have above mentioned, in the position of independent boat-owners, thus becoming useful and serviceable members of the community, no longer a burden upon the poor-rates, and a reproach to the industry of the country.

The punctuality of the working classes in Ireland, in similar cases, with their gratitude for kindness shown to them, is proverbial. In the City of Cork Loan-fund Society, the loss in six years, upon loans to the amount of £38,520, only amounted to £8 17s.

We are satisfied the Government would not lose a shilling by this grant, so prolific and unfailing is the field, so ample are the means for repayment, and so keen would be the self-reliant struggle for independence. With a surplus treasury, an exchequer overflowing, and with large indirect taxation from Ireland swelling the resources of the State, we do not think any Chancellor of the Exchequer can remain imperturbable, or obdurate, in the face of the facts which can be marshalled against him.

Should the plan here proposed be adopted, and prove successful—to enumerate the proper measures for a full development of the fisheries will be a work of few words. Small piers, in localities which at present have no harbours, will be a necessary requirement; and for this purpose there is at present, we believe, in operation an Act of Parliament together with a grant. In many localities a short spur will be sufficient to form a safe low-water harbour for yauls and small craft used in such species of fishing as is suited to the locality. We would suggest that these piers should be constructed wholly by the Government, without any aid or application from local proprietors. This will ensure a proper selection of the site by competent hydrographists. Small harbours appear to have been constructed with much advantage on the east coast of Scotland, under the provisions of the 5th Geo. IV. c. 64; and everything connected with them, or relating to their extent or requirements, is well understood. A capstan, boat-slip, and mooring-gear, and small light, or lantern, will be the necessary appendances to complete the boat harbour. Curing-houses and salt stores, in remote localities, will also be required for fishing purposes; and provision is made in one of the clauses of the Bill to encourage their erection by private parties, and we have little doubt that in suitable localities they will form, not merely self-supporting, but highly profitable private speculations.

"The Artificial Propagation of Fish," is the title of Mr. Worthington's next chapter. Alluding to the fact of the French Government having recently issued a commission to examine and report upon this matter, he enters into an elaborate account of the manner in which Mr. Shaw, the first to direct the discovery of the German naturalist Jacobi, to practical purposes, succeeded perfectly, not only in producing salmon-fry, but also in retaining them in his enclosures during a period of two years, until they had reached that stage, when the sea becomes necessary to their existence. The author informs us that Mr. Shaw has the merit of the discovery which established the identity of the salmon-fry, with the gravel. In a clever elucidation of the manner in which the artificial method of propagating salmon can be carried on, recounting the benefits thereby accruing, the writer comes to consider how the fry so produced are to be protected, when they reach the sea?

To explain our views on this subject as concisely as possible. We do not think, as already said, that any extremely important practical results will follow from breeding salmon-fry artificially in rivers, unless we can go a step further, and protect them, at least for some period, in the sea; and the following are our reasons:—In spite of all opposing circumstances, the number of salmon-fry annually produced by the salmon themselves, by the natural process in the river, is at all times so prodigious, and the fry, which actually descend to the sea from every river, and in every season, are so numerous, that we cannot escape from the conclusion, that so enormous a waste, goes on in the sea, from natural causes; and that until this waste can be controlled, it will answer no paramount practical purpose, to multiply further the abundant production, which the salmon (if allowed to go up to spawn in sufficient numbers) can without any adventitious aid, effect for themselves. The leaves of the trees are not more abundant than the prodigious swarms of salmon-fry which we have seen in some seasons descending rivers, and yet, in ensuing seasons, no observable increase, either of grilse or matured salmon, has taken place.

We have often, also—indeed, continuously, for a period of some thirty years—been puzzled with a fact, which we have constantly and invariably observed; namely, that when a flood occurs—opportune, as is often thought, at the very period (say the beginning of May) when the fry are on their passage to the sea—the very result that would naturally be expected from the safe transit of the whole body of the fry, from the river to the sea—does not actually take place, but the very opposite; and the ensuing and corresponding salmon season often shows, not an increase beyond the average of other years, but very frequently a diminution. Many years back we were so much struck with this circumstance, that we resolved to keep, and did keep, a registry of floods; and we have found the result invariable—viz., that when the whole brood has been carried off to the sea, on a flood, in the month of May, realizing the piscatory proverb—

"The first flood in May, Takes all the fry away,"

the produce, in salmon, of ensuing and corresponding years, has been frequently less, and not, as might have been expected, immeasurably more, than in seasons when the fry were detained in the river, in comparatively dry seasons, making their descent gradually, detained and obstructed by mill-dams, and subjected, during their tedious passage downwards, to all the ills that fry are heir to. The same observation may be made, with reference to winters, when unusually large numbers of salmon have been known to spawn in rivers, and unusually large numbers of fry have been produced, and yet the produce in grilse or salmon of succeeding years has been very deficient. It will be said, in answer to these perplexing facts, that we perhaps miscalculate the age and periods of migration, respectively, both of the fry going down, and of the grilse coming up; and, consequently, miscalculate the periods that would correspond with the descent of the one, and the ascent of the other. We are aware of the arguments that can be founded on that objection, but have taken a large margin, and several rivers, for our observation; and our conviction remains clear, that when countless myriads of mature salmon-fry have passed off to the sea in safety, by means of floods, ensuing seasons do not at all show those results which might naturally be expected to follow.

Our conclusion from the above premises is, that an immense waste or destruction of fry takes place in the sea, or at the mouth of the estuary.

After many just observations, and the enunciation of many important facts, amongst which latter may be mentioned that which informs us that the fisheries of Scotland receive material encouragement in the shape of large Government grants, and facilities for bank accommodation, the author winds up his third chapter. In the Appendix we find the following useful and interesting information relative to the improvement of salmon fisheries.

Having, with little effect, tried various methods to improve this Fishery (which formerly was of considerable value), I adopted a proceeding, which, as I shall be examined on oath during the pending inquiry, I shall now detail, as minutely as I shall, if necessary, depose to on my examination. In July, 1839, I directed my men to "open the weir," as it is technically called, which I was not bound to do until the 1st of October, under the 32nd Geo. III., cap. 40. Very reluctantly, my orders were obeyed by my men, and on the mid-summer flood, which occurred on the 19th July, 1839, the gates on this weir were opened; by this operation I sacrificed 50 or 60, which, as salmon were then sold at a low rate, represented a very large number of salmon; I looked for a great increase of fry, and of salmon pael, on the following year, not being then aware of the recent discovery in Scotland made by Mr. Shaw, relative to the slow growth, and long duration in the river, of the salmon fry. Mr.

Shaw's discovery did not become generally known until published in Blackwood, in April, 1841; however, having let up the fish, I look for produce (according to the old opinion) in 1840, but was disappointed: 1840 was a very bad year, so was 1841; but in June, 1841 I was greeted with a run of salmon peal, unlike anything I had ever before seen. The new Act had not then passed, and the small-mesh net was in use, consequently these salmon, which averaged about five pounds each, were almost all captured; in number, with me, they exceeded four-fold that of any other year; and taking into account the sea fishing at Poolbeg, which is carried on by a great number of persons, the increase was altogether, to the best of my belief, ten-fold upon any previous year, for the last twenty years, as various advertising parties can testify as well as myself; but the number was not by any means, in my judgment, so remarkable, as the extraordinary difference in the size and quality of the fish. These peal were all what salmon-fishers call "well fed" fish, which term has a particular signification, well known to sportsmen and salmon fishers; suffice it to say they were in appearance, colour, and size as unlike the peal of former years as can well be conceived. This I account for by the peal fish, (those of 1839,) having reached the spawning beds in good time and in full vigour; and I conceive that the complaint made in the rivers in Ireland, that the fish have degenerated in size and quality, is solely attributable to late fishing. The August fish are all killed, and in September and October good spawners become scarce, and they reach the spawning beds, which are at the upper part of rivers, (many obstacles intervening,) in a jaded and weakly state and too late for early spawning. From this experiment, broadly defined as it is, I am entitled to say that the Fisheries of Ireland will rapidly increase in value, and the fish in size and quality, if salmon fishing be stopped upon the 1st of August or thereabouts. The close season should then consist of five full months; and I should say, (if a general close time, the same for all rivers and all localities be decided upon by the Commissioners,) that a close season commencing 10th or 12th August, and ending the 10th or 12th January would best amalgamate conflicting interests, best suit various localities, and, above all, would best tend to the improvement of the fisheries, and to the public advantage.

The curious narration which we proceed to quote, evidencing the rapacity of the seal tribe, will be read with interest.

In a letter recently published by me, which has been observed upon, I mentioned the capture of a large seal which was taken in the chamber of a bag-net set in the Bay of Dublin. The seal in question was the larger seal, and was captured in a very unusual way, having become entangled in the net, in forcing his way through the small door, or entrance of the chamber; and had he not been captured just at the time he became so entangled, he would, I have little doubt, have escaped by forcing his passage through, as it is a very common occurrence to find a fixed net much torn and damaged without being able satisfactorily to assign the cause. For various reasons it is very difficult to capture these animals ; but the depredations they commit upon the salmon, when enclosed in the fixed net, are truly distressing, in an economic point of view : distinct statistics on this head can never be supplied ; but it has been calculated, that seals and porpoises devour more than ten times the number captured by nets. It has always been my opinion that the smaller seal (the Phoca vitulina) is by far, of the seal tribe, the most destructive of the salmon. This seal is not larger than a spaniel. The door of the bag-net is eight inches wide, but about seven feet in height, and with but very slight effort, this seal can go in at the door, and come out with a salmon in his paws ; nor can it be doubted that this animal resorts regularly to the fixed net for his supply of food. That he is not frequently captured is no more remarkable than that a rat should not be caught in a trap, if the door remained open ; but I have seen on numerous occasions, too many salmon in the chamber of the net, having fresh wounds upon them, to leave any doubt on my mind that a seal had been a recent visitor there. I need scarcely mention, that the salmon is prevented coming out of the bag-net, or fixed net, by a peculiar instinct, although the door remains open.

The necessity for Parliamentary interference to protect our salmon fisheries receives sufficient illustration in the statements which we now insert.

In a former letter I mentioned incidentally the insufficiency of the present Act of Parliament for the protection of the gravelin ; that little fish is now ascertained to be the young of the salmon ; it is not protected by the Act, by reason of a technical error in the words used, which I formerly detailed, and the injurious effect of the omission must be self-evident. It is now proved not merely that the gravelin is the young of the salmon, but circumstances also of the most curious nature relative to that little fish are asserted, which it would not be suitable to advert to more particularly here, but which are stated at length in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, vol. 14. The destruction of gravelin in the interior of the country is carried on I may say without any restraint ; in the great mills near large towns, improper practices are not often permitted, but in the petty mills in remote districts the destruction of gravelin is enormous. It has occurred to me to prosecute under the following circumstances :—In a petty mill, a trap was found, constructed at the waste gate of the mill, and capable of taking a barrel of gravelins in a single night ; I came upon the engine myself, and on the trial at the ensuing Petty Sessions, the first witness was a contumacious miller, who for some cause had been discharged from the mill, where, with five others, he had been dieted, (a custom in country mills.) He stated on his oath, that a large boiler of gravelins was put down each day, and that he was discharged from his employment because he complained of getting nothing but fish ; or, in the miller's own words—"it was gravelins for dinner, and gravelins for supper, and I could stand it no longer."

It is with pain that we feel the propriety of selecting a closing extract, which cannot but create melancholy reflections; however, it may also call into existence worthy resolves and energetic actions, and if so, adversity will not be without its benefit. If sad facts like the following, literally staring us in the face, do not bring us to our senses, then nothing will :—

In conclusion, it may be observed that the answers received, afford ample evidence of the depressed state of the Salmon-fisheries throughout the country. During the present year some of the largest fisheries have been surrendered, and in districts where public rights of fishery were largely exercised, great destitution has been caused. Both public and private rights have fallen before the Act of 1842, and both are now in a state of complete prostration. In the Waterford district alone, 1,120 families have been deprived of their livelihood—the number of cotmen in that district in 1842 being 1,200, and the registered number during the season just terminated being 80. Similar results have taken place in other districts, and the aggregate presents a sad spectacle of destitution, caused by the mismanagement of the fisheries, combined with effects resulting from an improvident and inequitable law, passed without due consideration or notice, and without the aid or information of practical persons.

It is quite evident that all that is wanting to restore our fisheries to their former prosperous condition is a good law properly administered, and there can be little doubt that, if the matter were worked with befitting energy, such an act could be obtained. It is an enigma quite beyond our comprehension how, while the path lies plainly marked out before us, we refuse to tread it, though we know that by following it a most desirable object will be accomplished; and it seems as though that necromantic power which the peasantry of Donegal believe has spell-bound a band of warriors and their steeds in a cave on the side of one of their grey mountains, also extended its dire influence over the energies and practical attributes of the whole people of the country. Mr. Worthington has shewn us with much ability and judgment, both what is required for the improvement of our fisheries, and how we are to obtain the means to accomplish it, and if we will neither profit by his advice, or take the trouble of thinking for ourselves upon a subject fraught with so much interest to Ireland, we do not deserve the sympathy and support of others. If we prefer the “dolce far niente” to an energetic course, an unworthy determination to let others do our business for us, instead of a proper confidence in our own exertions, we will assuredly reap the bitter fruit of our supineness and neglect, in this case as well as in every other ; verifying the words of a young and gifted Irishman, that they who leave everything to chance, "are incompetent to act, irresolute to decide, and powerless to achieve." Union and energy are our wants, and though the expression is a trite one it is not on that account less worthy of our consideration ; if there is any one thing which ought to make us ashamed of its utterance, it is this, that having heard it until its sound is "familiar in our ears as Household Words," we have profited so little by the lesson which it inculcates. Would to Heaven that even now we would take advantage of the precept, its adoption would certainly result in the prosperity of Ireland and in the happiness of its people.

ART. VII.—THE CIVIL SERVICE—ORDNANCE VALUATION OF IRELAND.

The Petition of the several Valuers, Superintendents, Surveyors, Draftsmen, and Clerks, in the service of the General Valuation and Survey of Rateable Property in Ireland, to His Excellency the Right Honorable the Earl of Carlisle, Lord Lieutenant General, and General Governor of Ireland, &c., &c.

Never have we taken up our pen with greater pleasure to further a cause, claiming as it does, the support and advocacy of every right-minded and impartial contemporary, than we now do while devoting our pages to that important social question of the Administrative Reform Department, the General Valuation of Ireland.

In a former number of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, was published a paper on this branch of the Civil Service, and though we do not agree with the writer on many points therein expressed, yet we fully concur with him in that part of the article setting forth the grievances of the employés of this establishment, grievances most painful in their nature, and proved to be so beyond all matter of doubt, by facts narrated in the petition to the Lord Lieutenant early in the present year. Considering that we can best serve the cause of these officers by reprinting the petition, we do so, and at the same time we earnestly hope that the prayers of the petitioners may meet that attention from the Legislature to which they are justly entitled.

*To His Excellency the Right Honorable the Earl of Carlisle
Lord Lieutenant General, and General Governor of Ireland
&c., &c.*

THE PETITION of the several VALUERS, SUPERINTENDENTS SURVEYORS, DRAFTSMEN, and CLERKS, in the service of the General Valuation and Survey of Rateable Property in Ireland,

MOST HUMBLY SHEWETH,

That the General Valuation of Rateable Property in Ireland commonly known as the Townland Valuation, was commenced under the authority of an Act of Parliament (Act 7 Geo. IV. cap. 62,) in the year 1828, and that your Petitioners were appointed to carry out the provisions of that Act, which had for its object the more equal apportionment and levy of Grand Jury Assessments in the several Counties of Ireland.

That subsequently, on the introduction of the Poor Law into this country, the Legislature deemed it necessary to extend the operations of the Valuation service, and to cause an uniform Valuation to be made in Tenements for the levy of all Public, Local, and Government Taxes whatsoever; and for this purpose Statutes (9 & 10 Vic. cap. 110, and 15 & 16 Vic. cap. 63,) were enacted, known as the Tenement Valuation Acts, which provide that in addition to a General Valuation in Tenements, an annual revision of the Valuation be made, and that a new Valuation be commenced in each County at the end of every fourteen years.

That the Tenement Valuation of three provinces has already been completed and comprises an unprecedented amount of information, which by the labours of your Petitioners has been rendered of the utmost financial and statistical importance, embracing as it does a separate and distinct Survey and Valuation of every House, Farm, Railway, Canal, Mine, Fishery, and other rateable Hereditament, the result forming a basis for the equitable levy of all Poores' Rate and Grand Jury Cess, and establishing a correct standard whereby the property qualification for the Elective Franchise is regulated. It moreover affords facilities to the Commissioners for the sale of Incumbered Estates, Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Commissioners of Income Tax, and other public bodies, so that the magnitude and importance of the Valuation of Ireland and its adaptation to the circumstances of the Country and the exigencies of the Imperial Government, are manifest.

That while the operations of the Valuation Service have thus from a temporary form become permanent, under the Act which provides for annual revision, and so extended as to demand an unforeseen amount of diligence, labour, and accuracy, no modification or proportionate extension of the Section of the Act of 1828, providing for the remuneration of your Petitioners, has been enacted, as might have been expected from the principle of adequate remuneration for the present and suitable provision for the future which is recognized by the Government as sound policy and justice in all its other branches of the Civil Service.

That though the expenses of the General Valuation are in the first instance advanced by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, yet, being ultimately defrayed by present-ments levied off the several Counties, and consequently watched with jealous care by the different presenting bodies, the Commissioner of Valuation has been obliged to maintain a standard of payments far below that of an adequate remuneration for so important a work, so that very few of your Petitioners have reached the maximum prescribed by the Act, and many of them not even the rates of pay upon which junior Clerks usually enter other departments of the Civil Service, as may be seen by the present average daily pay to which the several Clerks, Draftsmen, Surveyors, &c., have attained by a progressive system of increase after a lapse of eight-and-twenty years; thus, four Valuers whose term of service averages  $22\frac{1}{2}$  years have reached the maximum prescribed by enactment, viz., £1 per day, the remaining Valuers average 11s 5d.

Superintendents	-	-	-	8s. 8d.
Surveyors,	-	-	-	5s. 9d.
Draftsmen,	-	-	-	4s. 10d.
Clerks.	-	-	-	3s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

That the General Survey and Valuation of Ireland is a systematic work which can only be carried on by the aid of persons possessing scientific knowledge and in accordance with a uniform code of instruction.

That for Gentlemen possessed of the talents and education indispensable to the execution of such duties, the rates of pay above stated are quite inadequate to maintain them in the position which the respectability of the service demands, and at the same time afford the means of making provision for a state of incapacity or retirement.

That Petitioners, from the nature of their duties, are peculiarly subject to disease, not only by reason of accidents and hardship in the field, but also from the insidious influence of unremitting application to office duties of a peculiarly laborious character.

That, owing to the fact of no provision having been made for the continuance of the salaries of your Petitioners during illness, they are deprived of their only means of subsistence when afflicted with such visitations, at a time especially when their expenses are necessarily largely increased, and from this cause has ensued the result that several persons, by endeavouring to discharge their duty while suffering from indisposition, have rendered fatal an illness which in its early stages might have been arrested by a short period of relaxation.

That since, in accordance with the designs of the Legislature, the General Valuation and Survey of Ireland has approached the form of annual revisions of the Valuations already completed, the services of some of those who have devoted the prime of their lives to its duties must necessarily be dispensed with, and it will be seen that from the nature of the work which they have been instrumental in completing, superseding as it does the necessity for private Surveys and Valuations in this Country, further prospects of professional employments are destroyed, they are precluded also from the resources of Commerce or Agriculture by their previous pursuits and want of means, and being at an age beyond that contemplated by the present regulations for other Civil employments, the consideration is respectfully submitted as to the fate awaiting your Petitioners, for whom the Law secures no provision—no retiring pension.

That your Petitioners have already addressed the Commissioner of Valuation on the subject of this Petition, from whom they have learned by letter that, owing to the present state of the Law in regard to the Valuation Service, Legislative interference is indispensable to improve their anomalous condition.

That your Petitioners in approaching your Excellency do so with profound respect for the high office which has been intrusted to you, and also with feelings of the greatest admiration for the patronage and encouragement which your Excellency has exhibited towards science and the useful arts, and trust they have just grounds for confidence that their claims will receive at your hands the attention to which they humbly submit the justice of their case would seem to demand.

Therefore your Petitioners respectfully and earnestly pray that your Excellency may take the foregoing circumstances into favorable consideration, with a view to introduce such Legislative measures as may appear necessary to remove the peculiar and pressing grievances of their present position, and to place them on a similar footing with other Departments of the Civil Service, thereby securing to them permanency of employment, and consequent pension in declining years, or for discontinued service.

And your Petitioners will ever pray.

Signed on behalf of Petitioners,	{	JOHN BOYAN, ROBERT M'MICKEN, WILLIAM JONES, H. HUTCHINGS, Hon. Sec.
----------------------------------	---	---

We entertain no apprehension that the petition will not receive the due consideration of our present right-minded and statesmanlike Viceroy, who has never yet, during his long intercourse with Ireland, been found wanting in aiding and supporting any measure calculated to relieve the wants and miseries of the aggrieved. The justice of the claims urged by the petition must strike every well-thinking man—to redress the grievances set forth is the duty of any government anxious for the public good. Scarcely a department, Civil or Military, under the British Government, but has been improved or is being improved at the present moment, and why, let us ask, is the Valuation Department excluded? The officers of this department are the most hard-worked, ill-paid, and badly-treated body of men to be found in any kindred establishment in the kingdom. In making the assertion we feel fully justified, if not by experience, at least by facts brought under our notice from time to time. The valuation clerk is, without doubt, the hardest-worked man of his class to be found. In his Progress sheet he must insert the amount and description of the work done each day, and earnestly solicitous that the quantity and quality may be such as to entitle him to an additional sixpence per day at the end of twelve months, he commences his brain-wearing task at nine o'clock in the morning, and leaves at four o'clock, fagged, wearied, and fatigued. An official letter may be preparing for him during this time, which will convey to him the distressing tidings that his services are dispensed with for the present. Thus his days are spent 'twixt fear and hope, and in a few years he becomes pale, emaciated, and dejected; ill, but he cannot rest his wearied, racked frame, knowing that the motto of the office is—no Work no Pay. If married, while he decays day after day, he has the heart-sinking reflection that his wife and little ones are approaching the work-house as he nears the grave. Scarcely has his soul winged its way to eternity, than the news of his decease reaches the Valuation Office; the Death Sheet gone round, a subscription is set on foot by those who want assistance themselves; the burial fund is raised, and the mortal remains of the Valuation Office clerk are interred, and he bequeaths to the country a heart-broken widow and helpless offspring. This is no exaggeration, no flight of fancy, no ideal word-painting to excite the sympathies of either rich or poor; it is the sadly real state of things; it is the plain and unsophisticated truth, setting at defiance all contradiction. It is useless to proceed with, or enlarge upon, the grievances to which the officers of the Valuation service are subjected, they are already known throughout the British Kingdom, and they are as well known in the House of Commons, and to the Lords of the Treasury, as by the Commissioner of Valuation himself.

To whom may those officers attribute their wrongs? Is it to the Commissioner of Valuation, who, it is generally supposed, has absolute power in the management and arrangement of all matters pertaining to the Valuation Department of Ireland? No, Dr. Griffith deplores the present state of affairs himself, as much as the humblest of his assistants; and it is but justice to him to say that, espousing the cause of the petitioners and pledging himself to give their cause every support consistent with the duties that devolve upon him as a Government officer, repudiates at once, and for ever, the accusations alleged against him from time to time, and no doubt by men of little generosity of mind or justice, and we fear of no small share of malice. What Dr. Griffith says, we feel most confident he will do. His assistants therefore, may safely calculate upon his warm and straightforward support of their petition. The Commissioner thus pledged on the one hand, and the philanthropic conduct of the members who took up the case on the other, the officers of the Valuation Office may soon congratulate themselves on the speedy and successful issue of their movement; for never was there a petition presented to the House more worthy, in our opinion, of the prompt attention of the legislature.

The disadvantages accruing to the country by the system adopted in conducting the affairs of this all-important branch of the public service, must strike every reflecting and impartial man. To us it seems all but incredible, how competent persons can be had to discharge the duties of such an office as that held by a field or office assistant under Dr. Griffith, for the pay mentioned in the petition now before us. It is want alone that could cause an educated man to devote seven hours each day to the arduous duties of a field or office assistant in the Valuation Service of Ireland. If we combine with the miserable pay, anxiety, and fear of illness or dismissal, and also the certainty of want in either case, we can form a pretty fair idea of the state of mind of these gentlemen.

Up to the appointment of the present General Superintendent, the Valuation officers had to pay one penny for each error they committed in the calculation of acres, roods, and perches, and pounds, shillings, and pence; and this was deducted from their pay at the end of every month. We are also informed by a gentleman whose authority we cannot question, that the assistants of the Valuation Office were not exempted from labor on Good Fridays even, and the pay deducted for Christmas Day! So those who were religiously inclined enough to abstain from work on those days were made to pay for their "Pater Noster."

So sure as they went to pray,
As sure did they lose their pay.

If this did not savour of slavery we are really at a loss to know what does, nor can we agree with the moral poet who says—

"We have no slaves at home."

While the influence exercised by the Grand Jurors of Ireland is calculated to manacle the hands of the Commissioner of Valuation, and prevent him from giving to the labourer his hire, to which, in every sense of equity and justice, he is entitled, we cannot hope for much improvement. We say the Grand Jurors, for after examining carefully, leisurely, and impartially, the present obnoxious, and slave-like organization of the office now occupying our attention, we must attribute the present unfair, unjust, and lamentable position of the employés to the niggard disposition of the great majority of the Irish Grand Jurors.

Doubtless, before now, the complaints of the gentlemen employed on the Valuation of Ireland, have been considered in the proper quarters; for Lord Carlisle must have long since gathered from the Under Secretary for Ireland the amount, and the truth, of the grievances stated in the petition. Few gentlemen are better acquainted with the affairs of the Valuation Department than Colonel Larcom.

Every humane man knows and feels the truth of the remarks made by us on the present administration of affairs in this public office. The office would have been long since reorganized for the benefit of all parties, had the Commissioner the power to do so. This power was not vested in him, and while he had to contend with cheese-paring and dissatisfied Grand Jurors on the one side, who would grumble at an additional sum of sixpence per day, he had to listen to the well-founded complaints of his over-worked assistants on the other, and could not afford redress. Such has been, and is, the unenviable position of Dr. Griffith. He feels the unpleasantness of his position, and he is conscious that the claims of his assistants are the claims of justice, and is, therefore, determined, we are informed, to urge those claims, and have his assistants eligible to the privileges granted to other Government officers of their class. Let us hope that this may be the case, if so, it will be a pleasing episode in the official career of this well-tried and able public officer, and prove, even to his slanderers, how undeserving he has been, of the many wanton attacks made upon his character.

Should the petition of the Valuation assistants succeed in having the office reorganized and placed on the same footing as the Government offices of the country, the advantages accruing to the country would be commensurate with those conferred on the employed. In the first place, when the latter would feel that permanency was insured to him, and that his promotion depended upon his conduct and attention to business, he would take that interest in his business which at present he does not, nor cannot. He will feel that he has a situation worth attending to—his fears of illness will be mitigated when he knows that his day's pay will not be withheld from him—his suspense relative to the certainty or uncertainty of his being employed will be removed—he will look forward with pleasure to a vacation, however short, to recruit his health and relieve him from the monotonous and arduous duties of his office. These are privileges that cannot fail to be appreciated by every assistant in the Valuation Service, and unquestionably stimulate them to apply themselves with greater earnestness, greater assiduity, and infuse into them a degree of conscientiousness as to the discharge of their duties, without which the public can never be served with fidelity,

In fact, the administration of the office at present is unwise and impolitic; a reorganization is necessary, both for the benefit of the individual, and the advantage of the country. Let our readers compare the scale of salaries with that in any public office under the crown, or even under any public company, and he will see at once that the employés of the Valuation Service are the worst paid public servants in the United Kingdom, although it must be allowed that the scale of salaries in this office has been considerably increased since the appointment of John Ball Greene, Esq., the present able and energetic General Superintendent, who, since his appointment, has ever been foremost in promoting the welfare of those under him, and in so doing, he has best served the Department also.

We find that we are not alone in our advocacy of this cause; perhaps there was never an instance in which an oppressed condition met with more universal sympathy; all sections of creeds and politics, with the Press of England and Ireland having supported, with powerful arguments, the objects of the memorial. Our space would not admit of the introduction of one-tenth of the comments favorable to the cause that appeared in the leading newspapers, we must therefore content ourselves by selecting a few, and presenting them as a specimen of the whole. Such of our readers as are political enough to know the tendency of the different journals from which we have chosen these extracts, will at once perceive that journalists who oppose each other in sentiment on all other questions are unanimous in their opinion of the subject under consideration. We present our readers with the following extracts:—

* * * “the General Valuation Offices, where for years, large classes of good and tried servants, can be ranked amongst the hardest mentally worked, and the least proportionably rewarded in the Service.”—Civil Service Gazette September 1st, 1855.

“Men are here found crowded into apartments, on starvation pay, deprived of the stimulus of reward, and condemned to hopeless task work. Unwilling labour is thus obtained, whose defective results are beyond revision.”—Again—“We cannot close these remarks without the expression of unqualified condemnation of such a system of payments.” Again—“The work is most important and national, and demands the undivided attention of a clear headed and skilful officer, capable of understanding merit and fairly rewarding it.”—Ibid, September 29th 1855.

“We are unmoved in our opinion that the quality of the work performed is most inadequately paid for. The scale of pay in practice is preposterous—not a jot above bearable.”—Ibid October 27th, 1855.

“We believe the justice and strength of their claims are so apparent, that they need but to be stated to secure their immediate recognition.” “The scale of remuneration is considerably lower than in any other department of the Civil Service, a manifest injustice towards gentlemen of education and respectability, who have most important duties to discharge, and have hitherto discharged them with ability and zeal.” Again,—“Nominally, the service is not permanent, but, practically, it is so, as the Tenement Valuation Act provides for an annual revision of the several Tenements, and a complete Re-Valuation every Fourteen years, thus necessitating the employment of a permanent staff.”

Further—“A request so reasonable and fair ought to be acceded to, and we are sure that the Lord Lieutenant will give the subject his most favourable consideration, and do all in his power to advance the just claims of this very deserving body of men."—Freeman's Journal, 29th January, 1856.—(Quoted by Tipperary Free Press, February 1st, 1856.)

"The very just and reasonable Memorial of the General Valuation Employees was yesterday presented to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, by the Under Secretary for Ireland, Colonel Larcom. There is every reason to believe that its prayer will have the cordial support of the Chief Governor, in order to have the labours of this most useful class of Civil Servants properly remunerated."—Saunders' News Letter, January 30th, 1856.

"In our judgment this prayer is most reasonable, and the considerations by which it is enforced so cogent, that we feel assured if the granting of it depended on His Excellency, his own sense of justice would at once induce him to comply. The financial and statistical importance of the work, the diligence, skill, and accuracy which it requires, the admirable manner in which it is done, and the responsibility which it involves, as furnishing a basis for the general taxation of the country, all tend to establish the conclusion, that the highly deserving body of men engaged in it should be placed upon the same footing as the rest of the Civil Service,

"We are advocates for economy, but it is a miserable economy to require Gentlemen of talent and education, obliged to occupy a respectable position in society, to do the kind of work which this Valuation imposes, for rates of pay that must keep them in a constant struggle for existence, in wearing and harassing anxiety about their families, and in most painful and depressing uncertainty as to the future, for which there is no provision in case of sickness, old age, or death. We are aware that the head of this department has been constrained to pare down its expenses as much as possible, but the rigid sense of justice for which he is distinguished, and which led him to save all he could for the public, will also induce him to exert his influence to remove any difficulties, technical or otherwise, which may be in the way of this service in obtaining redress. While this is the only department in which no allowance is made for length of service, sickness, or death, and the rate of pay is so low that no provision can be made for the future; so that when any of its members are disabled or removed by death, his family are reduced to destitution, and there is no refuge for them but the Workhouse. Surely this ought not to be the condition of any body of public servants, educated as these gentlemen are, and performing duties onerous and responsible.

"We trust, therefore, that His Excellency will give a favourable consideration to this Memorial, supported, as we have no doubt, its prayer will be, by Colonel Larcom. We are sure that the Government never did an act that would be more acceptable to the public of all parties and classes who like to see the useful and hardworking servants of the state properly remunerated for their services."—Daily Express, Thursday, January 31st, 1856

"Pressure upon our space prevents us from laying the Memorial before our readers, but they may take our word for that it establishes a case of peculiar hardship, to which a large number of hardworking, educated, and deserving persons, have been long and most unfairly subjected. In language calm, respectful, and reasonable, it rather understates than exaggerates the severe and numerous grievances under which the Memorialists labour, and we have little doubt that the keen sense of justice and the kindly feeling of Lord Carlisle, will incline him to promote the object of his Petitioners.

"The employment of the Valuation, though nominally temporary, is in reality permanent. We believe there are men in the service of the Commission since its commencement, some twenty-five years since, or more." "By some ingenious application of the virtue of economy, he may respectably support a family upon this daily pay; but though he may reckon upon a continuance or even an improvement upon this refinement of ingenuity, he cannot reckon upon a continuance of health; and the instability of life is beyond his control. He may fall sick and his means of existence are at once cut off; or he may die and he leaves his family a burden upon the ratepayer.

"Surely the subscribers to the Memorial which has called for these remarks, are not unreasonable in seeking to remedy the anomaly which the Valuation presents as contrasted with other departments of the public service. They do not seek the establishment of a hot-bed for the growth of respectable sinecurists. They do not ask for relief from laborious duties. These duties they are willing to fulfil with their accustomed zeal and ability; but they, very naturally, ask for equitable remuneration. They ask, for the performance of a great deal of important work, what others obtain for doing little, or nothing whatever.

"We feel confident that the improvement they seek would be conducive to the public interest as well as their own. It will, we are persuaded, be found on enquiry, that more new hands have been employed on the General Valuation than upon any other department of the public service of the same extent, and within a given period. Young men of acquirements and good abilities have been often induced, from necessity, to accept temporary employment under Mr. Griffith; but they have done so as a mere stepping-stone to some place where their merits would be more equitably recognised. They have left when they learned by experience to be most useful, and their places had to be supplied by fresh, inexperienced hands, who in their turn have also resigned; thus subjecting the business to the danger arising from the almost daily recurring operations of unavoidable ignorance—for new hands, no matter how able, could not at once fall into the routine of an extensive public office.”—Evening Post, January 31st, 1856.

“The just and reasonable Memorial of the Valuation Employees was on Tuesday presented to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, by the Under Secretary for Ireland, Colonel Larcom. There is every reason to believe that its prayer will have the cordial support of the Chief Governor, in order to have the labours of this most useful class of Civil Servants properly remunerated.

“The document is clear in its statement of the peculiar hardships of that Service, the inadequate remuneration given to a most useful and intelligent body of public servants, and the injustice, for it is nothing else, of making no provision for a retiring allowance to them. The Petition is extremely forcible in its simple explanation of facts, and we earnestly hope that the Lord Lieutenant will use his influence to further its prayer.”—Evening Packet, January 31st, 1856.

“We believe the justice and strength of their claims are so apparent, that they need but to be stated to secure their immediate recognition.

“Nominally, the service is not permanent, but practically, it is so—as the Tenement Valuation Act provides for an annual revision of the several Tenements, and a complete Re-valuation every fourteen years, thus necessitating the employment of a permanent Staff.”—Tipperary Free Press, February 1st, 1856

“The following just and reasonable Memorial was on Tuesday presented to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant by the Under Secretary for Ireland, Colonel Larcom. There is every reason to believe that its prayer will have the cordial support of the Chief Governor, in order to have the labours of this most useful class of civil servants properly remunerated.”—Warder, February 2nd, 1856.

"In our last impression we published one of the justest remonstrances which ever proceeded from a hardly treated body of public servants.

"The Petitioners place their position before the representative of the Crown in this country, fully relying on his sense of justice, and with the same confidence may they trust the spirit of fairness the Public always manifest in regard to reasonable claims.

"We are certainly advocates for a careful economy in dealing with the public money, more especially when the cost of a department falls directly on a locality or particular part of the kingdom; but we do not understand the economy which refuses a proper recompense for onerous duties. We would pay public servants well, and require their duties to be performed in the most efficient manner. In the case before it is not to be questioned that the Officers engaged in making the General Valuation of Ireland, have discharged their task with great credit to themselves, and have thus rendered important service to the country, and yet the remuneration received by them is really too low, when the professional status required from many of them, and the intelligence demanded of all, are remembered.

"We are confident that the just request of the Memorialists to whose case we refer, will be brought before Parliament soon, in such a manner as to secure their better treatment.

"But the bitterest part of their grievances is, that theirs is a Department in which no allowance is made for length of service, sickness, or to the sorrowing family of the Officer after his death. Were the scale of payment high, the absence of such provision for the future old age or debility of the public servant might be excused on the ground of that liberality; but the salary is in this case as low as it could be—so low as to render it impossible for the recipient to make provision in this way. In the event of sickness he is, therefore, left wholly destitute, and at death his family have no claim to acknowledgement of his services, no matter how long and honorably he may have filled his position. They have taken the proper course in bringing their grievances under the attention of His Excellency, and we would have them prosecute the matter still further by seeking the intervention of an active Member of Parliament in bringing their claims formally before the House at a convenient opportunity after the opening business of the Session has been disposed of."—Evening Packet, Feb., 2nd, 1856.

"A memorial, or petition, laid at the feet of a great State Officer, representing the Sovereign authority, by a suffering class, with the hope of attracting attention to their wrongs, and with the design of soliciting a redress of their grievances, must necessarily be couched in submissive language, and be offered in humble guise. Rough facts must be smoothed down; disagreeable truths must be glossed over; bitter, heart-burning thoughts must be suppressed; feelings of indignation must be concealed; personalities must be eschewed; allusion to unworthy motives must be avoided; and the suppliants must approach the fountain of grace with a cautiously worded tale of their distress, and in the lowly attitude of humble petitioners for mercy. The Memorial presented to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by the Valuers, Superintendents, Surveyors, Draftsmen, and Clerks in the service of the Government Valuation and Survey of Rateable Property in Ireland—which will be found printed in another column—is no exception to the rule. A more modest, guardedly-phrased, and eloquently-simple appeal to the Queen's representative could not be made. No word of invective escapes, no syllable of imputation is breathed against any one; the whole supplication is calculated to disarm hostility, to throw a veil of oblivion over past injustice, and to rely upon reason, good feeling, and common sense for future redress. The facts set forth in that Memorial have been studiously understated, and the grievances endured by the Valuation Staff have been carefully, perhaps judiciously, undercoloured; yet what fair and unbiassed person can read that document and not come to the conclusion, that the gentlemen who have been employed in this service have been scandalously treated, and that it was full time some justice, however late, be done them? A scale of present pay, contemptible and disgraceful beyond all conception in this country; an inhuman system of stopping salaries during periods of illness caught in discharging the trying duties of the service; a barbarous custom of leaving them unprovided for when age or infirmity overtakes them;—surely these are grievances that ought not to be permitted to exist a day longer. When we think of the valuable nature of the work performed—the basis for the levy of poor-rates and grand jury rates, for the regulation of the property qualification, for the elective franchise, for the sale of incumbered estates, for the assessment of inland revenue and income tax, and for numberless other local and national purposes; and when we reflect on the superior intelligence, practical skill, and scientific knowledge requisite in those employed in working out the details; and when we look at the miserly and beggarly sums doled out under the name of remuneration—3*s.* 10½*d.* per day to Clerks, 4*s.* 10*d.* to Draftsmen, 5*s.* 9*d.* to Surveyors, 8*s.* 5½*d.*

to Superintendents, and the comparatively munificent amount of 11s. 7½d. to Valuers—we are amazed beyond all expression at Irish inhumanity and Irish endurance. That Lord Carlisle will take the humble and heart-touching petition presented to him into favourable consideration we have not the remotest doubt. His Excellency's kind and generous nature will revolt against the facts thus brought before him, and we feel convinced that no efforts will be wanting on his part in impressing on His Majesty's Government the necessity of placing the petitioners on a footing similar to that of other civil servants, securing them permanency of employment, and a provision for sickness and old age."—Civil Service Gazette, February 9th, 1856.

"The petitioners are treated like common day-labourers; they are able to attend to their daily task, mental or bodily, they are paid; if lassitude or sickness intervene, and they are 'knocked up' for a day, a week, or a fortnight, they are recompensed for the actual time spent at business, and no more. Educated men—scientifically educated—men of good parts, and worked up, and worse treated than beasts of burthen. Domestic animals, when overtaken by sickness, and unable to perform the usual amount of labour, are supplied with all things necessary for the support of life and the restoration of health, until once more able to resume their routine duties; but the Valuation Clerk will get his 3s. 10d. a-day, while he works, the Draftsman has 4s. 10d., the Surveyor has 5s. 9d., the Superintendent has 8s. 5d., and the Valuator has 11s. 7d., only while he works. But let him cease for a day, and the day's wages is withheld. These subordinates, also, are liable to be discharged at a very short notice; and no matter what energy, talent, or science they may bring to bear in the execution of their duties, no provision is made for old age or sickness. The value of the labours of this staff of men is known over the whole of Ireland. On the different Valuations of each County the Poor Law taxation and the Elective Franchise is founded. The more respectable the men are, the greater their probity, and the more efficient their labours, the more the country is indebted to them for returns agreeable to truth and justice. We hope, therefore, that His Excellency will aid the petitioners to attain a status commensurate with the responsibilities of their employment, and that a Bill will be brought before Parliament constituting the Valuation a Governmental Department, when we may fairly expect that a high scale of salaries, and retiring pension for assiduous services, will reward the meritorious."—Drogheda Conservative, February 16th, 1856.

"There is no worse remunerated body of individuals in the country than those employed in the Irish Valuation Office. At the same time the work on which they are engaged is of paramount importance to the public interests, and it is but proper and just that they should be adequately paid for their valuable and well executed labours. There are, we believe, nearly two hundred persons employed at the present time in this office, under the superintendence and direction of the eminent engineer, Mr. Griffith, who has been for many years so well known in this country, and neither the building in which the work is executed nor the scale of remuneration awarded them, is worthy of the country or the important service in which they are engaged. It is a well established fact that the health of many of those employed in the Irish Valuation Office, has seriously suffered from over-crowding and ill-ventilation, while, no doubt, in many of the large public buildings of Dublin, such, for example, as the Custom House, suitable accommodation could be easily procured. We rejoice to know that at length a strenuous effort is being made on behalf of this hard-worked and ill-paid class of public servants; and, if principles of justice and equity at all influence the Government of the country, we may expect soon to learn that the appeal has not been made in vain. We do not hesitate to express our conviction, that Lord Carlisle, to whose consideration, in the first instance the application has been submitted, will exert his influence with the Executive in having tardy justice done to a most useful and meritorious class of public officers. Though we differ in many political views with his Excellency, we believe he possesses a feeling and considerate nature, and we have no doubt that the fair and well merited claim on behalf of the employées of the Valuation Office will command his Excellency's sympathy and influential co-operation. Of one thing there can exist no manner of doubt, that justice cannot be much longer delayed in such a case, when public opinion has been once brought to express itself on behalf of so meritorious and so ill-used a body of men as the Officials of the Irish Valuation Office."—Ulster Gazette, February 23rd, 1856.

"When the office was created in 1828, it was intended as a temporary establishment; but in carrying out its aims, the necessity of its being a permanent one has been fully demonstrated. As yet no Act of Parliament has given it in theory that position which it has in practice and in fact; and so, though it is, to all intents and purposes, a Government Office, its inmates have none of the privileges or advantages of other Government Departments, where, for efficient discharge of the duties, considerably less educational qualifications and professional attainments required.

"But why go through the catalogue of those who throng the dreary block of buildings? They are the most hard-worked all who, in public offices, do the public work. Within those walls will be found more talent, skill, and capacity, than in most of the Government Departments higher in the public estimation. Within those walls a useful and important public work is efficiently discharged, and surely, in the present temper of public opinion, men of attainments such as are required in the Valuation Office will not be left with such hardships unredressed.

"Such is the state of things which it is now sought to reform, such the anomalies and grievances which, if nought but an Act of Parliament can remedy, no Legislature ought to allow exist a day longer. If the Irish Valuation Office must be a permanent, not a temporary establishment, as we believe it must necessarily be, we believe that if its constitution be remodelled, and permanency secured, as is sought by the petition which has been presented to Lord Carlisle, a better state of things will arise in the country, and for the staff."—Nation, February 9th, 1856.

"The case made out by the memorialists is irrefragable; and from all we know of Lord Carlisle's antecedents—the kind and justice-loving Lord Morpeth—the patron of art, science, and literature—we confidently anticipate a favourable issue. The Empire should not withhold such reward from its public servants, more particularly, when a high standard of education and practical knowledge is indispensable to render them capable to perform their duties—than the same class would receive in any of the walks of private enterprise. We are anxious to see right men in their right places; but this can never be effected, unless they be fairly remunerated for their mental and physical labours."—Wexford Independent, February 13th, 1856.

"This respectable and intelligent body, whose services have been, and will ever continue to be, of such vast public interest and benefit, have addressed a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant setting forth and praying for the redress of what is most decidedly a great grievance. Whilst their rate of remuneration is anything but large or commensurate with the importance of their duties, as compared with the standard of pay allowed to other employees in Government Offices, there is, under the existing law, no provision made for temporary illness, nor for retiring allowance to those who wear out their lives in the public service, and who may at any time be flung upon the world when advanced in life and by previous habits and training rendered unfitted to procure a livelihood by other means of employment. The Memorialists of his Excellency show ample cause for the introduction of some legislative provision to meet their case, and it is impossible to peruse the document without admitting the justice of the prayer, and sympathising in its object."—Kilkenny Moderator, Feb. 13th, 1856.

"The importance of the Government Valuation, as the measure of poor-rate, grand jury, municipal, and of general as well as local taxation, is universally recognised, while it is admitted that none but men possessing a considerable amount of education, are qualified for the duties required.

"It is not however commonly known, that the gentlemen employed by Government in this arduous and highly responsible service, are dealt with in a style of beggarly parsimony which respectable merchants would blush to exhibit in relation to the humblest attendants about their places of business.

"If one of the Valuation officers in the employment of Her Majesty's Government, and doing what is really the National business, chance to be sick even for a single day, his day's pay is deducted, and if his illness be of longer duration, every moment's absence is carefully reckoned up, and subtracted from his quarter's allowance! This is disgraceful, to give it a gentle name, and then, though a man may have spent his life in the Public Service, with a salary so miserably constituted as that now described, he has no prospect of a superannuation allowance, other than that which he may be able to provide out of his own savings. A Memorial on this subject has been presented to the Lord Lieutenant by the parties immediately interested, and public opinion, we feel confident, will concur with them in pressing it upon His Excellency's attention. For our own parts, we have no hesitation in frankly declaring it a disgrace to our administrative economy, that any necessity should exist for His Excellency's interference in a matter of so self-evident equity."—Londonderry Standard, February 14th, 1856.

Why then, we may ask, should the prayer of the memorial not be granted? Were it one of those "vexed questions," about which so much difference of opinion is felt and expressed, we might find a motive for delay, or even for refusal: but the case is far otherwise. We believe there would not be found one opposing voice throughout the three kingdoms, to any measure adopted for the relief of this useful body of public servants; and we are convinced that no Government ever possessed an opportunity of doing a more just and graceful act than is now in the power of Her Majesty's present advisers, by placing these gentlemen in an advantageous position on the Civil Service List.

The petition is now before the public, and under the consideration of Parliament, and whatever may be its ultimate destiny, or however short it may come in its results of the expectations of the many, whose hopes and prospects are dependent on the terms in which it is treated as a whole, there is one clause which demands summary and immediate redress, the existence of which is a disgrace to humanity and to the country which tolerates it. We allude to the stoppage of the miserable pittance doled out to the officers of the service under the name of salary, during visitations of sickness. Referring to this pressing hardship, the petitioners say—

“That, owing to the fact of no provision having been made for the continuance of the salaries of your Petitioners during illness, they are deprived of their only means of subsistence when afflicted with such visitations, at a time especially when their expenses are necessarily largely increased, and from this cause has ensued the result that several persons, by endeavouring to discharge their duty while suffering from indisposition, have rendered fatal illness which in its early stages might have been arrested by a short period of relaxation.”

This is, indeed, a monster grievance, the existence of which we would, from its very absurdity, be inclined to disbelieve were it not put forth in a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant and circulated extensively throughout the country. We cannot think that the petitioners would have the hardihood to put forth a case that did not exist, consequently we are obliged to believe, that now, in the nineteenth century, this period of Administrative Reform, there are from one hundred to one hundred and fifty, intelligent, well-born, and well educated gentlemen, most of them professional, employed in carrying out a work of vast national importance, and with admitted ability, who in the discharge of their duties “are peculiarly subject to disease,” and frequently its ready victims, deprived of all means of existence the moment they are refracted enough, to neglect the calls of official routine, and yield themselves up to the more authoritative demand of the Almighty, who has seen fit to leave them on a bed of sickness.

That such a system should be tolerated under such circumstances, is, as we before remarked, a disgrace to humanity, and more so, as we are unable to find out any tangible cause for its existence. It may, of course, be a means of preventing pretended ailments, but why should these unhappy officers be the only ones in Europe who are considered so degraded, as to require such a test. A convict-felon will be exonerated from labour, and have dainties added to his ordinary fare on a medical certificate of sickness, but a valuation officer possessing more than ordinary ability and education, must forsooth be fined in the whole amount of his wretched "Salary" for such time as he has the temerity to obey the mandate of God, and give up his office duties for the less congenial element of a bed of sickness. Surely the medical profession has not so degenerated in the opinion of the administrators of this Department, that a certificate of temporary incapacity for laborious duties would not be sufficient, without adding the "thumb-screw" fine.

We know no greater hardship in public oppression than this, and we can well conceive the horror produced in the minds of all these people, when the sound goes forth, that "the plague is abroad in the land," or the nervous twitching produced by the slightest cold or headache, fearing that it is the premonitor of a visitation, which not only deprives them of the blessings of health for a time, but leaves their families in starving expectation of the day, when half restored, and ready for relapse, the poor sufferer again returns to resume his duties and his pay.

The petition draws no exaggerated picture of the consequences of this system; men already crushed by poverty, and and beggarly pay, but with that inseparable addition to a poor Irishman's responsibilities, a large family, are obliged from absolute necessity, to continue at work unceasing, during periods when shattered health suggests a little rest and relaxation. The result is obvious, and inevitable—the body already acted upon and debilitated by constant application, now becomes the victim of the anxious mind. "What is to become of my family?" asks the doomed sufferer, "if I yield to this visitation; where shall I find food or other necessities, now that my credit is ruined by the knowledge that, while I must see doctors and procure medicines, my pay will cease from the moment I am laid up?" Thus harassed, thus desponding, overpowering sickness obtains an easy mastery over that victim, and in the language of the petition, "persons by endeavouring to discharge their duty while suffering from indisposition, have rendered fatal an illness, which, in its early stages might have been arrested by a short period of relaxation." To this monstrous system we desire to see an immediate end; there can be no necessity for its continuance, and we question whether it is not a matter coming within the province of ordinary humanity to exterminate.

We have simply represented the position of each and every officer in the Valuation Service ; and, from what we have said, our readers may judge whether the great majority of them might not at present say, in the language of poor deep-hearted Hood's undying song—

“ Work—Work—Work,
Till the brain begins to swim ;
Work—Work—Work,
Till the eyes are heavy and dim !”

Yea, perhaps, until brain and eyes fail altogether; and then—sad reflection, “ ——— poverty, hunger,” and—DEATH.

But, when we remember that Dr. Griffith, with his vast experience, and his long, unblemished official career, gives his generous and hearty approval to the movement, we cannot allow those gentlemen to despond. The most respectable portion of the Press too, bringing a clear, noonday-light to bear on the present state of this important branch of the public service, makes us feel most confident that their just demands will ere long be conceded.

Dr. Griffith's name is identified with a great work.—He is a man of history, as “ Griffith's Valuation” is now a “ household word,” and will be referred to hereafter, for ages to come as a standard authority. Let us indulge in the hope that he will crown this great work by ensuring for his office the permanency to which it is eminently entitled.

The following extract from the Civil Service Gazette of June 7th, has just met our eye—“ We have much gratification in announcing, that an influential member of the Superannuation Committee, who has taken the case of the supernumerary clerk in hand, has resolved to press upon the Committee the adoption of a recommendation that all supernumeraries who have served a certain number of years shall be established as permanent officers. The justice of such a proposition is self-evident, and we have well-grounded confidence that it will be agreed to without opposition.”

Perhaps the Civil Service Superannuation Committee would take the case of the Valuation officers into consideration, and it is for Dr. Griffith to consider whether the time has now arrived to give with effect the weight of his influence to bring their cause to a successful issue.

One word in conclusion—Before we lay down our pen, we would venture, with all true and earnest feeling of regret for those gentlemen's present state, to recommend to them the suppression of all clamour just now, as it seems to us at present indiscreet. Ill-timed agitation embarrasses and retards, nay, often mars altogether, the kind exertions of those anxious to redress.

We have two vagabond tastes, both derived from that literary man-about-Rome, Horace. He loved to listen to the Fortune Tellers, we love to hear the Ballad Singers : he delighted to linger about the columns ; we are happy in tumbling the volumes of the book stall, and of the book auction-room. We know every ballad, sung from the Coombe to Donnybrook, from the dirge which tells us of O'Connell, that "He is gone, he is dead,

 He is raised to high Heaven;
 His soul is at rest,
 An' his bones is in Glasnevin ;"

to that which teaches the wise truth, that a young lady should not meet her lover

"Along the dark arches Down by the Railway."

We know all the books of our obliging friend Connolly, of Ormond Quay ; and we have had many a flirtation with the ever changing stock of our learned, and zealous to please friend, Jones, of D'Olier-street. Then we have had old friendships amongst the quaint, rare stock of George Bumstead on Holborn Hill ; and we have known pleasant days amongst the fine old books of Russell Smith, of Quaritch, and of Waller, in Fleet-street. But, for the bright days of wandering amongst the stalls, give us, as those marked with stone peculiarly white, the sweet summer's times when, commencing at the Institute we have continued along the quays to the Tuileries, and then have returned to the Institute, by the river wall amongst the very cheap book stalls. At one side are the wonderfully tight, bright-eyed little women who ask you to look at all the books and pictures at once. At the other side you have those dream books, and song books, and letter writers with every dream, and song, and letter, except the very dream or song, or letter you want. The old pictures out of the Fontaine, which make you blush, but are expatiated on by the seller. The astoundingly cheap old odd books, the books we look and pounce on, that are forced upon you; the bright sun, the bright faces, the fragrant segars you may smoke and no body is offended; the riant air of all about you make this line of quays the most agreeable of all, in all the world, to the literary flâneur. That old, ever reviving Tuileries beside your Notre Dame before you; records of romance, of crime, of suffering, and of glory—the wisdom of literature living on forever, and never changing its kings of thought, all around you.

But the GREAT Libraries are great, for references particularly. We never enter the Imperial or the British without recalling our old friend Burton's words, and exclaiming, "What treasures are extant in law, physic, and divinity, for profit, pleasure, practice, speculation, in verse or prose, &c. ! Their names alone are the subject of whole volumes, we have thousands of authors in all sorts, many great libraries full well furnished, like so many dishes of meat, served out for several palates; and he is a very block that is affected with none of them."

We think thus with the old Anatomist, and a recent visit to the Museum Library, and a stroll amongst Rogers's books, have suggested to us the possibility of making a few interesting papers out of the materials of our odd books, collected in the vagrant wanderings amongst old books to which we have confessed ourselves most addicted.

To the literary student the term ACADEMY is one of frequent occurrence. What is the history of Academies as we now understand the term? Our history is as follows.

Towards the end of the sixteenth century, a poet, a friend of Ronsard, J. Antoine Baïf, founded, in a house in the Rue des Fosses-Saint-Victor, a reunion of wits and musicians, whose chief object it was to study grammatically the language sound. They gave concerts which attracted a great number of young noblemen. In 1570, Charles IX granted letters patent, in which he declares, "that the Academy, though yet low, was deserving of the highest honors," "he accepted the surname of protector and auditor of it." Parliament, supported by the bishop of Paris and the university, after offering great opposition to the registering of those letters, were at length obliged to yield. The successor of Charles IX, Henry III., took the Academy under his protection; but the death of Baïf, and the troubles of the League, speedily caused the downfall of this establishment, which had already gained importance, as we learn from the following passage in a manuscript of G. Collete: "Philosophical lectures, by Amadis Jamyn, were delivered in presence of Henry III, in the Academy of Jean Antoine Baïf, established in the neighbourhood of the Faubourg Saint Marcel. For I know by tradition, that Amadis Jamyn was of this celebrated company, to whom also belonged Gui de Pibrac, Pierre de Ronsard, Philippe Desportes, Jaques Davy Duperron, and many other great wits of that time. Apropos of what I mentioned, that I had formerly seen some leaves of a book of manuscript of the institution of this noble and famous Academy, in the hand of William Baïf, son of Anthony Baïf, who had rescued them from a pastry cook's shop, where the natural son of Phillippe Desportes, who did not walk in the glorious footsteps of his father, had sold them, with several other curious and learned manuscripts; irreparable loss! What was more painful still, in the book of this institution, which was a beautiful book in vellum, we saw that the good King Henry III, the Duke de Guise and the greater number of the nobles and ladies of the court, had all promised to aid in the establishment and support of the Academy, which took part with Henry III, in the troubles and confusion of the civil war that agitated the kingdom. The King, the Princes, the Nobles, the savants who formed this celebrated body, had all subscribed to this book, and affixed their names to it. This was not, after all, the first design of this noble institution, which was to have effected wonders in the development of science and language." * renewed the project designed by Baïf, and a scholar, David Rivault, published, in 1612, a little pamphlet from eight to sixteen pages, which is very rare. It was named, The Design of an Academy and its Introduction into Court. The Author proposed to establish an academy which should embrace all sciences, theology excepted.

Towards 1630, a counsellor, secretary to the King, Valentine Conrart, established at his own house a re-union of learned men more or less esteemed. There were Godeau, Gombauld, Chapelain, Giry, Habert, the abbé de Cerisy, Serisay, and Malleville. Introduced into this society by Malleville, Farene in his turn, brought Desmarets and the abbé de Bois Robert, who mentioned it to his patron, Cardinal Richelieu, who in 1634, offered to take the members of the society under his patronage, and proposed to constitute it a public society. Notwithstanding the resistance of Serisay, de Malleville and several others, who wished respectfully to refuse the Minister, it was decided, "that the abbé de Bois Robert be requested to thank very humbly M. le Cardinal for the honor he had done them, and to assure him, that their aspirations had never reached so high; that his Eminence's intention had taken them by surprise, but that they were determined to obey his wish."

In accordance with Richelieu's orders the society wrote out themselves their statutes, and took the title of The French Academy: before they were called indiscriminately by the names of The Academy of Beaux Esprits, Academy of Eloquence, Eminent Academy. They announced distinctly the object they had in view in a discourse, where several remarkable passages have been found on the arrangement of the French language. It was there said: "That it seemed to want nothing to perfect the happiness of the kingdom but to extricate the language which we now speak from a number of barbarous tongues—that our language, more perfect already than any other of the living languages, could as easily succeed to the Latin, as the Latin to the Greek, if they were only more careful with regard to elocution; that the duty of the academicians would be to purify the language from the corruption which it had contracted in the mouths of the people, or in the throng of the palace, and in the impurity of wranglers, or the incorrect use of it by ignorant courtiers, or by the abuse of those who corrupted it in writing, and by those who spoke well in the pulpit what was necessary to say, but did not otherwise," &c.

The letters patent for the foundation of the French Academy were signed the 2nd of Jan., 1635. Pierre Seguier took charge of the seals, to which was attached the great seal, on which was inscribed a list of the academicians. His example was followed by Montmort, Master of Requests, by du Chastelet and Bantin, Counsellors of State, and by Servian, Secretary of State. Some time after, Richelieu, to whom the King had granted full power, signed the statutes, effacing only the article signifying that each of the academicians promised "to revere the virtue and memory of Monsignor their protector."

The registering of letters patent for the new Academy met the same opposition in Parliament as in the time of Charles IX., and it was not finally admitted for two years and a-half, after three letters of command and the strongest menaces of the Cardinal. The Parliament adding the following clause, "That the company or assembly should take no cognizance of anything but of ornamenting, embellishing, and augmenting the French language, and of the books useful for that purpose." The Academy deemed it advisable to accept this clause, because some lawyers were figuring in it, and henceforward all these who broke through this rule by any fault of tongue could be instantly fined.

The Academy was hardly constituted definitively* when it became the butt of all sorts of satirical epigrams, and witticisms. They said that Richelieu had endowed each member with a yearly income of 2,000 livres, out of the 80,000 livres destined for cleansing the city.

The Academy was not slow in becoming an instrument in the hands of Richelieu, who had committed to him the judgment of Corneille's Cid. This chef d'œuvre was condemned, and the Cardinals, who had appointed Chapelain as compiler of the decision, corrected it himself and confirmed the sentence.

The Academy was constituted more regularly under Louis XIV. who took it under his protection, and assigned forty desks for the forty members. He also presented to it 600 volumes, which were the real commencement of the library of the Institute.

In consequence of the royal favor, the title of academician was again sought by the great nobles. "The Academy came then," said the abbé de la Chambre, "a glorious and triumphant Academy.....clothed in the purple of the Cardinals and Chancellors, protected by the greatest monarch in the world.....filled with the princes of the church and senators, ministers, dukes and peers, counsellors of State, who stripped themselves of all their other honors, were but too happy to be mixed up pell-mell amidst a crowd of innumerable authors, historians, poets, philosophers, orators.....without distinction and without precedence."

But what the Academy gained in éclat, it lost in independence and consideration; a place in the Academy became not a reward to merit,* but to favor and considerations together foreign to the object of the institution. Here are some examples:—

Lavaur kept the books of the Louvre; having happily negotiated the marriage of one of Colbert's daughters with the duke de Mortemart, he asked him what he would demand as a reward. He requested, without ceremony, a place in the Academy, and was not long before he obtained one, though he had no other claim or title to it.

Pierre Corneille being dead in 1684, the Duke de Maine, who was at the time but fourteen years old, had the strange whim of replacing the great tragedian. He mentioned it to Racine, who, being then director, assembled his colleagues from whom he demanded fifteen days adjournment, this was voted with acclamation. They authorised him to reply in the name of his colleagues, that had they not even a vacant place there was not an academician who would not be delighted to die for him, in order to create one. "Our predecessors," said D'Alembert, "were, as we have seen, as ready as Décius to immolate themselves for the honor of the country." Happily Louis XIV. spared the company this new proof of submission. He refused to ratify the election of the young prince. Therefore Corneille replaced his brother.

* A great but illiterate lord, as were almost all the great nobles of the period, placed himself in turn to succeed Conrart; Patru said of his confreres, "an ancient Greek had a lyre, in which he broke a string; instead of joining it with a gut, he would have a silver string, and the lyre lost its harmony." This apologue had as much success as that of Agrippa. But the Academy forgot very soon to take the wise lesson.

It was at the solicitation of Pontchartrain that Simon de la Loubère, a scholar above mediocrity, was received into the Academy. This it was that gave rise to an epigram attributed to la Fontaine:—

Il en sera, quoi qu'on en dise,
C'est un impôt que Pontchartrain
Veut Mettre sur l'Académie.

There was more than one member of the Academy, who, like Loubère, could be really considered as a tax levied by the Court on this illustrious company.

Some academicians came one day to offer Turreil's chair to the Comptroller General Desmarets, who replied, "I have in my office a head clerk to whom that offer would be more suitable." Thus was a man named J. Roland Malet, who never in his life composed more than one paltry ode, crowned by the Academy. Nevertheless, they were anxious he should be admitted. But he remained so unknown, that we can neither learn the date nor place of his birth.

The Academy was nothing better till the time of Mézeray, who always put in a black-ball when they wished to select any one for admission. They were a long time without discovering whence proceeded those everlasting protestations. In the end they discovered it, and having asked Mézeray the reason of his conduct, he replied, that it was in order to leave to posterity a monument of the independence of election in the Academy.

The Academy sought eagerly to admit members altogether strangers to literature. They offered a place to Marshal Saxe, who refused. They had from him a letter on this subject where, we read the following passage; "Ils veulent me fero de la Cadémie, cela m'irait come une bage a un chas."

Voltaire was right in thus defining the Academy, "a body where they received titled persons, men in office, prelates, lawyers, physicians, geometricians, and even scholars."

This submission of the Academy to power was manifested not only by admissions, but also by exclusions. Thus the abbé de Saint-Pierre, having delivered a discourse on the Polysinodie, where, whilst passing a eulogium on the councils established by the Regent, he criticised severely several acts of the government of Louis XIV. Cardinal Polignac indignant at such boldness, denounced the discourse to the Academy, and demanded that the author should be severely punished.

The unfortunate abbé de Saint-Pierre was not even permitted to justify himself, and on the 5th of May 1718, his exclusion was pronounced by twenty-three of his fellows. His place remained vacant.

Condorcet having refused to pass an eulogium on the Duke de la Vrillière was not summoned to the Academy till after the death of Maurepas, whom the academicians feared to displease.

Thanks to this spirit of servility, the Academy was fallen low in public opinion at the end of the last century, that was generally said that Voltaire in dying had borne away the literary talent, and Foncemagne all the honesty; which as Delille forcibly remarked, was saying very little for those who survived them.

Oliver Patru, admitted in 1640 to the Academy, delivered a discourse of thanks, though only to his confreres, yet this vote of thanks was an obligation imposed afterwards on all candidates. Some great noblemen were alone admitted without this formality, amongst others Colbert. At a later period other motives obliged admission without this formality, of persons of our age, as Châteaubriand, Maret, and Regnault St-Jean d'Angely.

This obligation of a public harangue hindered the Duke de la Rochefoucauld, author of The Maxims, from presenting himself to the Academy. He could not endure exposure before such an auditory, and did not feel capable of pronouncing a harangue of several lines, without fainting.

Marshal Richelieu was bolder than Rochefoucauld. The discourse pronounced by him, and which is still in existence written in his own hand, may be found the grossest orthographical errors. He has written reigne, for regne; seint, for sein; flambau, for flambeau; dérangassent, for derangeassent; courté, for cour; rendus, for rendu; pris, for priz; créteil, for chretien; antier, for entier, &c., though he had himself composed the address.

In 1748, this same Duke de Richelieu, finding himself director of the Academy, begged Voltaire to compose for him the congratulatory address to the king. A copy of it was circulated, as soon as Richelieu had given it expression.

The custom of reciting these discourses was not, we think, a happy innovation, and, from the beginning, the public ridiculed it severely; the president De Mesme compared them to those solemn masses where the celebrant, after having incensed all the assistants, concluded by being incensed in turn. Piron, having been once on the point of election, was warned by the secretary to be ready, his own duty being to reply to the candidate's discourse. "My discourse is quite ready," said Piron, "and yours also"—"How is that?"—"I will rise, I will take off my hat, I will say: Gentlemen, I thank you for the honor you have done me in admitting me. You'll then rise, you'll take off your hat and you'll reply: 'Sir, that is to me a pleasure.'" Let us add that these addresses were never the composition of those who recited them. We know, for example, what were the discourses of Duois and Thomas.

Those nobles whom the Academy admitted so easily into their body, made them often rudely feel the distance between a great lord and a plebeian. The Bishop of Noyon, Clermont Tonnerre, having replaced Barbier d'Ancourt, did not condescend in his opening address to eulogise his predecessor. The Academy expressing their surprise, he replied that he made a rule never to praise plebeians. This reply aroused the indignation of the assembly, and Clermont Tonnerre was obliged, in order to repair the unbecomingness of his conduct, to insert in the printed copy of his discourse a panegyric that he was ashamed to utter.

The writers of those reception discourses, or of eulogies, seemed to have easily forgotten that the object of the institution was the ornament, embellishment, and the augmentation of the French language. Thus, it is known by a letter of Marshal de Beauvau, that on the reception of M. de Marian by the French Academy there was a sentence of the abbé Hardion spoken, containing one hundred and eighty words. It is told of Sedain, who wrote as bad verse as prose, and who took but little trouble about the matter, that having heard the reception address of one of his new colleagues, he cast himself on the candidate's neck, and exclaimed with emotion: "Ah! sir, during the twenty years I have been writing Bombast, I have heard nothing like that."

"The academicians of this time," said Longuerue, "turned their backs on eloquence, and the alteration was at the king's expense, who was made to pay for this want." It was the same Longuerue who, solicited by several academicians to present himself to the French Academy, replied: "I will think of it when you will have given up your nonsense."

The Perpetual Secretary Villar, in giving an account of l'Essai sur l'intonation de la langue française, by Morel, contrives the following sentence—"Morel has retarded the ends of science, and it is almost beyond a doubt that he made a step towards it." Made a step towards a thing which he had retarded.

Things were equally bad in the Academy of Inscriptions. Talleyrand de Boze, wishing to eulogise five notices of the abbé Tallemant, which formed altogether twelve pages, made use of the following strange expressions: "the ingenious manner," says he, "in which M. L'abbé describes our losses, has often made me wish they were more frequent." We must confess such language was but little flattering to the other academicians.

"One day a wit from England asked me," writes Voltaire, "for the notes (or Journal) of the Academy. They have written no journal, I replied, but they have printed sixty or eighty volumes of compliments. He ran over one or two, but could not comprehend the style though he understood all the good authors very well. All that I could glean, said he to me, from all those fine discourses, is, that the candidate having assumed that his predecessor was a great man, Cardinal Richelieu a very great man, Chancellor Séguier a still greater man—the director replied to him in the same strain, and added that the candidate would be allowed also to be a great man, and as for him, the director, he would not desist without doing his part. It is easy to see by what fatality almost all the academical discourses were rendered so discreditable to the body: vitium est temporis potius quam hominis. The custom was insensibly established, that the academicians should repeat these eulogies on their entrance, which imposed on them a species of command to weary the public. The necessity of speaking, the embarrassment of having nothing to say, and the emulation of genius, are three things capable of rendering even the greatest man ridiculous. Not being able to find new thoughts, they only sought to discover subterfuges, and spoke without reflection as some persons will, who think vaguely, or like those who though seeming to eat, yet perish from inanition. Instead of having a law, as was enforced in the French Academy, for the publication of those discourses, by which alone the were transmitted, there should have been a law to prevent their being printed."*

The Academy distributed, and continue to distribute annual prizes on subjects sent in for competition, and it is but right to state that their choice is but rarely ratified by the public.

"I composed, at eighteen," relates Voltaire, "an ode for the prize of the French Academy; which was borne away by the abbé du Jarri. I do not consider that my ode was very good; but the public were not quite content with the decision of the Academy. I remember among the many rare faults with which this little prize poem abounded, this verse—

‘Et des pôles brûlants jusqu’aux pôles glacés.’

M. de la Mothe, a very amiable man and a great genius, and who piqued himself on his scientific knowledge, had by his interest awarded this prize to the abbé du Jarri; and when reproached with his decision, and above all the verse of the freezing pole and the burning pole, he replied that it was a philosophical affair, which was under the jurisdiction of the Academy of Science and not of the French Academy. Besides he was not quite sure that they had not burning poles there, and in fact, the abbé du Jarri was his friend."†

The Academy having crowned, in 1717, a detestable ode of Gacon's, were afterwards so much ashamed of their award, that they sent the prize secretly to the author, to avoid the disgrace of the public being aware of it.

The Academy, often abused by the public, was sometimes ridiculed even by its own members. According to one of its rules, no academician could put in for a prize which he had proposed. In 1779, Laharpe dared to infringe this rule, and sent a dithyrambe in honor of Voltaire, which he read himself to * Voltaire, XXX. Lettre Philosophique.

† The abbé du Jarri was sixty-five years of age. The subject was an ode on the vow of Louis XIII. The subjects were generally ill chosen. One day the Academy, in order to compliment Louis XIV, thought it necessary to propose the following question:—"Which of the king's virtues merit a preference?" Louis XIV, notwithstanding his love of adulation, was disgusted by such flattery, and expressly prohibited that what was proposed should appear in the address.

the assembly. Thanks to the eloquence of his delivery, carried nearly all the votes. However, he was afterwards severely censured for his conduct.

Speaking one day to Suard of the mediocrity of the piece crowned by the Academy: "what we demand from our contributors," said he, "is not poetry itself, but poetical flowers and embellishments." Still it would be necessary for them to have the flowers.

The sittings of the Academy, which should have been highly profitable, and of great utility, became most tiresome* if we are to judge them by those of the present day. They had debates there on the most trifling and even silly subjects. For instance, Gombauld delivered there a lecture in 1635 Je ne sais quoi.

Furetière has described, in a very piquant manner, the way in which those places were attained, and probably with much truth. According to him, the man who clamoured the loudest was the person selected by his confreres as the most competent. They had the art of making long discourses on nothing, the second repeated like an echo what the first had said, the third usually three or four spoke at a time. When they had an assembly of five or six members, one of them read, another resolved or decided on the matter, two chatted together, the fifth slept, and the last amused himself by reading whatever work he found near him; if a second member wished to advance an opinion, they were obliged to read over again the article forming the subject of discussion, in consequence of not having paid attention to the first reading of it, they were so occupied. It was impossible that they could write ten lines in succession without entering into long digressions, without one of them relating a pleasant story, or the news of the day.

To give a just estimate of the interior of the Academy, we will relate an account of a visit made to the Institution Christina of Sweden, May 11th, 1658. We have it from the memoirs of Valentine Conrart, perpetual secretary.

* La Condamine, at a supper given by him on the day of his reception to the French Academy, made the following impromptu:—

La Condamine est aujourd'hui,
Reçu dans la troupe immortelle:
Il est bien sourd tant mieux pour lui,
Mais non muet, tant pis pour elle.

"M. l'abbé de Bois-Robert had intimated on the morning of this day the intention of Christina of Sweden to honor the company by being present at a meeting which was to be held after dinner; M. le directeur (de la Chambre) thought it necessary to inform the academicians of the visit that they might not be absent. About three hours after noon, Her Majesty arrived at the residence of the Chancellor who received her in his coach with all the academicians in a body around it, and having conducted her to his ante-chamber at the end of the hall of council, where there was a long table covered with green velvet fringed with gold, where the council of finance was held, the Queen of Sweden being placed in an arm chair at the end of this table on the side near the windows—the Chancellor at her left near the fire-place, on a chair farther back but without arms, leaving rather a wide space between her Majesty and him. M. le directeur was at the other side of the table opposite the Chancellor; a little lower down, and much farther from the table, were all the academicians standing. The Chancellor paid the Queen a compliment, merely comprising an excuse that the Academy, not being aware before that morning of the honor her Majesty intended conferring on them by this visit, were not prepared to testify their joy and gratitude for so glorious a favor, at least as becomed the duty of the company, when considering the importance of the honor, but if they had had time they would no doubt have entrusted this commission to some person more capable than he was of executing it; but finding himself empowered, owing to the privilege which kind fortune had bestowed on him of being president of the company on so happy an occasion, he was bound to tell her Majesty that the Academy had never received so high an honor as she had been graciously pleased to confer on them. To which the queen replied, that she thought they would pardon the curiosity of one who desired earnestly to find herself in the company of so many men of worth and genius, for whom she had always entertained the very highest esteem and regard.

"They then made a motion to enquire whether the academicians should be sitting or standing; this appeared to surprise the queen. But the Chancellor having asked the opinion of some persons on this difficulty, they informed him that King Henry III when holding assemblies of men of letters at the wood of Vincennes, where he frequently held them, made the assistants be seated, which was a precedent for all future occasions, and that the queen of Sweden, even when at Rome had been at the Academy of Humorists which was never before standing: it was therefore resolved that the academicians should be seated; accordingly they all took their places on the back chairs but the Chancellor, and all remained uncovered. They apologized to her Majesty that the assembly was more numerous, in consequence of not having had time to apprise all the academicians; that the secretary was absent from indisposition, and M.M. Gombauld and Chapelain along with several others. She asked who was secretary; and being informed that it was M. Conrart, had the kindness to speak of him in the most flattering terms, as she knew him by reputation; she also bestowed great encomiums on the two other gentlemen who were absent. After that, M. le directeur told her that had they been aware of her Majesty's intention to honor them by a visit, they would have prepared a lecture which would have afforded an agreeable entertainment, but owing to the embarrassment in which she had found them, they could only present before her what circumstances would admit of; and that as they had prepared not long since a Treatise on Grief, which they had found in the third volume of Characters of the Passions which was ready to be given in public, he would, if permitted by her Majesty, read it, being a very good subject to portray the grief of the company, not being able to acquit themselves better before so great a queen, and of the privation they would have to undergo at her Majesty's early departure. This lecture being finished to which the queen gave much attention, the Chancellor asked if any one had verses to recite for her Majesty's entertainment on which M. Cotin recited several portions of the poems of Lucretius, which he had translated into French, which seemed to afford the queen great pleasure. M. l'abbé de Bois-Robert recited also several madrigals, which he had composed not long since on the illness of Madame d'Olonne; and M. l'abbé Tallemant, a sonnet on the death of a lady. After that, M. de la Chambre demanded something else. M. Pellisson recited a little ode on love which he had made, an imitation of Catullus, and other verses on a sapphire which he had lost afterwards found, with which her Majesty was also exceedingly pleased; after this they read a portion of the Dictionary full containing an explanation of the word jeu, in order let her know something of the occupation of the Academy at the time.

"It was the intention of the Chancellor to have held the meeting in the chamber of M. de Priézac, as usual, but in consequence of the height of the stairs, and the entrance to it being dark and inconvenient, he thought it would be more suitable to assemble in his own apartment, as being more easy to her Majesty, and more honorable to the Academy.

"When they commenced reading the copy of the Dictionary, the Chancellor said to the queen, on coming to the word play, that he hoped it would not be displeasing to her Majesty, and that doubtless the word Melancholy would be even less agreeable, to which she made no reply.

"Having heard, in the course of this lecture, the following observation, Ce sont des jeux de prince, qui ne plaisent qu'à ceux qui les font, the queen of Sweden reddened, and appeared much moved on hearing it, but seeing that all were observing her, she forced a smile which was evidently more of sorrow than of joy."*

We must confess that the Chancellor was unfortunate in selecting the copy in which a proverb so mal apropos was to be found, and we can easily conceive Christina's embarrassment, who, the year previous, had caused Monaldeschi to be assassinated in one of the galleries of Fontainebleau.

It was only in 1638 that the Academy commenced to occupy themselves seriously with the Dictionary. Vaugelas and Chapelain had each presented a design. They halted at that of the author of La Pucelle and arranged, in the following order, the list of authors from whose works they would take the examples. Thus, for prose, they selected Amyot, Montaigne, du Vair, Desportes, Charron, Bertaud, Marion, de la Guesle, Pibrac, d'Espeisses, Arnaud, le Catholicon d'Espagne, Les Mémoires de la Reine Marguerite, Coeffeteau, Du Perron, F. de Sales évêque de Genève, d'Urfé, de Molières, Malherbe, Duplessis-Mornay d'Ossat, de la Noue, de Dammartin, de Refuge, d'Aubignier, and two academicians, Bardin and du Chastlet, who died recently, becoming, according to M. Villemain, supreme authorities for language, as the Roman Emperors had become gods. Many names have been omitted in this list, amongst others those of Bodin and of Etienne Pasquier.

For poetry, they chose Marot, Saint Gelais, Ronsard, Belloy, du Bartas, Desportes, Bertrand, Cardinal Duperron, Garnier, Regnier, Malherbe, Des Lingendes, Motin, Trouvart, Montfuron, Théophile, Passerat, Rapin and Sainte-Marthe.

Vaugelas having been appointed compiler of the Dictionary, Richelieu assigned to him a pension of 2000 livres; but the work not being performed very quickly, the dilatoriness of the Academy called forth innumerable epigrams, amongst others the following from Bois-Robert :

Depuis six mois sur l'F on travaille,
Et le destin m'aurait fort obligé,
S'il m'avait dit tu vivras jusqu'an G. *

This Dictionary, it must be admitted, was conceived as a bad plan; Furetière, an academician of much genius, undertook the compilation of one on his own responsibility. The enterprise excited the jealousy of the Academy, who obtained its suppression, and in 1685, expelled the author from the corps, though he had been admitted twenty-three years before they did not fill up his place during his life time. Furetière did not withdraw from the contest. He pleaded against the Academy, drew up memorials, composed lampoons in prose and poetry,† which having been collected in the year 1685, filled two vols. in duodecimo. He did not cease to labour at his Dictionary, a most precious work, which was published two years after his death, in 1690,‡ and which the compilers of the Dictionnaire de Trévoux re-printed entire, without once citing the author.

The first edition of the Dictionary of the Academy appeared in 1694. They at once commenced a second edition, which was published in 1718. The third appeared in 1740, the fourth, in 1762; the fifth, in 1813; and the sixth and last in 1835.

The Academy, in this work, conceived the unhappy design of submitting the words to a rigorous classification, by devo-

* Andrieux, member of the Committee on the Dictionary, in 1819, said, "Je mourrai du Dictionnaire."

† The Fureteriana contains The plan and design of an allegorical tragico burlesque entitled, The beds of the Academy, in six cantos. Some have attributed, perhaps without reason, to Furetière or Richelet, "The Apotheosis of the Dictionary of the French Academy, its expulsion from the celestial regions," La Haye, 1696, in 12mo.

one to the sublime style, others to the burlesque style and the familiar, strangely impoverishing the language by proscribing a host of words employed by old authors. Thus, Furetière relates that la Fontaine, who was very constant in attending the sittings, would never permit the adoption of a single word which he had known to be used by Marot or Rabelais. To give an idea of the ridiculous circumspection which presided over the choice of words, it suffices to say that, for what motive we cannot pretend to imagine, they suppressed the conjunction car. It was this strictness which gave rise to a very lively satire by Menage, entitled, Requête des Dictionnaires à Messieurs de l'Académie Française. We give the first verse :—

A nos seigneurs académiques,
Nos seigneurs les hypercritiques,
Souverains arbitres des mots,
Doctes faiseurs d'avant-propos,
Cardinal-historiograpbes,
Surintendants des orthographes,
Raffineurs de locutions,
Entrepreneurs de versions,
Faveurs de brèves et de longues,
De voyelles et de dipthongues ;
Supplie humblement calepin,
Avec Nicot, Estienne, Oudin :

Disant que, depuis trente années,
On a, par diverses menées
Banni de Romans, des poulets,
Des lettres douces, des billet
Des Madrigaux, des élégies,
Des sonnets et des comédies,
Ces nobles mots, moult, ains, jaçott,
Ores, adonc, maint, ains soit,
A-tant, si-que, piteux, icelle,
Trop-plus, trop-mieux, blandice, isnelle,
Piéça, tollir, illec ainçois,
Comme étant de mauvais françois.

The Academy, instead of employing so much rigor in arranging the admission of certain words, should have exhibited a little more research as to the meaning or definition of words ; the following is an example which we have taken from the last edition :

ECLIPSE. The visible disappearance of a star, caused by the interposition of another celestial body between this star and the beholder.

"During three thousand years," says M. Arago, "eclipses of the moon have been apparent without any celestial body interposing between the moon and the observer."

Tirer de but en Blanc. To draw a straight line without the projectile travelling over a curved line, or making a rebound.

"After this definition," says M. Arago, once more, "the Academy has found the means of preventing a bullet ever falling to the ground.

Vaisselle Plate. That, where there has been no soldering. This definition is absurd, notwithstanding the corrective which is joined to it : that, does not inform us whether the plate is gold or silver. The Academy would have us to suppose that the word plate in this instance was derived from the Spanish plata, silver.*

A dictionary filled with such errors, and we cannot say many volumes of compliments and discourses which have been read by any one—in this summary we have all that the French Academy has produced during the two centuries it has been established. This state of things has at many times been evident to the men of genius. Fenelon, in his Memoir on the Occupations of the French Academy,† had lesslesly issued the wisest opinions on the works to which the Academy should have devoted themselves, and the manner in which they should have arranged the Dictionary, searching curately through all the good authors. Being aware of the necessity of a preliminary reform, he writes, "I told them above all things they should seek to establish in the Academy a strict discipline which they would find particularly necessary, which had never perhaps been introduced into the establishment; without this fundamental principle, all their fine projects and their most powerful resolutions were but as fumes and smoke, and would have no other effect than to draw on the public raillery.

"It was necessary, therefore, to remedy this evil which would cause the inevitable ruin of the Academy; but to ensure success, and to be enabled, in making our laws, to preserve that independence and liberty which had given for us the glorious patronage by which we were honored, he advised that the Academy should begin by sending a petition to the king, requesting permission from his majesty to effect a reformation in their body, by abrogating the an-

* If the Academy permitted such blunders to be published, we can easily imagine what numbers could be found in the subjects which have been proposed, but which it had not been considered expedient to put forward. The following anecdote may be relied on as very probable; nevertheless it may not be true. They say that an academicien suggested the following definition of the word crab: a little red fish which walks backward; he had already carried away the greater portion of the assembly, when one of his confreres rose and said, "Sir, your definition is very good, only I request permission to offer a few trifling objections on the matter: first—the animal in question is not a fish; second—it is not red till it is boiled; and thirdly—it does not walk backward." The Academy had then the good sense, which it did not at all possess, to re-place the proposed definition by that which figures at present in the dictionary.

statutes, and forming new ones according to the mode they would deem advisable; that they should also demand permission to name for this work a certain number of delegates, as many as they would think necessary to propose, and that they should request his majesty to honor them by pointing out one or two of those whom he might consider most worthy to fill the office."

"What service," said Voltaire, "would not the French Academy have rendered to literature, to language, and to the nation, if, instead of publishing annual compliments, they had printed the good works of the age of Louis XIV., refined from all the mistakes of language which had crept into them? Those which they could not correct being at least specified. Europe, who read those authors, would have thus learned our language securely. Its purity would have been solidly established. Thus good French books, printed with care at the king's expense, would have been glorious monuments of the nation. I have been told that M. Despréaux had heretofore made this proposition, and that it had been renewed by a man in whose mind wisdom and sound criticism were combined; but this idea met the same fate as other useful projects, it was approved of only to be neglected."*

In consequence of these abuses in the organization, and the little value of its works, the Academy had become, as we have already remarked, an object of raillery to the public.† Twenty years after its foundation, in 1654, there appeared a brochure in duodecimo, by Sorel: De l'Académie Française établie pour la correction, et l'embellissement du langage, et si elle est de quelque utilité au public, 1654. The author there pronounces for the negative.

† The public did not permit any opportunity to pass by. Thus, in 1773, the Count d'Angiviller, director general of the king's buildings, having sown some grass in the court of the Louvre, the mansion where Louis XIV had established the Academy, there appeared immediately the following epigram:

Des favoris de la muse française
D'Angiviller tient le sort assuré,
Devant leur porte il a fait mettre un pré
Où désormais ils pourront pâtre à l'aïe.

tion de la Langue Française.* This piece after having a long run in manuscript, was not printed till the year 1650, it was the first production of Saint Evremond. "Though without skill or without rule," said Pellison in his Histoire de l'Académie, "and more deserving of the name of farce than comedy, it is not devoid of genius, and possesses some very pleasing passages." This was not the opinion of Voltaire, who discovered in it but simple dialogue without plot or humor.

Margon published, in 1724, in quarto, under the title Première Séance des États Calotins, a parody on the rules of the Academy.

The illustrious Society yielded, at the end of the last century, to the fate of all the institutions of the old monarchy. The convention, by a law of the 8th of August, 1793, pronounced the suppression of all the Academies and literary societies patented or endowed by the nation; but they were not slow in re-organizing it on a much more extensive scale, and placing it by a National Institution of science and of arts, destined: "First, to cultivate the Arts and Sciences by uninterrupted investigation, by the publication of discoveries by correspondence with other learned societies. Second, to carry out conformably to the laws and resolutions of the executive Directory, the scientific and literary works, which had for their object general utility, and the glory of the public." The French Academy, under the Republic and Empire, formed the second-class of the Institute, and did not renew its ancient name till 1816.

We will conclude our narration of the French Academy by an explanation of the term fauteuil. The following is the origin of the word, as it has been reported in the Pièces intéressantes pour servir à l'Histoire de la Littérature, of Laplace.

"Cardinal d'Estrées, becoming very infirm, and desiring to obtain some ease during the performance of his duties to the Academy, asked permission to bring a seat more comfortable than those then in use; for they had only one arm chair

* Formerly the title of Academy was bestowed most prodigally in France; for several years they gave it to houses which they first called gaming houses. They designated them Academies of play: they called the young men who learned fencing and equestrianism, in the schools devoted to those arts, Academistes, and not Academicians.

the director. They appealed to Louis XIV, who, foreseeing the consequences of such a distinction, ordered the comptroller of the household to have forty arm chairs brought to the Academy, and thus confirmed Academic equality."

These arm chairs, which Fontenelle called "Couches of repose where men of genius slept," were the object of several epigrams. One of the best is this of Piron:—

En France on fait, par un plaisant moyen
Faire un auteur quand d'écrits il assomme ;
Dans un fauteuil d'académicien,
Lui quarantième, on fait assoir notre homme :
Lors il s'endort et ne fait plus qu'un somme ;
Plus n'en avez prose ni Madrigal.
Au bel-esprit le fauteuil est, en somme,
Ce qu'a l'amour est le lit conjugal.

To the list of academicians, it would be curious to contrast those men of talent who had not been admitted to the Academy; we will limit ourselves to the mention of a few. Molière figures in the first rank; then comes the Duke de la Rochefoucauld, author of the Livre des Maximes; Regnard, Lesage, Piron, who by his biting and satirical epigrams, made the Academy deeply atone for his non-admission to its bosom; the two Rousseaus, Saint-Réal, Ginguené, Dusault, and finally the illustrious poet, Béranger, who certainly could never have become the confrère of M. Pasquier. The most singular part of the matter was, that the Academy seemed to have totally forgotten the design of its institution, and forbore to admit the best lexicographers and grammarians of each period, as Ménage, Dumarsais, Boinvilliers, and others.

Colbert, being a member of the French Academy, employed some of his confrères in composing devices and inscriptions for public buildings. This small assembly, amongst whom were subsequently Boileau and Racine, were not tardy in forming a separate Academy, and the year 1663 may be considered the year in which the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres was founded. In 1701, this company, composed of nine persons, were about to limit the records to medals of Louis XIV. and then to dissolve, when their president, the Abbé Bignon, obtained letters patent by which it was reorganized on a totally new plan, and introduced there a clique that had never known the French Academy "Let us imagine," said Voltaire, "honorary places which required no abilities, and were without remuneration, places for pensioners who desired work disagreeably contrasted to those of the honoraries, places for fellows without pension, and places for pupils a title most unacceptable and since suppressed."

This new Academy had apartments at the Louvre, but it was only in 1712 that letters patent were given confirming its establishment. It received under the Regency by decree of the Council of State, the title of Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, which they hold to the present day, but they formed under the empire, the class of History, and of Ancient Literature.

The history of this Academy differs very little from that of the French Academy. We encounter there the same flatteries, and the same cringing to power. Among the list of its members we find innumerable personages who had not the slightest pretensions to learning, and we are astonished at not beholding the names of men well worthy of admission from their patent and acknowledged abilities.

The Academy of Inscriptions, per se, was not equally deserving of censure. They compiled, amongst other things, a collection of memoirs which acquired for them a just and well-merited celebrity; this recueil contained the historians of France, the record of French literature, the publication of notices and extracts of manuscripts of works in the different languages of the East, with other valuable matter.

The public, at all times so happy to find defects in learned men, could, however, enjoy this pleasure at the expense of the Academy of inscriptions who, unfortunately for themselves, committed more than one mistake. "You know," wrote Voltaire to M. de Formont, "a-propos of the scientific expedition which had for its object the measurement of an ark of the meridian. Are you aware that the Academy of Belles-Lettres has undertaken to make a beautiful inscription for our argonauts? All the Academy, after mature deliberation, came to the conclusion that these gentlemen measured an ark of the meridian under an ark of the equator. You will remark that the meridian go from north to south, and, consequently that the Academy of Belles-Lettres had, in a body, made the most egregious blunder in the world."

When peace was concluded with England, in 1783, the minister, Maurepas, demanded from the Academy of Inscription a device for the medal destined to celebrate this important event. The Academy, after having passed six months in laborious research, sent a deputation to the Minister bringing this inscription of rare simplicity, but which they had not had, as M. de Jourdain expressed in his note to the beautiful Marchioness, the good fortune to discover at once—" Pax cum Anglis"—" Et cum spiritu tuo," replied Maurepas.

The Academy of Science, founded, in 1666, by Colbert, formed, in 1795, the first class of the National Institute, and re-took its ancient title in 1816.

The Academy of Sculpture and Painting, founded by Mazarin, in 1648, established in 1655, formed in 1795, by its reunion with the Academy of Architecture, the fourth class of the Institute, and took, in 1816, the title of the Academy of Fine Arts.

The Academy of Architecture, founded, in 1671, by Colbert, was suppressed in 1767, for having courageously protested against the illegal nomination of M. de Wailly. It was not slow in re-establishing itself. However, it was again suppressed in 1793, and was comprised, in the organisation of the Institute, in the fourth class, that of the Fine Arts.

The most modern of all these Academies created in 1795, under the name of the class of Moral and Political Sciences, was suppressed in 1803, and its members were distributed among the different classes of which the Institute was then composed. It was re-established in 1832, but the section on Geography continued to make a part of the Academy of Science, to which the decree of 1803 had transferred it.

Long before the foundation of the French Academy, some experiments of this kind had been made in France. Thus there had been established at Lyons, towards the end of the fifteenth century, an Academy known under the title of the Académie de Fourvière, because they held their sittings in a house in a quarter of that name. At Annecy the president, Favre, had in 1606, established by the aid of Francis de Sales, and under the protection of the duke de Nemours, an Académie Florimontane, which had taken for its device, Flores Fructusque Pereuntes. It applied itself to theology, philosophy, mathematics, the fine arts, and was a species Athenæum. The Académie Florimontane was soon as flourishing as any other of the Italian Academies, but it did not continue long, and, towards 1618, its members ceased to meet.

The greater number of the large towns in France have present scientific and literary Academies, whose foundations trace back to very different and remote periods. The most celebrated are those of Amiens, Besançon, Bordeaux, Clermont, Dijon, Lyons, Marseilles, Nancy, Nîmes, Rouen, Toulouse, &c. This latter city contained two; one l'Académie des Lanterniers and the other l'Académie des Jeux Floraux, of which we shall in a future paper, give some details.

"There were in times gone by," states a writer of the middle age, "in the royal and noble city of Toulouse, seven persons of worth and knowledge, shrewd and cautious, who had a great fancy and an ardent desire to discover this noble, excellent, virtuous, and most wonderful lady, Science, in order that she might bestow on them the joyous gift of poetry. They desired also the power of good composition in inditing romances, in order to propagate sound doctrines and useful instructions, in honor and praise of God, our Saviour, of his glorious Mother, and of all the saints of paradise. Their aim being also to destroy ignorance and error, to make the study of the poets innocuous and without art, finally to live in joy and gladness, and to fly from melancholy and ennui, those mortal enemies to cheerful knowledge."

These seven personages called themselves Bernard Panassac; Guillaume de Lobra, citizen; Béranger de Saint Plancat; Pierre de Meranaserra, citizen; Guillaume Gontaut; Pierre Canon, merchant; and Bernard Ot Notary of the court of Viguiier de Toulouse. They formed amongst them a little literary coterie, and assembled generally on Sunday, in a garden belonging to one of the faubourgs of Toulouse. "No possible benefit could be derived," said M. Guessard, "either to science or literature, by those reunions without forming an Academy or something analogous. It is not reasonable to suppose that an assembly of this kind, once established, would not require to be placed under authority capable of pronouncing judgments, dictating laws, distributing prizes, and framing some code or treaty to which they should be held amenable. It was to this particularly that the very gay company of the Seven Troubadours of Toulouse devoted themselves."

They commenced to establish themselves, and showed forth in 1323, their first public act being to announce a poetical competition for the following year. At this period the noble age of Provençal poetry had passed away ; nothing remained but remembrance and regrets for its departed glory. Our seven Toulousains, who knew and admired the ancient troubadours, and who felt with pain the decline of southern civilisation and literature, formed the project of re-kindling this almost extinguished fire, and with this idea, made an appeal to all the poets of Languedoc to unite with those of Toulouse, and open between them a competition. What means for such an end ! These academicians extemporised in evident ignorance and did not discover until too late that it is not in the power of an Academy to resuscitate that which is dead, and that the awarding of poetical prizes never yet made a poet.

Be that as it may, they addressed, the Thursday after All Saints Day, in the year of our Lord 1323, a circular in verse which they sent into all parts of Languedoc, by which they invited to a competition those of the troubadours who were best qualified to offer themselves. We translate some fragments of this letter :—

“ The very gay company of the Seven Poets of Toulouse, to the honorable lords, friends, and companions, who possess the talent or knowledge from whence springs joy, pleasure, good sense, merit and politeness, health and happy life. Our most ardent desires are that you should solace us by the recital of poetic carols.....Seeing that you have a portion of that knowledge by which you are masters of the art of the gay science, come that we may behold your talents.....We seven who have succeeded the corps of poets now passed away, have at our command a fine and beautiful garden, to which we repair every Sunday, read the new works, mutually communicate our knowledge, and correct our faults. To accelerate the progress of science, we proclaim that, the first of next May, we will assemble in this charming orchard. Nothing can exceed our joy if you will be present also. Those who entrust us with their works will be honorably taken care of, and the author of the best poem will receive, as a token of merit, a golden violet at the conclusion.

things rationally. We request and implore of you to co on the appointed day, so that in contributing harmoni verses, the age may become more gay. These letters h been issued from the faubourg des Augustines, in our orch at the foot of a laurel, the Thursday after the feast of Saints, the year of our Lord 1323.

The day of competition was fixed for the first of May, 13 A great number of poets responded to the appeal, and w received with much pomp by the seven troubadours in prese of an immense concourse of people, and of the sheriffs capitouls, who decided that thenceforward the Golden Vi should be provided at the expense of the city.

The next day the seven judges met in secret conclave examine the compositions of the competitors, and, the follow day, the festival of the Holy-Cross, their decision was made p lic, and they accorded The honor of the Violet to Arn Vidal de Castelnaudary.

The following year a Chancellor was placed at the head the College de la Gaie Science, of which the seven first memb received the name of Mainteneurs. Instantly the competit became so numerous, that they were obliged to institute t other prizes, the Eglantine, and the Silver Marigold. Th often added a little silver Carnation in order to encoura young poets.

According to the statutes, the first prize, that of the viol was given by right to the baccalauréat. The competitor w bore away the prize of three flowers, received the title of doct or master, and thus acquired the privilege of voting in t college. The degrees of bachelor and of doctor were conferr by letters written in verse. It was also in verse that the honors were demanded by the aspirants. The formula of these diplomas, of the demands, the replies and the installations, have been preserved in one of the registers of the Académie des Jeux Floraux. "I leave you to imagine," said M. Guessard, "if all these buffooneries were calculated to revive the glorious days of Romantic poetry." Translated in French, we have some verses in the following style :—

Under Charles the Sixth, the Faubourg des Augustines, where the palace and garden of the seven mainteneurs were situated, was destroyed, they then withdrew to the capital, where they re-assembled annually the three first days of May. This fête, which they called the Fête de Fleurs, having been suppressed in 1484, the institution was on the point of perishing, when a woman, of whose existence some authors appear to doubt, Clémence Isaure re-established the meetings, distributed, herself, and at her own expense, flowers, no more in silver as formerly, but gilt and placed on a pedestal of the same metal with the city coat of arms! Thanks to her gift, these fêtes which were still called by the name of Jeux Floraux, continued after her death.

In the mean time, owing to the grave abuses which had been introduced into the celebrations, the greater part of Clémence Isaure's legacy was frittered away in festivities. A member of the French Academy, La Loubère, visiting Toulouse, his native city, in 1693, was so scandalized by the orgies which had replaced the Fête des Fleurs, that he addressed to Louis XIV. a petition requesting him to put an end to these disorders. The King at once by letters patent, given at Fontainebleau in the month of September, 1694, and registered in the parliament of Toulouse, the 8th of January, 1695, raised the Jeux Floraux into an Academy.

They then distributed four prizes instead of three, "which according to the letters patent should be flowers, an Amaranth of Gold constituted the first prize; a Violet, an Eglantine and a Silver Marigold, were the ordinary prizes."

Les Jeux Floraux were suppressed in 1790, and re-established by Napoleon in 1806, they continue up to the present. The Academy published, every year without intermission, save in 1700, 1703, 1790 and 1806, the piece crowned since 1696.

Other countries, besides France, have had numerous Academies, one of the most celebrated of those established in Italy was that of the Arcades, founded at Rome in 1690 by several men of letters, amongst others by Crescimbeni and Zappi. The Government of this Academy was altogether democratic. The members adopted the names of the shepherds of antiquity. Crescimbeni took the name Alphesiboeus, and Zappi, that of Leucasio.

Crescimbeni was the first chief or custode of this assembly which he named Arcadia, and thus its members were called Arcadians or Arcades. They assembled at first in the gardens of the Convent of Saint Pierre, but their number being considerably increased, they fixed themselves afterwards in the gardens of the Farnèse Palace. In 1725, King John V. gave the Academy sufficient funds to purchase ground where they might for the future hold their meetings. The Academy fixed itself definitively on Mount Janiculum, where they held their first reunions. One of the members being an architect, he built there an edifice for general assemblies, in the form of an amphitheatre.

The arms of the Academy were composed of the arms of Crescimbeni and of the pastoral flute or the flute of Pan.

The Arcadia soon subdivided itself into as many colonies as there are towns in Italy. Its aim being in the beginning to disentangle Italian literature from the extravagance and bad taste which during that period were disgracing it, but unfortunately the members should have commenced by reforming themselves; they gave way to all the excesses which they undertook to restrain, and by that means served to perpetuate the taste for frivolity.

These Academies, like the French, exposed themselves on more than one occasion to public raillery. Thus in the eighteenth century an Italian scholar, the abbé Ferdinand Galiani, having had to complain of a Neapolitan Academy which had the habit of publishing a recueil of panegyrics in prose and verse on the death of any great Neapolitan, profited by an occasion which presented itself of being revenged, the death of a hangman.

being the important event. With the assistance of one of his friends he composed a recueil of very serious pieces on the death of this man, and, in every part he imitated so truthfully the style of each academician, that one of the body acknowledged he would be deceived, if he had not been perfectly certain he had not written the lines signed with his name. The volume appeared in 1749, under the title of Componimenti varj per la morte di Dominico Jannacone, carnefice della gran corte della vicaria, raccolti e dati in luce da Gian. Anton. Sergio avvocato napoletano.

This Sergio was president of the Academy. The jest caused a tumult and a scandal which the authors had not foreseen. After having kept it for some time anonymous, they decided on acknowledging the fact to the minister of Charles III., Tanucci, and, on explaining to him the cause, they found that he was not only well disposed towards them, but that the king and queen had both read the recueil, and were much amused by it. The young authors were then pardoned by performing some spiritual exercises, to which they submitted for eight days.

It was attempted on one occasion, in England, to establish an Academy analogous to the French Academy, but without success.

"In the latter years of the reign of Queen Anne," said Voltaire, "Doctor Swift formed the design of establishing in the Royal Society of London, founded in 1660, an Academy for language, in imitation of the French Academy. The Earl of Oxford and Bolingbroke countenanced this project. The members who were to compose this Academy were all men of note: they were Swift, Prior, Pope, Congreve, &c.; but the queen dying suddenly the whigs took it into their heads to rail at the protectors of the Academy, which gave a mortal blow to belles-lettres."

We could not, perhaps, after all that has preceded, determine this question which so many have tried to solve:—In what were the Academies useful? They did not fail in men of genius, who esteemed study and science for their own intrinsic merits, and not for the honors or benefits they might derive from them. How is it that we see, in effect, intrigues of all kinds, the jealousies and hatreds which divided all the Academies into coteries ever ready to slander each other? These scandalous proceedings, and shameful transactions which, for the greater part of the time, accompanied the elections, the distribution of prizes, the quarrels where the interests of science altogether appeared before the question of persons, inspiring every honest man with profound disgust? And, as for their utility, we will take the opinion of Voltaire, who wrote:—

“I remark that the Academies uniformly suppress the efforts of genius, instead of exciting them. We have not had a great painter since we had the Academy of Painting, nor a great philosopher formed by the Academy of Science. I say not of French. The reason of this sterility in ground so cultivated is, as appears to me, that each academician, regarding his confrères, finds them very small, which in truth they are, thinks himself comparatively great, thus, flattered by his own self love, rests content with mediocrity. Danjou found himself superior to Mallet, and that was sufficient for him; he considered himself at the height of perfection. Le petit Coypel found he was worth more than de Troyes, younger, and was thought to be a Raphael. Homer or Virgil were not, I believe, of the Academy, neither was Cicero or Virgil.”

Thus far we have written of Academies, we now descend to Literary and Burlesque Societies and Orders.

The most ancient literary society we know of in the world, was the society called the Sixty, which existed in the fourth century before Christ, and of which Athenæus alone has transmitted us any intelligence. “They had at Athens,” writes he, “some citizens who had the talent of drollery, mustered to the number of sixty, in the temple of Hercules, and were called in the city the Sixty, and any one coming from their meetings, said, ‘I come from the Sixty.’ Their reputation for wit was such, that Philip of Macedon, having heard it spoken of, sent them a talent, in order that they might write some of their pleasantry for him.”

Under the emperors, the poets of Rome had formed among themselves a species of Academy who met in a particular place called Schola Poetarum. Martial, in his epigrams, alludes to them on several occasions. Lipsius asserts that they read reciprocally from their works, and that they met annually at a repast, to strengthen the ties by which they were united.

But these readings made to their companions were not, as we may easily conceive, those which best pleased the authors.

they preferred recitations made in public, which usually preceded the publication of works among the Romans. We will now enter into some details on the subject.

In early times authors were in the habit of reading, or having their works read for them during meals, either at their own houses, or at the house of a mutual friend; a rich man never failed in his auditory. The public recitations commenced at Rome, under Augustus; the custom soon became very general. The author who had not a convenient habitation, found at all times some Mæcenas disposed to lend him his house. Others preferred reciting them altogether in public under the porticoes, in the theatres, in the temples, in the gardens, at the Forum, in the baths. "I had hardly trimmed my beard more than once or twice," declares Ovid, in his Tristia, "before I had read to the people the poems of my youth."

The authors who were about to deliver public lectures, sent their friends special letters of invitation (codicilli,) strangers were admitted by announcements (libelli,) which were caused to be distributed in the city, or by placards posted on the columns of the porticos. The crowd never failed to rush to the readings delivered by a fashionable author. The relatives and friends of an author were considered bound to assist at the readings. Pliny, the younger, reckoned, amongst the virtues of his wife, the love she entertained for her husband's works. "If I happen," said he, "to read some piece in public she manages to secure a place behind a curtain, where she eagerly listens to the praises bestowed on me." The readings were often disturbed by incidents which, whilst they amused the audience, were a great annoyance to the author.

"There occurred," wrote Pliny to a friend, "a very amusing incident. A Roman Knight of great consideration, and very proud, composed some elegiac verses; he read in public a work which commenced with these words: Priscus, you ordain. .....At that, Priscus, an intimate friend of him who read, and who was present, thought himself called on to reply; Oh! I ordain nothing. You may imagine the bursts of laughter and merriment that followed. Moreover, the knight had not a very sound mind." A similar mischance happened to the emperor Claudius, for many of the emperors mingled in the public recitations. "Claudius in his youth," writes

Suetonius, "undertook, in accordance with the advice Livy, and assisted by Sulpicius Flavus, to write a history, and having commenced reading a portion of it, before a numerous auditory, he had, through his own fault, much trouble in finishing it. For, at the beginning of the lecture the obesity of one of his auditors having broken several steps of the seat under him, a general laugh was raised, and the tumult having ceased, Claudius himself, at the recollection of this disaster, could not resist bursting into fits of laughter at intervals."

A witty French writer has sketched a piquant tableau of the public recitations. "Rome," writes he, "was full of personages who spared no cost to bring themselves before the public. A house was hired at great expense, with seats and benches, or a hall in an amphitheatre: auditors were to be solicited, announcements to be distributed, and in fine, they bore to be exhausted with annoyance and expense of every kind; such were the conditions to which they submitted for a momentary triumph. We cannot read, without a lively sentiment of interest and curiosity, the satirical poets of that period, shewing the pretensions of the authors, and their affectations in public, and the precautions taken beforehand to ensure success.

Rome was not better under Augustus; some say that Martial, Persius, and Juvenal, had foreseen our vanities of the salon, and our intrigues of the coulisses. Let us enter the Roman Athenæum, a vast amphitheatre, the seats ascending to the roof. Before a numerous audience is seated the reciter on an elevated chair; his hair is dressed with much care, he is clothed in a new white robe; on his left hand glitters a precious stone; his neck is encircled by a cravat of wool or fur, shewing, as Martial has said, that it was as difficult for him to speak as to be silent. To sustain the clearness of his voice he rinses his mouth or throat with an emollient. He draws at length from his breast an enormous volume, and commences to recite at the tip of his tongue, with languishing eyes, drooping head, an effeminate voice, and a manner full of affectation. In most of the auditories, those who exhibited the most lively enthusiasm were those who heard least. Their eyes, instead of being on the lecturer, were fixed on the audience, from whom they took their tone. These were the mesochoros, or chief applauders: a gesture of the hand com-and the bravos or slaves, the enfranchised or the unfree who, for a dinner, or a new robe, were, before-hand engaged to applaud, and were distributed in all the seats of the amphitheatre.

there was a more piquant manner of ensuring a brilliant success. An ignorant financier, who set up for learning, wished suddenly to recite his work in public, and above all, to create a great sensation in his auditory. When he lent himself he of course stipulated for a fair interest in the circumstance, but always added another condition, namely, the borrower should, as a sine qua non, come to his reading to listen and applaud; if he failed in this, he prosecuted for a breach of the most essential clause in his contract.

The literary reunions were held principally at the tables of the Romans, and Aulus-Gellius relates, in several passages of his Attica, the manner of those who prided themselves on the cultivation of letters during their repasts. "We celebrate," said he, "the saturnalia at Athens with gaiety and festivity, I do not say to repose our mind, for, according to the ancients, the tranquillizing of the mind is the abnegation of it, but we give to it a pleasing diversion by amusements as long as they are agreeable. The same table reunites a certain number of Romans, who have come to Greece to hear the lessons, and follow the same masters. He who gives the repast, in turn, places on the table a Greek or Latin book, chooses one of the old authors, and a crown of laurel, to be given to the victor; he arranges as many questions as there are guests, distributes, by chance, their places and questions to each. The matter being decided, the book and wreath are presented to the victor. If not solved, it is passed all round to the next guests. And if no one can unravel the point, the prize is dedicated to the god whose fête they are that day commemorating. The questions submitted for discussion were sometimes the conceptions of an old poet, quite unintelligible, and clothed in mystical obscurity; on a point of ancient history, a philosophical opinion oddly expressed, on a sophistical subtlety to be determined, on the elucidation of a rare or ambiguous word, and even on the peculiarity of a well-known word."

The practice of these reunions was continued until the fall of the Roman Empire.

Charlemagne, whose admiration of antiquity, sacred and profane, manifested itself in all points, had formed round a reunion of illustrious savants, to whom they gave among themselves the titles of Greeks and Latins: Alcuin called himself Albinus Flaccus; Théodulfe, Pindar; Riculf, Archbishop of Mayence, one of the personages in the Eclésiastes of Virgil; Adalhard, abbé de Corbie, had adopted the name of Augustin (Saint Augustin); Anghilbert, duke of Marais in France, that of Homer; Eginhard, Callimachus the prince of the poets; Gisèle and Gondrade had become Lucretia and Euleus, while Charlemagne himself was king David. The name selected by the French monarch marked his evident preference for sacred literature. He said frequently to Riculf, a passionate admirer of Virgil, that he would infinitely prefer to possess the mind or spirit of the four Evangelists, than to have written a dozen books like the Æneid.

In the middle age, numberless poetical societies were established in different parts of France, which, extending to all the provinces, bore the name of Cours d'Amour, de Puy, de Jeux sous l'Orme, de Cours de Rhétorique, &c. These societies met generally once a year, and crowned the best compositions in verse presented to them. The most celebrated assemblies were those of Caen, Dieppe, Rouen, Beauvais, Amiens, Arras, and Valenciennes.

The Assembly of Caen called itself the Puy de la Conception, because they held on the eighth of December, the feast of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, in an assembly, at which all the pieces composed were dedicated to her honor. This dated back to the eleventh century.

The society of Puy, at Amiens, had its origin only in the fourteenth century. They formed a species of Academy regularly organised, which twice a year distributed prizes to the best ballad composed in honor of the Blessed Virgin to a popular air. The duchess d'Angoulême, mother of Francis the First, passing through this city in 1517, copied a collection of the crowned pieces. This copy is preserved in the King's library.

To decide the question of Love which the poets proposed in their jeux partis and their sençons, there was established a species of tribunal which took the name of the Cour d'Amour. The judges were chosen from amongst gentlemen, ladies of quality, and poets, all persons whom knowledge of the world and long experience rendered au fait in such matters. The women so authority to these tribunals, where all the honors were to themselves, consequently they increased rapidly, particularly in the southern provinces, where nothing but songs were sung, and where these serious contests were of course very honorable. The romances of Pierrefeu, amongst others, were celebrated.

The Cours d'Amour rapidly extended their jurisdiction. They revealed all the stratagems of lovers, and everything concerning gallantry. They summoned the guilty to appear, imposed on them a proportionable penalty, commanded a solution, and prescribed the form of reconciliation; and their sentences were called arrêt d'amour, and for a long time formed a code of laws in France, revered by all, and against which no one dared to appeal. Princes and sovereigns, (John, king of Arragon, and Richard Cœur-de-Lion) did not fail to preside at them, and the famous Emperor, Frederic barossa, established one in his State, in imitation of those in France.

The sojourn of the popes at Avignon rendered Les Cours d'Amour flourishing in the south of France. In the latter part of the fourteenth century, the counts de Vintimille and de Grasse, having come to visit Innocent VI., found the pope presiding at the Cour d'Amour, a spectacle which excited them much astonishment.

One of the most celebrated of the Cours d'Amour was that which existed at the court of Charles VI., and on which a manuscript (No. 626) at the King's Library* contains some curious details.

The women held no places in this court, of which the King was sovereign, and members of which were divided into several classes. The first were those of Measures, a very vague title, which they only gave to knights or to princes of the blood.

The second class were those of grands veneurs de la cour.

The third, those of trésoriers des chartres et registres.

The fourth, those of auditeurs.

The fifth, those of chevaliers d'honneur conseillers de leur amouruse.

The sixth, those of chevaliers trésoriers.

The seventh, those of maîtres des requêtes.

The eighth, those of trois présidents de l'ordre.

The ninth, those of secrétaires.

The tenth, those of concoierges des jardins et vergers amoureux.

---

* Now the Imperial, but we like the old word.

The eleventh and last, those of veneurs.

Another Cour d'Amour, founded on humility and fidelity and instituted in honor of ladies, was established in 1400 at Paris, in the hotel d'Artois, on Saint Valentine's day. It was composed, first, of a chief called prince of the Cours d'Amour secondly, of three noble protectors, who were then elected namely, Charles VI, Philip, duke of Burgundy, and Louis, duke of Bourbon; thirdly, of several protectors; fourthly, of twenty four ministers of the Court, knights, squires and others, conversant with rhetoric and poetry. They had the charge of presenting, to the assemblies of the Court, ballads and other pieces of poetry; fifthly, several treasurers of the charters, secretaries, door-keepers, tipstaffs, &c. &c.

At the period of the revival of literature in France, literary re-unions became very numerous.

It was at one of those reunions that Ronsard, Baïf, Belleau, du Bellay, Dorat, Denisot, and their friends, fifty in number, fêted in a singular manner, their friend, Etienne Jodelle, whom they considered as one of the originators of the theatre in France. In the middle of the banquet with which they were entertaining him at Arcueil, during the carnival of 1552, reviving an ancient custom, they brought to Jodelle a goat crowned with flowers, the beard painted, around which they danced and sung in chorus, dithyrambs of their own composition.

Ronsard apprised his friend that he came to offer him the reward of his tragic poem, and sacrifice in his honor this goat to Bacchus. We do not know if the victim was really immolated, but the enemies of Jodelle and of Ronsard, made a crime of this amusement of the carnival, and brought against them the accusation of idolatry and atheism. To exculpate himself Ronsard composed a poem in which he related all that occurred at Arcueil.

In the seventeenth century, the literary re-unions became very brilliant, and exercised a vast influence over literature. The most celebrated were held at the hôtel de Rambouillet, at the residence of Mademoiselle de Scudéri, and at that of Ninon.

L'hôtel de Rambouillet belonged to the family of Pisani, whose name it bore. In 1600, it took that of Rambouillet, when the daughter of the marquis of Pisani having espoused at twelve years of age, the marquis Charles d'Angennes de Rambouillet, went to reside there. The marchioness withdrew from court in good time, and, at the age of twenty, would go more to the assemblies at the Louvre; "Very strange circumstance," said Tallement des Réaux, "for a young and beautiful woman, who was of high lineage. It was not that she disliked amusement, but the pleasures of the Louvre were particularly distasteful to her."

The same writer has left us some details equally curious on the interior organisation of the hotel:

"Madame de Rambouillet," said he, "is a person clever in things. She was herself the architect of her hotel. Dissatisfied with all the designs they made, (it was during the reign of Marshal d'Ancre, for, at that period, they only knew how to make a parlor on one side, a bedchamber at the other, and a stairs in the centre) one evening after indulging in a reverie, she cried out, 'Quick, some paper! I have discovered the means of constructing it as I desire.' And at once drew up a design—They followed it to the letter; it was from her they acquired the knowledge of placing the stairs at the side, in order that they might have grand suites of apartments, to raise the ceiling, and make the doors and windows lofty and spacious, and place them opposite each other; she was the first who advised the painting of a room any color that they pleased, as heretofore the only colors were red and tan, and it was she who gave to her grand chamber the designation of the Blue Chamber."

The hôtel de Rambouillet was not slow in becoming the rendezvous of all that was gallant at court and most polished amongst the beaux esprits of the age.

The first writers who frequented it were Ogier de Gombauld, Malherbe, Vaugelas, Racan. Then came Voiture, Balzac, Boisgrais, Chapelain, Costar, Sarrazin, Conrart, Mairet, Patru, Molière, Rotrou, Scarron, Benserade, Saint-Evremond, Charval, Ménage, le duc de la Rochefoucauld, le marquis de la Roche, afterwards duc de la Montausier, Malleville, Desmarets, Mautru, Collin, Colletet, Georges de Scudéry, Corneille, Leclercq, the Prince de Condé, and even Bossuet, who delivered his sermon there at sixteen years of age.

Among the women, we remark Madame de Longueville, Mademoiselle de Scudéry, Madame de la Suze, Mademoiselle de Launay, Mademoiselle Julie d'Angennes, daughter of the Marquise de Rambouillet, Madame de Lafayette, Madame de Sévigné, and others.

The hôtel de Rambouillet exercised a very happy influence in bringing to their level the writings of great noblemen, and teaching them the proper manner of acting in the great world. Tallement relates that M. de Chaudebonne having met a Voiture in a house, said to him : " Sir, you are too clever a man to live amongst the bourgeois ; it is necessary I should draw you forth from it." He consequently mentioned him to Madame de Rambouillet, and introduced him to her residence some time after.

Thanks to the amiability, goodness and wit of Madame de Rambouillet, the splendor of her re-unions continued undiminished during very nearly half a century. It is true that the mistress of the house contrived in every way to procure something agreeable to surprise her friends. On one occasion she had added to her hotel a large closet, with three great windows, having different aspects, which overlooked the gardens of the hôtel de Chevreuse, des Quinze-Vingts, and of the hôtel de Rambouillet. She had it built, painted and furnished, without any one being aware of it. " One evening," says Tallement, " there was a great party at the hôtel de Rambouillet, suddenly a noise was heard behind the tapestry, a door opens, and Mademoiselle de Rambouillet, now Madame de Montausier, dressed superbly, appeared in a large closet, quite magnificent, and splendidly illuminated. I leave you to imagine the surprise of all present. They knew that behind this tapestry there was only the garden of Quinze-Vingts, and, without having the slightest suspicion of the matter, they behold a closet so beautiful, so well painted, and so extensive, as to appear like a grand chamber, brought there as if by enchantment. M. Chapelain, some days after, caused a roll of vellum to be attached privately on which was written an ode to Zyrphée, queen of Argennes, who said she had caused this room to be erected for Arthénice (Madame de Rambouillet) to conceal her age."

The once brilliant society of the hôtel de Rambouillet was dispersed, towards 1650, and out of its ruins were formed several re-unions which scarcely merited the name of coteries.

Very near this period, the wife of an ordinary gentleman of the King's Chamber, Madame Desloges, had formed at her house a re-union of the elite. " She has," said Conrart " her residence at Paris and at Court during twenty-three or twenty-four years, during which time she has been honored, visited and regaled by the highest and most distinguished persons, without excepting the most illustrious princes and princesses.....all the poets appeared to abide under her protection and to render her homage, and her house was like an academy. There were none of the best authors of the day, nor the most refined habitués of the court, with whom she was not on terms of the most friendly intercourse and from whom she had not received innumerable polite letters; even princes and princesses, and other high folk, honored her thus. There had been also an infinite number of verses and other pieces composed in her praise."

Madame Desloges having been discovered mixed up in some political intrigues, and fearing the anger of Richelieu, quitted Paris in 1629, and did not return till 1636.

The re-unions which took place every Saturday at the residence of Mademoiselle de Scudéry, gained also great celebrity, at a period when good taste purified every day the false genius and manner which fashion had been enabled to exercise by its influence over literature. Each of the frequenters of the house had taken a surname, very often selected from the romances of the day. Mademoiselle de Scudéry was known under the name of Sapho; Madame Arragonais called herself la Princesse Philoxène; Madame d'Aligre, Télamire; Sarrasin, Polyandre; Conrart, Théodamas; Pellison, Acanthe or the Chroniquer, because he had the care of editing the annals of the Society; M. de Guénégaud, Alexandre, and his wife, Amalthée; the duke de Saint Aignan, called himself Artaban, Ysarn, author of Louis d'Or, took the name of Zénocrate; M. de Raincy, that of Prince Agathyrse; the abbess de Malnoue, Octavie; Godeau, le Nain de Julie, was there styled le Mage de Sidon, and sometimes also le Mage de Tendre. In the little Saturday re-unions, the ladies dressed with extreme care and taste two dolls, which were called la grande et la petite Pandore, and served for models of the fashion of the day.

The story Du Pays de Tendre, which we purpose giving in a future number, along with some other interesting allegorical works, will enable the reader to form an idea of the metaphorical and distorted style which was enforced at these re-unions. There were some Saturdays when the beaux-esprits appeared to surpass themselves. Like that day when Mademoiselle de Scudéry addressed these lines to Pellisson:

Enfin Acanthe, il faut se rendre;
 Votre esprit a charmé le mien :
 Je vous fais citoyen de Tendre
 Mais de grâce, n'en dites rien.

Such also was the Saturday, 20th of December, 1653, when Conrart, having given a crystal seal, accompanied by a madrigal to the mistress of the house, she replied to him by the following verses :—

Pour mériter un cachet si joli,
 Si bien gravé, si brillant, si pelli,
 Il faudrait avoir, ce me semble,
 Quelque joli secret ensemble ;
 Car enfin, les jolis cachets,
 Demandent de jolis secrets,
 Ou du moins de jolis billets ;
 Mais comme je n'en sais point faire,
 Que je n'ai rien qu'il faille taire,
 Ou qui mérite aucun mystère,
 Il faut vous dire seulement
 Que vous donnez si galamment,
 Qu' on ne peut se défendre
 De vous donner son cœur ou de le laisser prendre.

This piece so transported the assembly that they seemed to be completely electrified, and could not refrain from improvising madrigal after madrigal. The account of this Journée des Madrigaux, as it has been designated, is preserved in manuscript at the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal.

Much about the same period the abbé d'Aubignac, author of the Royaume de Coquetterie, which we also mean to give in our future paper on allegorical works, assembled at his house a certain number of wits. He solicited the title of Royal Academy for these re-unions, and published A discourse to the King, on the establishment of a second Academy in the city of Paris, 1664, in quarto ; notwithstanding the patronage of the dauphin, it was not conceded ; and very fortunately for the French Academy and for the public, no attention was paid to the demand.

A Sicilian F. Procope, having, towards the year 1687, opened in the Rue Fosses-Saint-Germain, opposite la Comédie Française, one of the first cafés that had been known in Paris, soon after its establishment this neighbourhood became the rendezvous of dramatic authors and of men of letters, particularly in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Lamotte, Piron, and Voltaire frequented it. They discoursed of literature, philosophy and religion, and in order to be enabled to express their opinions freely without any danger of the surveillance of the agents of police they invented a pass-word. Thus Boindin agreed with Marmontel to designate l'âme under the title of ot, religion under that of Javotte, and God under that of de l'Être.

The society Du Caveau, which was established towards the end of the last century, numbered among its members, Collé, Panard, Gallet, &c. They formed a species of literary tribunal. The Caveau, said the Correspondance, "is the name we have given to a café very much the same, situated in a little cavern arranged with much taste, in the garden of the Palais-Royal. It is known by the name of le Caveau. Agreeable loungers, habitués of the opera, and especially lovers of good ices, of which they make here a prodigious sale, drop in at different hours of the day. Several of the letters frequented it, in order to lighten the burden of their labors. It was a tribunal to which we could not appeal, and the most sound, as its decisions made but a temporary impression."

Our days it was proposed, at different periods, to revive these literary and literary re-unions under the soubriquets of Diners d'Andeville, Ré-union du Caveau Moderne, Soupers de la Caveau, but the season for those bacchanalian festivities has passed away, and all temptations were ineffectual.

At the latter part of the last century, the widow of a Comptroller of Commerce, Madame Doublet de Persan, who dwelt in an apartment in the exterior of the convent of the Filles-du-Calvaire, whence she never went out even once during the term of forty years, assembled every day around her a very great number of distinguished men, the principal of whom were the abbé Legendre, brother to the mistress of the Countess, and on whom Piron composed the following song:—

Vive Notre vénérable,
Qui siège à table
Mieux qu'au jubé.

Piron himself, the two brothers la Curne de Sainte-Palaye, the abbés Chauvelin and Xaupi, Mairan, Mirabaud, d'Argental, de la Harpe, and Voisenon, &c. Each of these paroissiens, for the society had taken the name of Paroisse, arrived at the same hour and occupied each an arm chair, placed in the salon with his own portrait. There, on a grand bureau, were two registers, in which were to be inscribed the news of the day, after an ample discussion amongst all the members. The object of these registers was for doubtful intelligence, and the means for well authenticated facts. The soirée ended with a supper, generally very jovial.

At the end of every week, they compiled, from the registers, a summary which formed a species of journal known under the title of Nouvelles à la main, and which was an object of speculation for the valet-de-chambre Madame Doublet. As he busied himself a little in the political quarrels which were taking place between the court and parliament, the police, to frighten the paroissiens, caused arrest of the valet-de-chambre, who underwent an imprisonment of some days. Madame Doublet died in 1772, having outlived the greater number of the frequenters of her house. The Secret Memoirs, published under the name of Bachmont, have been extracted, in the greater part, from materials collected by la Paroisse.

It was about this epoch that la marquise de Turpin found the order of the Table Ronde, where Favart, Voisenon, Boufflers figured. It resulted in a little collection entitled la Journée de l'Amour, which was printed gorgeously; copies extant of this work are very rare.

Among the literary reunions of the eighteenth century, must not omit to mention the dinners of the actress mademoiselle Quinault, called Dinere du bout du banc, and soirées of madame du Deffant, and of madame Geoffrin.

Beside these so-called literary reunions, there were formed at different periods literary, bacchanalian, and grotesque orders. We shall now arrange alphabetically a few, of which we have acquired some information; some of those were evidently calculated to accomplish worthy ends.

The social chivalry of l'Amable commerce, established 1724 at Verdun-sur-Meuse.

The Knights de l'Ancre, derived from the order de Felicité.

The order de la Boisson. This order instituted at Avignon, in 1700, by de Pesquières, enjoyed a certain celebrity. They published a register, compiled in part by Morand and the abbé de Charnes, and which bore the title les Nouvelles de l'ordre de la Boisson, chez Museau-Croquis, au Papier Raisin. The members assumed names analogous to those of their prototypes. They were frère vignes, frère Mortadelle, natif de Saint-Jean-Pied-de-Pied, dom Barriquez Caraffa y Fuentes Vinosus, M. de Flaconville le sieur Villebrequin, &c. &c. The books announced by the gazette were relative to the objects of the society. T find there l'Introduction à la cuisine, par le frère le Porc ; Remarques sur les langues mortes, comme langues de bœuf, cochon, et autres ; un Recueil de plusieurs pièces de four, le frère Godiveau ; la Manière de rendre l'or potable, etigent aussi, par le frère la Buvette ; l'Art de bien boucher bouteilles, impression de Liège ; l'Itinéraire des cabarets, ore posthume de Tavernier ; de Arto bibendi, auctore frère plier, &c. &c.

As for the news, political and otherwise, given in this ette, here are a few specimens :—

Lisbonne, le 20 février, 1705. The Archduke gave a erb masquerade, at which the high admiral of Castille and e Portuguese noblemen were present ; they were disguised ings, and in this attire were not recognised by any one. e high admiral danced the Follies of Spain, which is the mon dance."

De Bruxelles, le 28 juin, 1707. The allied army is always amped near Tirlemont, where they drink nothing but beer, those of the duke de Vendôme near Gembloux, where y drink nothing but wine ; this is the reason why there are many desertions in the former, and which attracts so many iers into the French army."—"At a fête given in London," s the same article, "they made vast contrivances to limit the raordinary power of France, they spake also of going a foraging expedition even to the gates of Rheims, and of ying off all the champagne wine for the queen's use ; of ing in pieces the army of Philippe V., and of conducting g Charles III. in triumph to his good city of Madrid. This passed in building airy castles, but the next day they were pulled down by the arrival of two couriers ; the former ging the intelligence of the defeat of the allies at Almanza, the duke de Berwick ; and the other the loss of a great mber of ships taken, or sunk by the French. We cannot res the astonishment and dismay experienced by the glish, a nation so proud and prepossessed in the conscious- s of their own power. The Queen demanded eagerly if ante was taken ; the courier replied that it was, and all the uts around it. Her Majesty appeared very sorry, as she sidered this city impregnable. After the spread of this elligence, trade was all upset, money disappeared, beer ame one and a half as dear as formerly, and wine was culated no more in London, neither were Exchequer ds. They convened a large meeting, in order to arrange some means by which they could procure wine, as they could no more count on that of Spain, the inconvenience being the difficulty of importing it from any other place. The English, having made a flourish that the sea belonged to them, the chevalier de Forbin and the privateers of Saint Malo, not willing to credit this boast, attacked boldly all the vessels bearing the English flag; and they report that they vowed the ruin of the country, sooner than permit their importation of wine." The relation was sometimes in verse.

A la harbe des ennemis,
Villars s'est emparé des lignes;
S'il vient à s'emparer des vignes
Voilà les allemands soumis.

This badinage, as we may perceive, was wanting neither wit nor cunning, consequently it gained much repute. Besides the brothers of the order de la Boisson had given proof of good taste in their statutes, protecting themselves from inebriation a defence particularly odd in a bacchanalian society.

Dans nos hôtels, si d'aventure
Un frère saut ses discours,
Par lamoindre petite ordure,
Je l'en bannis pour quelque jour.
Que si ces peines redoublées,
Sur lui ne font aucun effet,
Je veux que son procès soit fait,
Toutes les tables assemblées ;

said the Grand Master, the philosophy of which was comprised in the following quatrain :

Je donne à l'oubli le passé,
Le présent à l'indifférence;
Et pour vivre débarrassé,
L'avenir à la Providence.

Le Regiment de la Calotte. At the commencement of the eighteenth century, some officers of the court, amongst others Aymon, one of the twelve cloak bearers to the King, Louis XIV., and de Torsac, an officer of the Guards, determined on establishing, under the name of Regiment de la Calotte, a society whose object would be to correct, by the force of ridicule, all disorders in conduct, style, or language which came to their knowledge. They registered immediately amongst the number of members of the Regiment de la Calotte, all those who were remarkable by their singularity or eccentricity either in action or discourse. When a man had done, said, or written a silly thing, they sent him immediately a calotte, that is to say, an epigram full of sarcasm, which overwhelmed him with ridicule, and dispatched to him a commission in the calottin in verse, by which he was at once enrolled as a member of the corps.

Aymon was elected Generalissimo. His election took place at a splendid banquet, two servants presenting him on a velvet cushion, one the fool's sceptre, the staff of authority, the other a cap, ornamented by a weather cock, on which were rats, rattles and butterflies.

De Torsac having one day made a rodomontade at the house of the Generalissimo, Aymon insisted on investing him as the chief; de Torsac was so invested, whether he would or not, and he retained the title up to the period of his death in 1724. They composed a funeral oration in his honor, a piquant satire on the discourses delivered at the French Academy, which was scarcely printed when it was seized through the influence of the parties satirized; but, thanks to the interest of Villars, Aymon, who was re-elected Generalissimo, obtained a reversal of the seizure. The latter died the 5th of May, 1781. The Regiment de la Calotte survived him many years, and ended by sinking quietly away. The best pieces composed by its members have been published.

Two orders which recalled the Regiment de la Calotte, the Order de l'Eleignoir and that of Girouette were instituted during the first Restoration, and distributed a great number of commissions.

The order of Capripèdes, Ratiers or Lucifuges the members of which assembled in Languedoc by moonlight.

Les Frères Charbonniers who in turning to politics became the Carbonari.

The order of Charpentiers, subject to the Fendeurs.

The order of chivalry of the Cocus réformée, established at Paris. There was a book of this order published, without date, in octavo.

The order of the Coleaux, of which there is notice in the third satire of Boileau. The origin of the order is thus given in the life of Saint-Evremond. "One day as he was partaking of some refreshment at the house of M. de Lavardin, bishop of Mans, this bishop began to rally him on his delicacy, and that of the Count d'Olonne and of the Marquis de Bois Dauphin. 'These gentlemen,' said this prelate, 'overdo everything. by their extreme desire for refinement in luxury; they can eat nothing but calves fattened along the banks of the river; it is necessary that their partridge should come from Auvergne, and that their rabbits should be of the Roche-

Guyon or of Versine. They have not less difficulty as fruit; as for wine, they can not drink any that is not les trois coteaux d' Aÿ, of the Haut-Villiers and of Avenay. Saint-Evremond did not fail to impart to his friends the conversation and they so often repeated what he said of the coteaux, and joked about it so frequently, that they were so called Les Trois Coteaux.

From the French literary coteries England derived her Bluestockings Assemblies; and to one who reads the history, the social history, of the last century, they form its most interesting points.

In the year 1763 England was at peace with France, and many persons of fortune took advantage of that circumstance to visit Paris. Amongst these were several who loved literature for its own sake, and who, obtaining admission to the chief literary coteries of France, resolved to attempt the formation of such societies in their own country; of those so resolving Mrs. Montague was, from her fortune and position, the most remarkable. Her estate was ample, and her rank in life sufficient to enable her to commence the holding of these literary meetings. Whilst in France she attended a sitting of the Academy, and heard Voltaire indulge in his usual strain of senseless and ignorant false criticism of Shakspeare. When the secretary, said to her—"Je crois, Madame, que vous êtes un peu fâchée de ce que vous venez d'entendre"—but she answered with great readiness—"Moi, Monsieur?—Point du tout—je ne suis pas amie de M. de Voltaire."—But so much annoyed was she by this depreciation of the great poet that upon her return to England she wrote and published Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakspeare. Her assemblies of literary men and women were held once every week and she frequently invited large parties of the most distinguished persons to very expensive and well appointed dinners, believing, perhaps, with Moliere's hero, that "le vrai Amphytrion est chez qui l'on dine."

Mrs. Vesey was a rival of Mrs. Montague, as were, in a minor degree, Mrs. Thrale and Mrs. Boscowen. The commoners, however, were not permitted to hold exclusive possession of all the talent, and occasionally the dowager Duchess of Portland and the young Duchess of Devonshire threw open their mansions to receive the men of genius of the time.

During the thirty years in which these assemblies were held

Mrs. Montague's house was the centre of all literary attraction. One can fancy the scene her rooms must have presented. The tall, bony hostess, rouged and powdered, and, though nearly seventy years of age, vain of her diamond necklace and bows, is moving amongst her guests. The apartment is richly furnished, and upon the walls hang portraits of most of the great statesmen and writers who graced the reign of George the Second, and who gave a glory to the early years in which his grandson ruled, Pulteney's picture holds the place of honor above the chimney piece, and near it is placed that of the first Lord Lyttleton. The evening is advancing and the rooms are full. There is a crowd around a large burly man, who is rolling, and mouthing, and sipping, and disputing, and drinking innumerable cups of scalding tea—but the throng about him increases—all are anxious to hear Dr. Johnson.

He has been snubbing Boswell, who appears rather pleased, and thinks the great old Samuel a far nobler fellow than that, as Lord Auchinleck called Paoli—"land loupin Corsican". Now the rough old man turns, smilingly, to answer some question of the Duchess of Devonshire, whose fair bright face is bent anxiously towards him, for he is her idol and her sage. Sir Joshua speaks, and the Doctor listens calmly and attentively, and answers so as that every word may reach the dull ear of the painter. Then Topham Beauclerk comes up, and the old man can hardly frown at the open hearted, dear young rake, who is so clever and so witty; but a smile lights up his heavy face as he grasps the hand of that wonderful young Irishman "Mund Burke;" he would like to argue with 'Mund, there is "no nonsense, sir, about him," but he cannot forget his politeness, and his hostess shews him some china plates, which she wishes him to observe, as they once belonged to Queen Elizabeth. He blinks at them with his bleared eyes, and then making a profound but shambling bow, observes—"belonged to Queen Elizabeth, Madame, they have no reason to be ashamed of their present possessor, who is little inferior to the first."

A little pock-marked man, in a flashy court dress, fidgets around the circle; it is Oliver Goldsmith, anxious to make himself conspicuous, wondering why nobody comes to listen to his opinions, and thinking that unless he can contradict Johnson he will pass unnoticed. David Hume has returned from Paris, where he has been Secretary of Embassy under Lord Hertford, and is telling a select few how he attended a masked ball, dressed as a sultan, and sat between two of the handsomest women in France. He is praising Madame D'Epinay, and talking of Grimm and Diderot, to the intense amusement of Horace Walpole, who thinks what a capital paragraph a description of the whole affair will make in that letter which he means to write the next day to Sir Horace Mann, and he wonders if Hume is aware that Madame D'Epinay has described the ball scene in a letter commencing—"Le célèbre David Hume, grand et gros historiographe d'Angleterre, connu et estimé par ses écrits, n'a pas autant de talens pour ce genre d'amusemens auxquels toutes nos jolies femmes l'avoient décidé propre." Walpole thinks too, how oddly "le grand et gros historiographe" would look if he knew that he, Walpole, described him to Lady Suffolk, stating, "Mr. Hume is fashion itself, though his French is almost as unintelligible as his English."

Doctor Burney and his daughter enter, and the latter goes once to address Doctor Johnson, lest otherwise he might suppose his clever little friend Fanny had forgotten his kind praises of Estlin. Horace Walpole is doing the fine gentleman, and talking to Reynolds about art and artists, particularly of a mad young Irishman, named Barry, who is abusing everybody and everything. Mrs. Carter too is there, and ready to speak on any subject of literature or the classics; and not far off is seated a very ugly, but very clever woman, well known through her letters, Mrs. Chapone. And David Garrick is moving from place to place, his bright eye glancing around, and he is acting in the drawing-room, having left all his nature in his theatrical dressing-room. He has been talking in a corner to Doctor Shipley, the Bishop of St. Asaph, and now turns to speak to a very remarkable young man who has been in the army and navy, who has written sermons and preached them to his company, when they had no chaplain; he is now studying at the bar, but is not a very ardent lover of the dry details of the profession; he will, however, one day, be the great foreign orator of England—he is the Honorable Thomas Erskine, the son of the Earl of Buchan.

Forgetful of his late rebuff, Boswell is hovering and lingering about the Doctor's chair to catch his words, and as some great thought, in morals, in philosophy, or in criticism, falls from his lips, honest Bozzy hopes that he has never spoken thus before. Mrs. Thrale, or Ned Malone, or Tom Davies. All the with others, formed the brilliant circle in the reception rooms of our English Blue Stocking Coteries ; but the coteries passed away with knee-buckles and hair powder ; with the reign of pantaloons, and hair dressed à la Victime, arose another literary association, which found its last supporters in Lydia White and old Lady Cork.

In these literary coteries all the subjects of the day were before the society ; wit and humor were employed upon them, and puns, and epigrams, and stinging lampoons were suggested or written. A better order of composition was attempted by those whose powers enabled them to accomplish it.

ART. II.—PAUL HIFFERNAN. A CHARACTER OF THE LAST CENTURY.

"Old times are changed—old manners gone," and instead of saying there is nothing new under the sun, we may more fitly say, there is nothing old under the sun—whole classes of beings appear to be extinct—we do not speak of the supernatural beings only, who with one consent have taken their departure from a world become all-too bustling for them—the rustic swain now treads his way homewards when his evening task is over, uninterrupted by the merry laugh of fairies dancing on the green ; the maiden, as she rises at the dawn of morning, never finds in her shoe the welcome coin ; and even veritable beings of actual flesh and blood, have left vacant places in our land, and are never to appear among us again—the very hermits, once considered absolutely necessary to give the finishing effect to the picturesque, no longer sit in solemn state, with a handful of berries, a bunch of cresses and a draught of water, caught from the trickling rills, for their every-day fare—if such things as pilgrimages are still made, depend upon it they are accomplished with the aid of locomotives. The most romantic hero of modern days turns aside from shady groves and purling streams, for the nearest railway station. The children of former times, when ignorance was bliss, who scampered about the green fields, far from the paths of science, have been succeeded by a race of juvenile philosophers deep in scholastic and scientific lore. Oddities, too, are gone, oddities! we gave such amusing variety to society, and furnished anecdote and adventures for the dramatist and novelist, which might now be considered an outrage on nature! In our young days every little village, nay, every family, had its own oddity—but steam vessels and railroads have so thoroughly invaded the privacy of all localities, that there is scarcely a quiet nook left for the undisturbed cultivation of singularities. Men are no longer brought into such constant contact with each other, or as the mesmerists would say, in rapporé, that they imbibe the same turn of thought and tone of feeling—just as we find the roughnesses of coins smoothed down into a level surface, when they have been for some time well jingled together in the pocket, so the peculiarities by which individuals are distinguished are worn away, wherever men are well jumbled together. For ourselves, we confess that we regret the close assimilation of manners and habits, and pine after the oddities of by-gone days and all their delightful eccentricities. Now we can only turn to our biographies to renew our acquaintance with them; but the manners and the tone which gave so much effect, cannot be recalled.

In turning over some biographical sketches, we meet with some of the passages in the life of Paul Hiffernan, and though he was not a man in whom we could feel any interest, yet as the associate of many celebrated persons of his day, and being mentioned in Washington Irving's delightful biography of Goldsmith, and elsewhere, a brief account of him may not be unacceptable. In some respects his situation was similar to that of Goldsmith, but the contrast between their characters, is as great as can be conceived. The strangeness of his habits was no impediment to his intimacy with the most celebrated men of the day, nor to his introduction to the best society, but he had the power of being amusing, which goes for a great deal.

Paul Hiffernan was born in the year 1719, in the neighbourhood of Dublin, and received the early part of his education in his native city. As he was intended for the Roman Catholic priesthood his parents sent him to pursue his studies in a college in the south of France; here, he became acquainted among his fellow students, with several, who afterwards became men of the highest celebrity. Rousseau and Marmontel were the most remarkable; with Marmontel, who was lively and social, he soon became intimate, and with his class fellows, appreciated the powers of their young companion, whose wit, poetic turn, and agreeable sallies, gave promise of his future fame. In the intense love of retirement, and contemplation of Rousseau, he did not discover the genius that was yet to gain the applause of the world. Hiffernan found that most of the English and Irish students were studying medicine, and he resolved to give up the intention of taking orders, and to prepare himself for the medical profession. He remained in France for seventeen years, part of the time in Paris, and the remainder in the college; he then took out a medical degree, and returned to Dublin to practise as a physician, but this resolution was not put into execution. He was so intolerably indolent and so fond of amusement, that he was utterly unfit for any serious pursuit, and so could never have succeeded in a profession, in which the demand on time and thought is so constant, but he had qualities which fitted him for the life which he liked best; he was a good scholar; he had caught much of the French manner during his residence in France, and abounded in anecdote; his company was sought, and he availed himself of the hospitality of his acquaintance, and was a constant guest at their tables. His first specimen of authorship was in a periodical paper called "The Tichler," for which he was engaged to write against Doctor Lucas, who was from his active patriotism, the most popular man at that time in Ireland, and had been returned to serve in Parliament by the people—the papers which Hiffernan furnished were much cried up and admired by the party for whom he wrote, and were the means of extending his convivial intercourse, as he was always welcome to those who were opposed to Lucas. These productions had no literary merit to insure a prolonged existence, they were in fact merely personal abuse, and prejudiced statements. Hiffernan became an object of great dislike to the popular party; the license which he had given to his tongue and to his pen, would have justified them in this, but it was carried too far, and the excitement against him became so violent that he could not venture to appear in public without incurring great danger; so by the advice of his friends he determined to leave Dublin and settle in London. Having obtained the approbation of his friends and excited the rage of his enemies, he considered himself fully qualified to set up as an author in the great city.

At first he was mostly engaged in making translations from the Latin and Greek, for which task his familiarity with those languages would have particularly fitted him, had not his own language in a manner become foreign to him, during his long residence abroad ; and he wanted that easy flow so essential in writing ; this defect in style, and his want of punctuality, prevented his succeeding in this department of literature. He was however, more fortunate in a periodical called The Tuner, which came out in five numbers. In this he ridiculed with considerable humor some of the new plays. In the year 1755, he brought out miscellanies in prose and verse ; many of those papers had been written during his stay in France for the amusement of his friends, and embraced a variety of subjects, in which very entertaining anecdotes and original observations were introduced. Among them we find essays on taste, the virtues of cockfighting, theory of acting, and a dissertation on the character of Polonius, in which he defends him from the imputation of folly, in which he asserts himself to be fully borne out in the sage advice given by that statesman to his son and daughter, and by the character which the King gives of him to Laertes. Though this work was not devoid of merit, it was not popular, or profitable to its author ; its sale was chiefly promoted by his personal application to his friends—no very creditable manner of seeking for success. He sometimes brought out a pamphlet having secured a list of subscribers among his intimates. Wishing to turn his pen to better account, he thought of exercising it in the art of puffing ; it is stated that several painters and actors were under regular contribution to him. Numbers of aspirants to public favor, sought his services, which, from his intimacy with Garrick and Foote, and others of great influence in matters of taste, they supposed to be invaluable. He gave regular audience to those who sought his good offices ; the cider cellar, Maiden lane, was the place where the presentations took place ; vast numbers came forward to solicit his aid ; actors who asserted that they had ability for the highest range of parts, and who from sheer envy were made to fill subordinate ones, called on him to publish their wrongs to the world, and to make the tyrant manager wince under a just chastisement, and learn a lesson never to be forgotten—that he who is fitted by nature and by study to represent the heroes of the drama, should never tread the stage but as such. Painters, wishing to crush the managers of the Exhibition, for excluding the works in which their discerning eyes could discover the genius of a Titian or a Claude Lorraine, called on his pen for the merited castigation, and for a just eulogium on the excluded works. To administer to their vanity, and to satisfy their cravings for revenge was his business ; and he made it a most lucrative one ; candidates for the stage flocked to him in numbers.

The introduction of one, was after this fashion :—

The waiter introduced him into the great man's presence, who never rose from his seat, but slowly withdrawing the pipe which he had been smoking from his mouth, made a slight inclination of the head, desiring the applicant to sit down, and speak ; he listened with profound attention to the account which he gave of himself, of the great capabilities of which he conceived himself possessed, and the great parts for which he felt himself peculiarly inspired ; the doctor listened, but did not give any opinion ; he appointed a private meeting for the next evening, at the Black Lion, Russell-street, or at some other favorite ale-house. Here, he again gave audience to the candidate, and opened the proceedings by stating the terms of his patronage ; a guinea entrance, a guinea for instruction, and two guineas more to be paid on getting an engagement at either of the theatres. The first instalment having been duly paid and deposited in the Doctor's pocket, he then took an accurate survey of the person of his protégé, in all directions, but for the more exact measurement of his proportions, he took a six-inch ruler, with which he was always provided, from his pocket, and making him stand against the wainscot, he took his dimensions with the utmost precision. If the candidate happened to be very tall, Hiffernan heaved a deep sigh, and said that was not so well, but then added, in a consolatory tone, that Barry was as tall, and nobody found fault with his acting ; if he was short, deep regret was apparent in Hiffernan's countenance and manner, and he expressed his fears that such under-size was unsuited to the personation of a hero ; but suddenly recollecting himself, his brow cleared in an instant, and he observed with a cheerful air, that Garrick was short, and yet everyone admired him. Of course, the candidates were satisfied when they found that there was a point of resemblance between them and those great actors. These evenings did not close without a propitiatory supper, the sole expense of which was defrayed by the novice, while Hiffernan was glad on this, as on every other occasion, to take whatever he could get, in whatever shape in which it was offered. In this discreditable manner did he pass that time which, with the stores of information which were at his command, might have been usefully as well as profitably employed. One of his strange peculiarities was the inviolable secrecy which he preserved as to the place of his abode; no earthly consideration could tempt him to divulge it, even to his greatest intimates. He had placed a translation from the French, from a work called "The Origin of Despotism," in his bookseller's hands for publication; it was, however, delayed beyond the time when it was to have appeared; he called for an explanation; the bookseller told him that the copies had been ready for publication, but as parties ran high at the time, he feared the risk which would be incurred by exposing them for sale, so thought it better to wait for a while. Hiffernan, however, proposed to take the copies himself, with the intention of pressing them on his friends; terms having been settled, his signature was required to the agreement, to which his place of residence was to be added. Having signed his name, the Bedford coffee-house was written under it, as his address; the bookseller would not be satisfied with this, as a coffee-house was no place to make a note payable; nothing could persuade him to give any other, and thus a bargain from which he had expected to derive profit was broken off. The mystery in which the place of his abode was involved naturally excited much curiosity among his friends, and among those with whom he had dealings, but he was never fully satisfied; all devices to discover it proved abortive. As he was often seen in Fleet-street with clean shoes and other tokens of a recent toilet, it was conjectured that he lodged in one of the little courts in that neighbourhood. He was generally observed to set out on a visiting excursion at about twelve o'clock, and he went from house to house, in hopes of an invitation to dinner; if all utterly failed, he would take his dinner in an eating house, and go to the theatre in the evening where he generally slept during the whole of the entertainment; he may probably have required the sound of his own voice and the excitement of his own humour to keep him awake. Washington Irving mentions a comfortable nap in which Hiffernan indulged on a particular occasion. He tells us that Bickerstaffe had invited him with Goldsmith and some other literary friends to dinner, after which he proposed to read a play which he had just written. Scarcely had the author got into the second act, when Hiffernan began to nod, and at length snored most audibly ; Bickerstaffe was embarrassed, but read on, in a more elevated tone—the louder he read, the louder Hiffernan snored. When the author came to a pause, “never mind the brute, Bick,” said Goldsmith, “but go on—he would have served Homer just so, if he were here and reading his own works.” When he left the theatre of an evening, it was his custom to repair to the “qider cellar,” or to some other porter house near Covent Garden, where he generally met some acquaintances, to whose offering of paying the reckoning he willingly acceded, so that he never lost an opportunity of turning his agreeability to good account. He indulged so freely on such occasions, that it seldom happened that the evening closed, without its being apparent that he had taken a cheerful glass ; he then became very quarrelsome and abusive ; his behaviour, when a guest at the house of a friend, was very different ; here he exerted himself to the utmost to please, and his conversation abounding in anecdotes and original and amusing remarks, was extremely pleasant.

Hiffernan’s obstinate secrecy with regard to his lodgings was, one night, put to the test, by Mr. Dossie, secretary to the Duke of Northumberland, a literary man who was fond of conversation, and would sit up late at night to enjoy it. He was in the habit of proposing to walk home with the last of the company. As Hiffernan had outstaid the other guests, chatting with him, Mr. Dossie said that he would accompany him home. This was the most distasteful proposal which he could possibly have made to the Doctor, who most earnestly entreated that he would not give himself any such trouble, and added, by way of discouragement, that he lived very far off in the city. Mr. Dossie persevered, and, overruling all objections, actually set off arm in arm with him. They at length reached St. Paul’s, when Mr. Dossie enquired whether he lived much further. The Doctor asserted, in a very decided tone, that he did indeed, hoping his companion would desist ; but he was disappointed, and on, on, they went, till they arrived at the Exchange. “Are your lodgings much further?” again enquired Mr. Dossie. “A great-great deal,” replied the Doctor eagerly, “a great deal further, all the way at Bow,” thinking that, as Mr. Dossie began to lag, he might safely name some distant point. He now hoped that he had really tired him out, by the long walk which he had taken him. Such was indeed the case, for he declared he could go no further ; so bidding the Doctor good-night, he left him to pursue his solitary way to the obscurity of his abode.

Hiffernan continued to write occasionally, and, among other things, he brought out "Dramatic Genius," a work in five books, which he prudently dedicated to Garrick, and in which he flattered him in the most extravagant manner. His compliments were not lost on empty air, for Garrick was accessible to flattery in no common degree. Before condemning him too severely for this weakness, we should make allowance for the position which he occupied was one that could not have failed to produce a yearning after open demonstrations of admiration. Public applause was everything to him, so that it was quite natural that every act of homage to his genius should have been gratifying. That he appreciated that offered by Hiffernan was proved by the interest which he felt for him. He exerted himself among his friends, and procured subscriptions for the work which amounted to £150. This was wealth to Hiffernan, who had never had the command of so large a sum before ; he consequently became purse-proud, for he not merely satisfied himself with the equipment of a new suit of black, but actually took upon himself the airs of a successful author, and, above all, never lost an opportunity of making an ostentatious display of his money. One day, while dining at the house of a friend, he took from his pocket a twenty-pound note, and asked if any of the party could change it. As no one could, his host offered to send his servant to the bank to change it. Hiffernan handed it to the servant, and then entered into chat with the company as they sat over their wine. More than half an hour passed, and the Doctor asked if the man had come in. He had not. The Doctor betrayed some uneasiness, which he endeavored to disguise as well as he could. Another half hour went by, and he enquired again, and again received the same answer. Becoming seriously alarmed he exclaimed, with an oath, "your man, I am afraid, has run off with the money." "It seems odd," said the gentleman, "but, if he has gone off, it is with your money, not mine." "Sir," interrupted Hiffernan, rising from his chair and raising his voice in great agitation and vehement passion, "Sir, I'd have you to know, that I know law as well as you, and if I, by your direction, gave my money to your servant, you are accountable to me for it. I tell you, Sir, that the act of the servant is the act of the master." A warm dispute on the point of law arose; it was at length happily interrupted by the entrance of the servant with the change.

In some time after the Doctor appeared as a dramatic writer. An unfinished tragedy was found among the papers of Henry Jones, the author of the Earl of Essex, and was given to Hiffernan to complete. It was brought out the following year under the title of "The Heroine of the Cave." It went off with great applause, in great measure owing to the fine acting of Mrs. Pope, who personated the heroine. On the profits of this play Hiffernan lived for some time, but, when they were nearly expended, it was time to think of something else; so he determined to give a course of lectures on the anatomy of the human body. He published his prospectus; a guinea was the sum for the course, to consist of three lectures; the subscribers were not to exceed twenty, that they might have sufficient accommodation. The subscription, which was taken up by his friends who pitied his situation, was soon filled, and the first lecture was announced by the Doctor himself, who went round to the subscribers to apprise them as soon as it was fixed. It was to be given in the Percy Coffee House. At the appointed place and hour, one o'clock, the audience assembled. It consisted of the following persons:—Doctor Kennedy, physician to the Prince of Wales, Mr. George Garrick, Mr. Beckett of Pall Mall, and another gentleman. They waited in vain till two o'clock for more company, but none coming, the Doctor emerged from a closet in a full suit of black, and, placing himself by a little round table, made a very formal bow to his four auditors, who could not suppress a smile. With great pomposity he proceeded to draw from his pocket a small print of a human skeleton, evidently cut out of a magazine. Having laid it on the table, he commenced:—"I am now, gentlemen, about to open a subject to you of the greatest importance in life, which is the knowledge of ourselves, which Plato recommends in that short but forcible maxim of noes teipsum. Pope by saying, 'the proper study of mankind is man,' and our divine Shakespeare by exclaiming, 'what a piece of work is man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculties! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world, the paragon of animals!' having thus given the general opinion of these great men on this subject,

I shall commence with describing the head of this paragon animals." The description, which treated of the skull, brain, &c., occupied about half an hour; then, lifting up print, he restored the head of the skeleton, which he had previously doubled down, to its former position. In the next part of his lecture he was to treat of the conformation of the breast. "Here, gentlemen," said he, "is the next part of this very extraordinary animal, which may very properly be called from its very curious bend and texture, the bread-basketery of the human form." At this the audience lost all command of their risible faculties, and burst into peals of laughter; from which, when they recovered, they fell into an awkward silence. The Doctor stood, with the print in his hand, glaring at them. One of the company, however, recovered himself sufficiently to address him. "Why, Doctor, as we are all friends, and as the subscription has been paid in, what signifies giving yourself any further trouble; we are satisfied of your capacity, and we can dispense with any more lectures." A unanimous aye was a confirmation of the fact. "Suppose, gentlemen," said one of the party, "that you all come and take a bit of dinner with me to-day, and we can see what we are able to do in anatomising the bottle." The words dinner and bottle, always so welcome to Hiffernan's ear, so magical in their effects upon his feelings and his spirits, were no sooner uttered than the clouds dispersed that had darkened his brow. The laugh was forgotten, the scowl was gone, the solemnity of the lecture was instantly discarded, and he stepped from behind the table among his friends, saluting each with the most satisfied anticipations of the convivial hours before him. In the exuberance of the benevolent feelings excited, he ordered up coffee for the party, but, his heart failing, he contrived to slip away before the reckoning was paid, leaving its settlement to those he left behind him. He joined them some time after at dinner.

Notwithstanding his mean and indolent habits, this strange being had the art of making friends. Among those were some eminently distinguished for talents and literary acquisitions. They were ever ready to lend him a helping hand in the difficulties in which his indolent habits constantly involved him. Garrick frequently relieved him, which was always attributed by Hiffernan, with most comfortable vanity, to a deep sense of obligation for the epigrams and paragraphs of his praise which he had furnished from time to time. It certain that poor Goldsmith, to whom any distress was a ready passport, was among those who lent him a helping hand; his generous nature always acknowledging a claim in the want which sought his aid; his own hard necessities being lost sight of when he looked on those of others. From Foote Hiffernan had also received much kindness: the last act of the sort occurred one morning in the Haymarket, where he met Hiffernan, and asked him how he was. "Why, faith, but very so so," replied the Doctor. "What, the old disorder, Doctor,—impecuniosity, I suppose?" The Doctor gave a melancholy nod of assent. "Well, my little Boyce, I must prescribe for you; I have been lucky last night at play; I'll give you as many guineas as you have shillings in your pocket: come, make the experiment." Hiffernan, nothing loath, took out seven shillings; Foote, with equal readiness, produced seven guineas, which he put into Hiffernan's hand. "You see, Paul," said he, "fortune is not such a jade as you imagine, for she has been favorable to me last night, and equally so to you this morning."

In the spring of 1777 Hiffernan was attacked by jaundice, and his friends, knowing that he should keep himself quiet and stay within doors while ill, used to assist him most liberally, that he might not exert himself. Among those who were most forward in the benevolent object, were Garrick, Murphy, Doctor Kennedy, and Mrs. Abington. Hiffernan, however, used to steal out every day for an hour or two, to bask in the sun, hoping it might revive him. It was on one of these occasions that he crept to the house of a friend; he was so exhausted that he had not strength to go up to the drawing-room. The friend, touched by his situation, used the privilege of friendship, and offered his assistance, at a time when, as he said, he was aware that sickness must involve increased expense; but, to spare his broken spirits from what he conceived might be a mortification, he proposed the gift as a loan, and begged that he would allow him to send a guinea every week till he got well. Hiffernan thankfully accepted the offer, but when asked for his address, that the remittance might be left, would give no other than "The Bedford Coffee House." "My dear Doctor," said his friend, "it is from no impertinent curiosity, from no wish to pry into what you may not wish to tell, but it is really necessary that I should know where it will reach you safely and quickly, for fear of any mistake." "The Bedford Coffee House," repeated Hiffernan with a deep sigh, as he pressed his friend's hand, "The Bedford Coffee House," and so they parted, never to meet again. the two following Saturdays the letters enclosing the gun were found, on enquiry, to have reached the Doctor safe; the packet on the third Saturday was returned unopened; he had breathed his last the night before in one of the obscure courts off St. Martin's lane.

In looking over the slight notices of his career which had fallen in our way, it would have been impossible not to have been struck by the melancholy exhibition of advantages thrown away, and by mournful reflections on the faults of character which habits of indolence engender. His having secured the friendship of so many men of the highest character proves that he must have possessed the power of pleasing in a common degree; and, had his abilities been wisely and steadily directed, his days might have been passed in independence and usefulness.

ART. III.—THE POST OFFICE.

1. First Report of the Postmaster General, on the Post Office.
Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty. 1855.
2. Second Ditto. 1856.

We have often thought that if our Reviews would devote some portion of that space which is freely given up to disquisitions on the institutions of other times and countries, to the presentation, in a condensed form, of the vast amount of useful, important, and interesting information contained in the valuable Reports of the various public offices, printed each year by order of the legislature, the public service would gain in popularity, and the public would gain a fitting knowledge of the progress and position of those establishments which the nation supports. Thinking thus, we have resolved to analyze, from time to time, some of the most useful of the much abused, because little read, stores of information known as Blue Books, and we can make no better selection of a Report, with which to commence our series, than the two interesting works which we have placed as the heading of this paper; and we dare say the reader will agree with us. He, we, and everybody have cried, in chorus, "The Post Office is really astonishing," and we have all been inclined to admit the truth contained in the song of The Post Man's Knock, which proclaims, "What a wonderful man the Post Man is!"

Important as the administration of the Post Office must ever have been considered, it is strange that, although a foreign letter office was established in the reign of James the First, and an inland letter office in that of Charles the First (1635), yet the First Report is made in the Postmaster Generalship of Lord Canning, and is for the year 1854, bearing date January 31st, 1855.

The first establishment in England, of a Postal Service for the conveyance of the letters of the public is involved in some obscurity.

The letters both of private and public personages were originally sent by special messengers only, and more recently by common carriers, who began to ply regularly with their pack horses about the time of the wars of the Roses. As the carriers travelled the journey through with the same horse, this mode of transmission must have been very slow, yet it was long the only conveyance available by the public.

Government posts, that is relays of horses and men under the control of the Government, were not established till nearly three centuries later; but as early as the time of Edward II. horses were kept by private individuals for hire, so that a messenger might travel post, i. e. by relays: and as 'Haste, Post, Haste' is found written on the backs of private letters at the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth centuries, it may be inferred that the use of this mode of conveyance was not restricted to the correspondence of the Government.

In 1481, Edward IV., then at war with Scotland, is said to have established a system of relays of horses, (probably from York to Edinburgh,) the post stations being twenty miles apart, so that despatches were conveyed 200 miles in ten days.

In 1548, the charge for post horses impressed for the service of the Crown was fixed by Statute at a penny a mile.

There seems to be no evidence of the existence of a regular system for conveying the letters of the public during the reign of Elizabeth, although posts for forwarding the public despatches were doubtless organised, inasmuch as one Thomas Randolph is mentioned by Camden as being Chief Postmaster of England in 1581; and it appears that in Ireland the horse posts were established in this reign during O'Neil's wars for the purpose of bringing intelligence of military events.

The first establishment of a Letter Post by the Government was in the reign of James I., who, as is stated by a proclamation of Charles I., set on foot a Post Office for letters to and from foreign countries "for the benefit of the English merchants," but nothing of the kind seems to have been done for the accommodation of inland correspondence, and special messengers were still employed to carry the letters of the State.

It was not till the reign of Charles I., that a Post Office for inland letters was established. In 1635 the King issued a proclamation, in which he recites that up to that time there had been no certain communication between England and Scotland, 'wherefore he now commands his Postmaster of England for foreign parts to settle a running post or two, to run night and day between Edinburgh and London, to go thither and come back again in six days, and to take with them all such letters as shall be directed to any post town in or near that road.' It is at the same time ordered, that bye posts shall be connected with many places on the main line, to bring in and carry out the letters from and to Lincoln, Hull, and other towns; a similar post to Chester and Holyhead, and another to Exeter and Plymouth, are to be established: and it is promised that as soon as possible the like conveyances shall be organised for the Oxford and Bristol road and also for that leading through Colchester for Norwich. The rates of postage are fixed at twopence the single letter for any distance under eighty miles; fourpence up to a hundred and forty miles; sixpence for any longer distance in England; and eightpence to any place in Scotland. By a subsequent proclamation of 1637, it is ordered that no other messengers, nor foot posts, shall carry any letters but those alone which shall be employed by the King's Postmaster General, unless to places to which the King's posts do not go, and with the exception of common known carriers, or messengers particularly sent on purpose, or persons carrying a letter for a friend.

This new establishment was entrusted to Thomas Witherings, who had before been appointed Foreign Postmaster; but in 1640, he was superseded for alleged abuses in both his offices, which were sequestered and placed in hands of Philip Burlamachy, to be exercised thenceforth under the care and superintendence of the principal Secretary of State. From this time, the Post Office may be considered to have become one of the settled institutions of the country.

The object of the Crown in establishing this letter post was probably quite as much the formation of a profitable monopoly as the accommodation of the public.

The prohibition of the carrying of letters by persons other than those employed by the King's Postmaster, caused great dissatisfaction, being viewed as an unwarrantable stretch of prerogative. In 1642, a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the matter, and the subject afterwards engaged the attention of Parliament. But the utility of the institution was too great to admit of its abandonment; and we find that in 1644, Mr. Edmund Prideaux, who afterwards held the appointment of Attorney-General to the Commonwealth, and who had been chairman of the Committee of 1642, was elected by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament to be Chief Postmaster.

Prideaux established a weekly conveyance of letters into all parts of the kingdom, which, according to Blackstone, saved the public a charge of 7,000*l.* a year in maintaining Postmasters.

In 1649, the Common Council of London set up a post in rivalry with that of the Parliament. But the Commons, although they had loudly denounced the formation of a monopoly by the Crown, promptly proceeded to put down this infringement of their own monopoly; and from this time the carrying of letters has been in the hands of Government.

In the beginning of the system the Postmaster was allowed to take the profits in consideration of his bearing the charges; afterwards, however, as the revenue increased, the office of Postmaster was farmed; and this practice of farming was continued, as regards the bye posts, almost to the end of the eighteenth century.

In 1649 the amount of the revenue derived from the posts was 5,000*l.*

Under the authority of Cromwell and his Parliament, in 1657 the Post Office underwent material changes. The ordinance under which this was effected gives as a motive for the establishment of posts, 'that they will be the best means to discover and prevent many dangerous and wicked designs against the Commonwealth.'

At the Restoration, the settlement of the Post Office which had been made under the Commonwealth was confirmed. The statute 12 Car. II. c. 35. re-enacts in substance the ordinance of the Commonwealth; and this Act being the first strictly legal authority for the establishment of the Post Office, has been called its Charter.

In the year 1663 the revenue of the Post Office was, by the statute 15 Car. II. c. 14., settled on James, Duke of York, and his heirs male in perpetuity. At this time it had increased to 21,000*l.*, that being the sum at which the office was farmed.

In Scotland, although the proclamation of 1635 provides for the conveyance of letters from London to Edinburgh, no provision seems to have been made at that time for an internal post; but during the last half of the seventeenth century, several internal posts were established on the principal lines of road, though without any legislative enactment to that effect, until the time of William III., when, in 1695, the Scotch Parliament passed an Act for the general establishment of a Letter Post.

In 1683, a Penny Post for the conveyance of letters and small parcels about London and its suburbs, was set up by Robert Murray, an upholsterer, who assigned the same to William Dockwra. This was denounced by the ultra-Protestant party, as a contrivance of the Jesuits; and it was alleged that if the bags were examined, they would be found full of Popish plots. Nevertheless, Dockwra seems to have conducted his undertaking with success for some years, till its profits excited the envy of the Government, who seized it on the ground of its being an infringement of the rights of the Crown; though a pension of 200*l.* a year was afterwards granted to Dockwra by way of compensation. This was the commencement of the London District Post, of which Dockwra was subsequently appointed Controller, and which, until last year (1854), existed as a separate department of the General Post Office.

At first there appears to have been no limit to the weight of a packet sent by the District Post, but its value was restricted to ten pounds.

In 1685, the revenue of the Post Office, which in 1663 had been conferred on the Duke of York, now that that Prince had succeeded to the throne, was settled on the King, his heirs and successors; the amount being then estimated at 65,000*l.* a year.

In 1698, Dockwra was removed from his office on a charge of mismanagement. The charge is contained in a memorial by the officers and messengers of the Penny Post (as the District Post was then called), to the Commissioners of the Treasury, alleging that Dockwra wilfully "doth what in him lyes to lessen the revenue of the Penny Post Office, that he may farm it, or get it into his own hands," for which purpose it was declared, that he had removed the Post Office to an inconvenient place. The memorial went on to state that, "he forbids the taking in any handboxes (except very small), and all parcells above a pound, which when they were taken did bring in considerable advantage to the Office, they being now at great charge sent by porters into the city, and coaches and watermen into the country, which formerly went by Penny Post messengers, much cheaper and more satisfactory."

It was further alleged, that "he stops, under spetious pretences, most parcells that are taken in, which is great damage to tradesmen, by loosing their customers, or spoiling their goods, and many times hazard the life of the patient when physic is sent by a doctor or an apothecary."

Dockwra was also charged with stopping parcels, which it was hinted he misappropriated: with opening letters and taking from them bills, &c.; and with persecuting all the officers except his own creatures.

In 1708, an attempt was made by Mr. Povey to establish a Halfpenny Post in opposition to the official Penny Post, but this enterprise, like Dockwra's, was suppressed by a law-suit.

In 1710, the statute of 9 Anne, c. 10., was passed, which repealed the 12 Car. ii. and the Scotch Act of 1695, remodelled the law of the Post Office, and remained until 1837, the foundation of that branch of the law. By its provisions a General Post Office for the three Kingdoms and for the Colonies was established under one head, who was to bear the style of "Her Majesty's Postmaster General," and was empowered to keep one Chief Letter Office in London, one in Edinburgh, one in Dublin, one in New York, and one in the West Indies. In 1784, however, the Irish Parliament passed an Act which, in conjunction with the British Acts, 24 Geo. III. cc. 6. 8., had the effect of severing the Irish from the British Post Office, and creating an independent Postmaster General for Ireland; but the Post Offices were reunited under the British Postmaster General, by the Act 1 William IV. c. 8, passed in 1831.

After the passing of the statute of Anne, the next event deserving notice is the farming of the Cross Posts, by Ralph Allen, in 1720. Allen observed that the organisation of these posts was very imperfect, and that they were so few in number that many districts were unprovided with a postal service, while in other cases letters passing between neighbouring towns were conveyed by very circuitous routes, and in those days of slow locomotion caused serious delays; and he thought that a great improvement both of the revenue and in public accommodation might be effected by an extension and re-arrangement of the Cross Post system. He thereupon induced the Government to grant him a lease of the Cross Posts for life at a rent of 6,000*l.* a year, and carried into effect his intended improvements, realizing an annual profit of upwards of 12,000*l.*, which he lived to enjoy for forty-four years, spending it mainly in works of charity, and in hospitality to men of learning and genius.

On the death of Allen, in 1764, the Cross Posts were put under Mr. William Ward, who (for a salary of 300*l.* per annum) undertook to hand over their profits, which then amounted to about 20,000*l.* a year, to the Crown. This branch increased rapidly, and in 1799, when the Bye Letter Office was abolished, and its functions transferred to the General Post Office, the annual profits amounted to 200,000*l.*

The Office at this time (1764), though much increased since its first establishment, was of very insignificant proportions compared with those which it has since assumed. Thus the records show that in 1763 the Secretary had one clerk and two supernumerary clerks assigned to him, whereas the Secretary's office now comprises 67 clerks. The Receiver-General had two clerks, and the Accountant-General a deputy and one clerk; though these two offices (now united in one) require at present the services of 51 clerks. Two clerks only were employed to open "dead and insolvent letters;" but the like duties now occupy the time of 85 clerks. The Packet Establishment consisted of four Harwich packet boats, six Dover boats, and five New York boats, which cost the office 10,000*l.* per annum, whereas at the present time the number of packets employed under contracts for the Mail Service is not less than 110, and the sum paid for the use of them is more than 800,000*l.* a year.

At the time above referred to there were pensions payable out of the revenue of the Post Office to the amount of 72,000*l.* per annum,* and the Department was bound by statute to pay in to the Exchequer 700*l.* a week or 36,000*l.* per annum. The annual payment, indeed, actually amounted to 70,000*l.*; but this sum is less than a seventeenth part of the present net revenue.

* Three of these pensions still continue chargeable on the Post Office revenue, viz., one of 4,700*l.* to the Duke of Grafton as the representative of the Duchess of Cleveland, paid since the year 1686; one of 4,000*l.* to the heirs of the Duke of Schomberg, since 1694-5; and one of 5,000*l.* to the Duke of Marlborough, since 1707-8.

In 1784 the privilege of franking was greatly restricted. Up to that time Members of both Houses of Parliament had probably enjoyed the privilege of sending and receiving letters through the Post without payment, from the first establishment of the Post Office, or at least from its adoption by the Long Parliament. This privilege was much abused. Before 1764, Members were able to frank by merely writing their names upon the cover of the letter. Parcels of such franks were obtained from Members by their friends and put aside for use, like the stamped covers sold by the Post Office at the present day; and there was even a trade carried on in them by the servants of Members, whose practice it was to ask their masters to sign them in great numbers at a time. There was reason, too, to believe that franks were forged to a large extent; and it was estimated that had postage been paid on the franked correspondence, the revenue would have been increased by 170,000*l*.

In 1763 it was enacted that the whole superscription of the letter must be in the hand-writing of the Member; this, however, was not found a sufficient check to the evil, and in 1784 and 1795 further restrictions were imposed. Finally, at the establishment of Penny Postage in 1840, the privilege of both Parliamentary and Official franking was abolished.

In 1784 one of the greatest reforms ever made in the Post Office was effected by the introduction of the plan of Mr. John Palmer. Up to that time the mail bags had been carried by post-boys on horseback; at an average rate, including stoppages, of from three to four miles an hour. Mr. Palmer, in his scheme submitted to Mr. Pitt, in 1783, gives the following account of the then existing system: "The Post, at present, instead of being the swiftest, is almost the slowest, conveyance in the country; and though, from the great improvement in our roads, other carriers have proportionably mended their speed, the post is as slow as ever.* It is likewise very unsafe, as the frequent robberies of it testify; and to avoid a loss of this nature people generally cut Bank bills or bills at sight in two, and send the bills by different posts. The mails are generally intrusted to some idle boy, without character,

* In 1696 the Treasury sanctioned an arrangement for conveying the mails between Exeter and Bristol twice a week, under a stipulation that the distance (65 miles) should be performed in 24 hours.

mounted on a worn-out hack, and who, so far from being able to defend himself or escape from a robber, is much more likely to be in league with him."

Mr. Palmer, who was manager of the theatre of Bath, had observed that when the tradesmen of that city were particularly anxious to have a letter conveyed with speed and safety, they were in the habit of enclosing it in a brown paper cover, and sending it by the coach, though the charge for such conveyance was much higher than the postage of a letter. He therefore proposed that the mail bags should, as far as possible, be sent by the passenger coaches, accompanied by well armed and trustworthy guards. He also suggested other important alterations, as that the mails should be so timed as to arrive in London, and, as far as might be, in other places, at the same hour, so that the letters might be delivered altogether; and that they should be despatched from and arrive in London at a time convenient to the public, the mails having hitherto left London at all hours of the night.

This plan was vehemently opposed by the officers of the Post Office, but Mr. Pitt saw its merits, and, under his auspices, an Act of Parliament was passed authorizing its adoption.

Mr. Palmer was appointed, under the title of Controller General of the Post Office, to superintend the carrying out of the scheme, at a salary of 1,500*l.* per annum, together with 2½ per cent. upon any excess in the net revenue over 240,000*l.*; and he appears to have performed his duties with great ability. The speed of the mails was at once increased from three and a half to more than six miles an hour, and subsequently still greater acceleration was effected.

This improvement, notwithstanding some additions to the rates of postage which accompanied it, caused a great immediate increase of correspondence as well as of revenue, which continued steadily to advance for many years afterwards.

In 1792 Mr. Palmer was suspended from his functions, and an allowance of 3,000*l.* a year (a sum much below the emoluments to which he was entitled under his agreement) was assigned to him in lieu thereof. He memorialised the Treasury against this arrangement, but without success. Subsequently however, he petitioned Parliament for redress, and in 1813, after a struggle of many years, a Parliamentary grant of 50,000*l.* was made to him.

In 1792 a Money Order Office was first set on foot; but as the history of this department has been given in the recent report of the Treasury Commissioners, it will suffice to say, that the conduct of it was originally undertaken by some of the Post Office Clerks on their own account, and that in 1838, it became a recognized branch of the establishment.

Owing to the high rate of commission formerly charged, and the double postage necessarily incurred, Money Orders were comparatively little used, until after the introduction of the Penny Postage. In 1840, the commission, however, was greatly reduced, and the facilities were extended; the result being a vast increase in the number of Orders. Thus in 1839 there were issued in the United Kingdom less than 190,000 Orders, amounting to about 313,000*l.*; while in 1854, as will appear in a subsequent part of the Report, the number of Orders had risen to nearly five millions and a half, and their amount in money to nearly 10,500,000*l.*

In 1796 the rates of Inland Postage were raised to a scale varying from 3*d.* to 9*d.* and they were afterwards raised still further.

In 1799 an Act was passed authorising the Postmaster General to send bags of letters by any private ships, such letters being subjected to half the packet rates. This is the origin of the ship-letter system, under which, besides the postal communication by regular packets, letters are conveyed to every part of the world visited by private ships.

In 1814 measures were taken to provide a new General Post Office, the old one in Lombard Street having become too small for the business to be transacted. It was not, however, till 1829 that the present building in St. Martin's le Grand was opened for use.

About the year 1818, Mr. Macadam's improved system of roadmaking began to be of great service to the Post Office, by enabling the mails to be much accelerated. Their speed was gradually increased to ten miles an hour and even more, until in the case of the Devonport Mail, the journey of 216 miles, including stoppages, was punctually performed in twenty-one hours and fourteen minutes.

In 1827 some concession was made to the public by rescinding the rule which imposed double postage on two letters written upon one sheet of paper, and even on a letter and a bill if upon the same sheet.

In 1830, upon the opening of the line between Liverpool and Manchester, the mails were for the first time conveyed by railway.

In 1835, by the indefatigable exertions of the late Lieutenant Waghorn, the mails to India were for the first time conveyed by the direct route, through the Mediterranean and over the Isthmus of Suez; a line of communication subsequently extended to China and Australia.

In 1836 the stamp duty on newspapers was reduced from about  $3\frac{1}{4}d.$  net to one penny, a reduction which led to a great increase in the number of newspapers sent through the Post Office.

Early in 1837 Mr. Rowland Hill broached his plan of Penny Postage, which, after an examination by a Royal Commission, and a full investigation by a Committee of the House of Commons, appointed on the motion of Mr. Wallace, M.P. for Greenock, was adopted by the Legislature in the session of 1839, and carried into effect in the beginning of the following year.

The effect of this change was to increase the number of chargeable letters passing through the Post Office from 76 millions in 1839 to nearly 169 millions in 1840, and the number has since continued to increase rapidly; as will hereafter appear.

Thus far we have, aided by the interesting "Historical Summary" of the First Report, sketched the rise and progress of the Post Office to its most important epoch—the introduction of the Penny Postage.

Mr. Rowland Hill's plan was submitted privately for the consideration of the Government, and appeared, in pamphlet form, under the title, Post Office Reform—Its Importance and Practicability—in the year 1837; in a few weeks three editions were sold.

Mr. Hill proposed to effect,—1, a great diminution in the rates of postage; 2, increased speed in the delivery of letters; and 3, more frequent opportunities for their despatch. He proposed that the rate of postage should be uniform, to be charged according to weight, and that the payment should be made in advance. The means of doing so by stamps were not suggested in the first edition of the pamphlet, and Mr. Hill states that this idea originated with Mr. Charles Knight. A uniform rate of a penny was to be charged for every letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, with an additional penny for each additional half-ounce. Mr. Hill showed, that the actual cost of conveying letters from London to Edinburgh, when divided among the letters actually carried, did not exceed one penny for thirty-six letters.

The publication of this plan immediately excited a strong public sympathy in its favor, and especially with the commercial classes of the city of London. Mr. Wallace moved for a select committee of the House of Commons to inquire into its merits, on the 9th May, 1837; but the motion fell to the ground. On the 30th May, 1837, Lord Ashburton, upon presenting a petition from some of the most eminent merchants, bankers, men of science, and others in the metropolis, to the House of Lords, spoke strongly in favor of the plan. In the December of the same year, the government assented to the appointment of a select committee of inquiry. A society of merchants was forthwith formed in the city of London to furnish evidence of the evils of the high rates of postage, and the insufficiency of the Post Office management in answering the wants of the present times. The subject began to excite much interest throughout the country. In the session of 1837, five petitions were presented to the House of Commons in favor of the plan. In 1838, upwards of three hundred and twenty were presented, of which number seventy-three emanated from town councils, and nineteen from chambers of commerce. After sitting upwards of sixty-three days, and examining Mr. Rowland Hill and eighty-three witnesses, besides the officers of the departments of the Post Office and the Excise and Stamp Offices, the committee presented a most elaborate report in favor of the whole plan, confirming by authentic and official data the conclusions which Mr. Hill had formed from very scanty and imperfect materials. The committee summed up a very long report, as follows:—

“The principal points which appear to your committee to have been established in evidence are the following:—

“The exceedingly slow advance, and occasionally retrograde movement, of the Post Office revenue during the period of the last twenty years. The fact of the charge of postage exceeding the cost in a manifold proportion. The fact of postage being evaded most extensively by all classes of society, and of correspondence being suppressed, more especially among the middle and working classes of the people, and this in consequence, as all the witnesses, including many of the Post Office authorities, think, of the excessively high scale of taxation. The fact of very injurious effects resulting from this state of things to the commerce and industry of the country, and to the social habits and moral condition of the people. The fact, so far as conclusions can be drawn from very imperfect data, that, whenever on former occasions large reductions in the rates have been made, those reductions have been followed in short periods of time by an extension of correspondence proportionate to the contraction of the rates.

“And as matter of inference from fact, and of opinion—

“That the only remedies for the evils above stated are, a reduction of the rates, and the establishment of additional deliveries, and more frequent despatches of letters.

“That, owing to the rapid extension of railroads, there is an urgent and daily increasing necessity for making such changes.

“That any moderate reduction in the rates would occasion loss to the revenue, without in any material degree diminishing the present amount of letters irregularly conveyed, or giving rise to the growth of new correspondence.

“That the principle of a low uniform rate is just in itself; and when combined with pre-payment, and collection by means of a stamp, would be exceedingly convenient, and highly satisfactory to the public.”

The appearance of the committee's report seemed to inspire the whole country with confidence in the plan. Petitions in its favor, amounting to 2000, were presented to both houses of parliament in the session of 1839. The late postmaster-general, the Duke of Richmond, advised the government to adopt it; and the chancellor of the exchequer brought forward a bill to enable the Treasury to carry the plan into effect, which was carried by a majority of 100 in the House of Commons, and passed into a law on the 17th August, 1839. In the following month an arrangement was made which secured Mr. Rowland Hill's superintendence of the working out of his own measure.

On the 5th of December, 1839, as a preparatory measure to accustom the department to the new practice of charging by weight, the inland rates of postage were reduced to a uniform charge of 4d. per half-ounce, except those which had previously passed at lower rates, which continued to be charged as before. The London District Post was reduced at the same time from 2d. and 3d. to 1d. On the 10th of January, 1840, the uniform rate of 1d. per half-ounce came into general operation, the scale of weight for letters advancing from a single rate for each of the first two half ounces, by an increase of 2d. per ounce, or for any fraction of an ounce, up to 16 ounces; the postage to be paid on posting the letter, or double postage to be charged. On this day parliamentary franking ceased. The use of stamps, which formed one of the means suggested by Mr. Rowland Hill for facilitating the despatch of letters, was introduced on the 6th of May.

Having worked earnestly and continuously, and with untiring zeal, Mr. Hill was most unjustly dismissed from his post, in 1843, by the Government. His cause was warmly supported by the public whom he has so widely benefited, and a public, or we should rather write, a national testimonial was presented to him in the year 1846, in the shape of a reward, amounting to, we believe, over £13,000.

Although the Government were unable to appreciate Mr. Hill's ability, a railway company was more clear-sighted, and he was engaged to manage the London and Brighton Line; and in 1854 the Government, recovering the use of its senses, once more secured his services, appointing him secretary to the Postmaster-General, the post long held by Colonel Maberly.

In the period from 1843 to 1854, during which Mr. Hill was unemployed by the Post Office, he was frequently entertained at public dinners; and the following speech, delivered by him at the dinner of the Liverpool Guardian Society, in 1847, is worthy of insertion here, as it is a declaration of his own views and hopes in connexion with his great and important measure of postal reform:—

Mr. Rowland Hill, on rising to address the company, was received with rapturous welcome: enthusiastic plaudits continuing for some time. He begged to thank Mr. Smith for the manner in which he had proposed, and the company at large for the manner in which they had received, the toast just given. He had done himself the pleasure of accepting the invitation with which the society had honoured him for several reasons. First, that he might in person, acknowledge the friendly interest the society had taken in what so much concerned himself; secondly, that he might explain the nature of the duties attaching to his present position, in connexion with the Post office; and above all, that he might investigate on the spot, those alleged defects in the postal arrangements of this locality, which had been so ably stated, from time to time, in the "Liverpool Mercury." It was a matter of personal convenience to himself, that his duties in the Post Office should be clearly understood, as the erroneous ideas which prevailed respecting them, had involved him in a correspondence, which occupied time which ought to be devoted to other objects. His duties were to advise the Postmaster General, on all points to which His Lordship might be pleased to direct his attention, and to carry out gradually the remainder of his own system of Post Office improvement, of which the penny rate was only one feature. Without a general understanding to this effect, he need scarcely say that he should not have felt justified in accepting office. (cheers). Of the management of the present details, he had no control whatever. But though a slight consideration would show that it was impossible that he could exercise any direct power in the Post Office, he had the good fortune to serve under a nobleman, who, with excellent business habits, united a thorough appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of his important office, and who was sincerely desirous of making the institution over which he presides, as useful to the public as possible. (cheers). He wished to convey to his hearers some idea of the magnitude of the institution. Were he merely to state that so many millions of letters passed through the Post Office in a year, no one could form any accurate conception of the reality. The best mode probably to convey any idea of the whole, would be for him to describe some part. For instance, last night, when he left London, he was at Euston-square when the Mail was brought in to go by the Train, this being only one of many, which are despatched by Railways. It was considered an exceedingly light Mail, but small as it was, it literally filled six large omnibuses; and the heavy Mails, forwarded on a Saturday night, filled nine carriages of a similar description; again, the number of dead letters since the adoption of prepayment had become a very small fraction less than the two-hundredth part of the whole; nevertheless, the average amount of money found in such letters, in coin, bank notes, and bills of exchange, was £400,000 per annum. (hear, hear). Many thousands of pounds were actually found in letters with no address whatever. (laughter). The company would see, therefore, that in so vast a machine, the difficulties in the way of any extensive change, were very great. Another difficulty was, that the machine was constantly in motion; it never stood still night or day, and the greatest care, forethought, and calculation were therefore necessary in making alterations. In improving, it would not do to make a mistake, that might stop it altogether; they could rarely try an experiment; all must be investigated and settled with unerring certainty beforehand. If a steam engine became defective, it could be stopped, and the requisite repairs made; but not so with the Post Office. He wished the society to bear these facts in mind, and to continue to him some portion of that great confidence which they had hitherto reposed in him, assuring them, that so far as he was concerned, no time should be lost in carrying out the remaining portions of his plan. (cheers). With reference to the peculiar defects in this neighbourhood, he had not the requisite local knowledge, to say that all could be remedied, but he thought he had heard enough to justify him in saying, that there was much room for improvement; there were reasons for adhering to some existing arrangements, which, no doubt, appeared injudicious. It might seem to many absurd that letters should be carried past a town for which they were intended, and then brought back, but it was not really absurd. It arose from the impossibility of every town making up a bag for every other town. There were about one thousand Post towns, and if every one of these made up one thousand bags, there would be a million of bags, in fact more bags than letters.* It had often struck him that some pains should be taken to make the main features of the Post Office system intelligible to the people. There was no department of Government which came so much into contact with the people, and it was advisable that they should know what arrangements were capable of improvement, and what were not. His desire had ever been, in all the difficulties and opposition with which he had to struggle, to do justice to the institution, and he was happy to be able to say, that even before he went to the Post Office, instructions had been sent to the surveyors to make certain returns with reference to the distribution in this neighbourhood; though owing to the many other duties they had to perform, these returns had not yet been made. (hear, hear). Perhaps it might be interesting to the company to revert to a few facts connected with the change produced by the plan of penny postage. (cheers). Immediately before the introduction of the reduced rate of postage, the number of chargeable letters, not including franks, delivered, amounted to seventy-five millions annually. Last year it had amounted to two hundred and ninety-nine millions and a half, or to four-fold the original number. It would require something more than that to bring the Post Office Revenue up to the former gross amount; but less than five-fold would effect that object. At the present moment the number of letters delivered in the London district, comprising a circle of a radius of twelve miles round the Post Office in St. Martin's Le Grand, was quite as great as that which, under the old system, was delivered in the whole United Kingdom. The increase was rapidly going on, and amounted to twenty-eight millions each year, as compared with the previous year. It was the opinion of many gentlemen, that the introduction of the penny rate increased the difficulty of effecting improvements. It was said they could not afford to give cheap postage, and greater facilities also; but, in fact, improvements had followed one another more rapidly since the penny postage came into operation than before. When the plan was first proposed, the large towns had only a single Mail connecting them with London; now they have two Mails per day. Again, in England and Wales, there were formerly only two thousand Post Offices of every kind; now there were four thousand. There was a growing conviction in the minds of all connected with the Post Office, that, * These observations were meant by Mr. Hill to apply to Sub-Posts only.—Ed.

to make the establishment profitable, they must make it as useful as possible, and to that great object, his best efforts should be devoted. Mr. Hill concluded amidst great cheering.

The results of this system are worthy of note. In the year 1839, before its introduction, the estimated number of letters delivered in England and Wales was 59,962,520; in Ireland, 8,301,904; in Scotland, 7,623,148; total for the United Kingdom, 75,907,572. In the same year the total number of franks for England was 3,172,284; for Ireland, 1,054,508; for Scotland, 336,232; for the United Kingdom, 6,563,024; giving a total of paid and franked letters amounting to 82,470,596. The gross revenue for the same year amounted to £2,346,278 0s. 9½d.; the cost of management was £686,768 3s. 6¾d.; the net revenue was £1,659,509 17s. 2¼d.

In the year 1841, after the introduction of the Penny Postage, the number of letters delivered in England and Wales amounted to 154,471,121; total for Ireland, 20,794,297; total for Scotland, 21,234,772; total for United Kingdom, 196,500,191. The gross revenue for 1841 was £1,359,466 9s. 2d.; the cost of management, £858,677 0s. 5¼d.; net revenue, £500,789 8s. 8¾d.

In 1855 the total number of letters delivered in England and Wales was 368,530,340, being an increase of 23 per cent. on 1854; in Ireland, 41,832,834, being an increase of 1½ per cent. on 1854; in Scotland, 45,853,002, being an increase of 4 per cent. on 1854; in the United Kingdom, 456,216,176, being an increase of 2¾ per cent. on 1854. In 1855 the gross revenue was £2,716,420 0s. 4½d.; the cost of management, £1,651,364; net revenue, £1,065,056 0s. 3¼d.

In the London District Post 23,108,722 letters were delivered in 1841; in 1855 the number had risen to 45,844,963.

In 1841 the number of letters delivered from country offices in England and Wales was 103,395,477; and in 1855 the number was 263,037,827.

In 1841 the London, Ireland, foreign and ship letters were 27,966,722; in 1855 they were 59,647,549.

From these figures the reader will be able to comprehend the vast benefit conferred by Mr. Hill upon his country; and we now proceed to show the present position of the Post Office, condensing the information from the two Reports before us:—

As at present constituted, the British Post Office has, with few exceptions, an exclusive authority to convey letters within the United Kingdom. It is also required to convey newspapers; and it undertakes the conveyance of books and the remittance of small sums of money; but it is only as regards letters that the Office possesses any privilege, the other branches of its business being open to any persons who may choose to undertake them.

By means of the railways, and of steam boats, mail coaches, stage coaches, omnibuses, mail carts, and mounted and foot messengers, letters and other postal packets are despatched and received daily in almost every part of the country,* and in many cases, including nearly all important towns, the communication is twice a day or oftener; and by packets or private ships, mails are despatched at short intervals to all parts of the globe.

Subject to the provisions of the law, and to the controlling authority of your Lordships, and except that the Packet Service is, to a large extent, superintended by the Admiralty, the Postmaster General has the direction of all postal affairs within the United Kingdom and in certain of the Colonies; also between this country and the Colonies, and with a large number of foreign states. At the same time, it is open to all the Colonies in which the posts are under the management of the Colonial Government (and this is the case with the most wealthy and important) and to all foreign countries, to take part in this inter-communication; and as the cost of the mails carried by sea generally much exceeds the revenue derived from them, this country would be financially benefited if the part so taken were much larger than it is.

In the United Kingdom the Lords of the Treasury have power, within limits prescribed by law, to fix the rates of postage; and the Postmaster General has authority to determine the frequency and speed with which the mails shall be conveyed and letters delivered.

The number of officers and servants of the Department, exclusive of 171 in the colonies, and of agents in foreign countries, is as follows:—

Postmaster General . . . . .	1
Secretary, Assistant Secretaries, and Secretaries for Ireland and Scotland }	5
Surveyors . . . . .	13
Other Superior Officers; i. e. Heads of Departments, Chief Clerks, &c. }	17

Guards . . . . .	180
Letter-carriers, Messengers, &c. . . . .	10,314
	<hr/> 22,547

* In Scotland there are about 45 posts, limited to three days in the week, and in Ireland about 12. In Scotland there are also about 11 posts limited to two days in the week.

† This number is exclusive of persons whose time is partially occupied in the service of the Department, but who are not regularly appointed officers, being engaged at the discretion of the Postmasters, to whom an allowance is made for that purpose.

Of the above staff about 2,800 are attached to the Chief Office in London.

Last year [1855] the number of Post Offices in the United Kingdom was increased by 525, making the whole present number 10,498. Of these 920 are Head Post Offices, and 9,578 Sub-Post Offices, or Receiving Offices.

Further progress has been made in revising the postal arrangements of the rural districts. It is in these districts that many of the new Offices have been opened, and much additional accommodation has been afforded by the appointment of rural messengers, who collect and distribute letters at places too small to warrant the establishment of a Post Office.

In addition to these extensions of the system many pillar letter boxes have been put up, and have been found to afford much public accommodation. One advantage they afford is that collections can be made from them at hours when it would not be reasonable to expect any but regular Postmasters to be on duty.

The experimental use of pillar letter boxes having fully succeeded, I intend soon largely to increase their number, especially in London.

Free deliveries were established last year at 1,327 places where none had formerly existed; and at 649 other places the free delivery was extended or otherwise improved.

Experience having confirmed the advantages to be derived from the use of travelling Post Offices, several additional offices of this kind have been provided. Much greater use also has been made of the apparatus for exchanging Mail bags on railways.

Exclusive of conveyance by steam-vessels and boats, and not counting the walks of letter-carriers and rural messengers, or the carriage of the Mails from Post Offices to railway stations, the whole distance over which Mails are now conveyed within the United Kingdom is nearly 59,000 miles per week day, being about 2,000 miles more than at the end of 1854. This increase is wholly in railway conveyance. It will be seen, however, by the subjoined table, that more than half the duty is still performed by coaches and Mail carts.

The following table shows the number of chargeable letters delivered in the United Kingdom during the last year, with the rate of increase, and the proportion of letters to population.*

As compared with last year this number shows an increase of 13 millions; and as compared with the last year before the introduction of the Penny Postage (1839), an increase of 380 millions, or exactly six-fold.

During the last five years the rate of increase in letters as compared in each case with the number in the preceding year, has been as follows:—

1851 - - - -	4

The number of Valentines passing through the Post Office every year, as shown by the increase in the number of letters in Valentine week, is upwards of 800,000. The largest proportion is in England and Scotland, and in both these parts of the kingdom the number is increasing, but in Ireland it is on the decrease.

Of the whole number of letters nearly a quarter are delivered in London and the suburban district; and counting those also which are despatched, nearly half the letters pass through the London Office.

The number of letters given in the foregoing statements includes colonial and foreign as well as inland letters; though even in the aggregate the colonial and foreign letters delivered in the United Kingdom form but a small fraction, not more than about one fiftieth, of the whole number of letters.

Of the increase of 13 millions last year in the number of letters,

* This table is to some extent an estimate, being the result of a calculation founded on a record of the actual number of letters delivered in one week of each month in the year. At page 56 in the Appendix will be found a statement of the number of letters in each year since 1838.

about 300,000 were in letters from Australia; about 150,000 in letters from the East Indies; about 70,000 from Canada; about 340,000 from France; and about 340,000 also from Prussia; owing chiefly in the latter case to the letters from our fleet in the Baltic coming through Prussia.

In the letters from the United States there was a decrease of more than 500,000, owing probably to the diminished frequency of postal communication caused by the withdrawal, for the purposes of war, of some of the mail packets. The increase in the number of letters from Canada might seem scarcely consistent with such explanation; since the less frequency of postal communication applied to both cases. In that of Canada, however, there was a large reduction in the rate of postage, while there was no such reduction as respects the United States.

Reference was made in the last Report to the large number of letters passing between our soldiers on the shores of the Black Sea and their families and friends at home; but great as was the number in 1854, it was still greater last year, as will be seen by the following Table; which is exclusive of ship letters and of letters from persons engaged in the Transport Service:—

LETTERS viâ FRANCE.

Year.	To the Army and Navy.	From the Army and Navy.	Total to and from the Army and Navy.
8 months, 1854 -	282,000	325,000	607,000
12 months, 1855 -	762,858	1,198,853	1,961,711

Thus it appears that last year, through France alone, nearly two millions of letters passed between the people of this country and Her Majesty's Army and Navy in the East; a number greater than that which passed during the same time between the United Kingdom and the East Indies or Australia, or any foreign country, except France, and the United States; the inhabitants of these latter countries, with the English families residing there, being the only people who last year exchanged with us a larger number of letters than our Army and Navy in the East.

With reference to the number of returned, mis-sent, or re-directed letters, Mr. Scudamore, Chief Examiner in the Receiver and Accountant General's Office, makes, in his able Report, the following statement:—"In the year 1838 the postage on returned, mis-sent, and re-directed letters, amounted to  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the gross revenue of the Post Office of Great Britain. In the year 1841 (the second after the adoption of Penny Postage) it had fallen to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; in the year 1852 it had fallen to one per cent., and in the year ending 31st March, 1855, it was only three quarters per cent. on the gross revenue of the Post Office of Great Britain for that year. It is but fair to say, that the reduction in the number of returned, mis sent, and re-directed letters, is mainly due to the improvement of the system, though it may be due partly to the increased intelligence of the writers, and partly to the fact, that letters are not now (the days of heavy postage) written merely to be looked at, and refused by the parties to whom they are addressed."

Last year the number of returned letters, that is, of letters which were sent to the Dead Letter Office, and returned to the writers, in consequence of the attempts to deliver them having failed, was nearly 2,400,000, or about one-half per cent. on the whole number of letters posted.

The number of newspapers sent to the Dead Letter Office last year was nearly 600,000.

The population in the Colonies being more scattered and less settled than that of the mother country, the proportion of returned letters there appears to be much greater than with us. Especially does this seem to be the case in Victoria; for while the whole number of letters sent to that Colony last year was about 350,000, more than 42,000, or about 12 per cent., were returned, as undelivered and unclaimed. This is the more remarkable, as nearly 40,000 of the letters had been pre-paid, and nearly 1,500 had even been registered.

Of nearly 2,000,000 letters sent to the United States last year, more than 103,000, or about five per cent., were returned; but these the great majority had been posted unpaid.

Of about 2,300,000 letters sent to France last year, 37,000, or about one and a half per cent., were returned; about two-thirds of these having been posted unpaid.

The proportion of letters sent in envelopes is still increasing, and is now, as respects Inland letters, as much as 93 per cent.; and even in the case of Colonial and Foreign letters, 71 per cent.

Excluding official packets, the average weight of an Inland letter or packet paying the full letter rate, is between a quarter and a third of an ounce; that of a Colonial letter rather more than a third of an ounce; and that of a Foreign letter rather less than a quarter of an ounce.

The abolition of the stamp duty on newspapers, and the substitution of a postage charge, have caused a decrease of about one-fourth the number of newspapers posted; nevertheless (retransmissions included,) there are still posted about 71 millions of newspapers per annum, or nearly 200,000 every day. Of these much the largest portion still bear the impressed stamp.

It appears by information obtained from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that about 93,000*l.* was received between the 30th June last (when the compulsory newspaper stamp was abolished) and the 31st December, for impressed stamps to enable newspapers to pass free through the post; and during the same time about 25,000*l.* was received for postage labels employed for the same purpose. These sums, which together amount to about 118,000*l.* for the half-year, or to 236,000*l.* for a year, show a loss, as compared with the amount of the former newspaper stamp duty, of about 242,000*l.*; or of rather more than one half.

The average weight of the newspapers which pass through the Post office is now about three ounces each; this average having decreased, since the abolition of the newspaper stamp, by about half an ounce.

The number of book packets, exclusive of newspapers, which now pass through the London Office, is at the rate of about 1,400,000 per annum, being an increase of more than a million, or of 273 per cent. on the number in 1854. Concurrently, however, with this increase in number, there has been a decrease in the average weight per packet, from ten ounces to four and a half ounces; so that the increase in the total weight is less than 70 per cent.

To a considerable extent the book packets consist of tradesmen's circulars and catalogues; which, when more than half an ounce in weight, can now be forwarded most cheaply as book packets. This term is used to comprehend all printed matter, except newspapers bearing an impressed stamp.

As already stated, about half the letters of the whole kingdom pass through the London Office. As London is the chief place of publication, it is probable that a yet larger portion of the book packets pass through this Office; but, assuming the proportion to be the same as with letters, the whole number of book packets posted in the United Kingdom is now at the rate of about 3,000,000 per annum.

The great increase in number is chiefly attributable to a large reduction in postage made last summer; the present charge being only one penny for four ounces; but in part also to the extension of the Inland Book Post to the British Forces engaged in the war, and to the Foreign Legion stationed at Heligoland.

Including five branches in large towns, 63 new Money Order Offices were opened last year, making a total of 1,935.

Ten years ago there were only 1,280 Money Order Offices in the United Kingdom.

The subjoined tables show the number of Money Orders issued during the year, with other particulars.*

* In order to avoid the delay which is necessary for completing, in all particulars, the financial accounts of the year, the sums given in this Report, whether relating to Money Orders or to the General Revenue and Expenditure, are, in part, the result of estimate; but it is believed that any error which may exist is so slight as to be scarcely appreciable. At page 59 in the Appendix is a statement of the number of Money Orders issued in each year since 1839.

It appears that while the number of Orders issued in Ireland has increased, the number paid in Ireland has diminished; also, that the Orders granted in Ireland are generally for larger sums than heretofore.

These facts afford additional evidence of the greater facilities now existing in that part of the empire for obtaining lucrative employment, and of the consequently diminished tendency to seek employment in England.

Increased facilities have been afforded for obtaining Money Orders by dispensing with certain precautions which experience has shown to be unnecessary.

How far it may be owing to these greater facilities I cannot say; but it appears that the number of Money Orders issued in the last quarter of 1855 was not only greater than that in any previous quarter of this or any other year, but showed a more rapid rate of increase than at any previous time.

In the latter part of the year arrangements were made for extending the Money Order system to our Army in the East, so as to give our soldiers a ready means of sending money to their families; but as yet there has scarcely been time for remittances to arrive.*

Arrangements have also been made, and will shortly come into operation, for enabling all sailors on foreign service to send money

* March 17th. The system has now been in operation about eight weeks, and the money received in this country already amounts to more than 13,000*l*.

home by means of Money Orders obtainable through the paymaster of the ship in which each man may be serving.

So great has been the increase of Money Order business at some towns, that at Liverpool nearly twice as many Orders were issued and paid in the single month of December last, as in the whole of the year 1840, while at Birmingham the corresponding increase is even fourfold.

One-tenth part of all the Money Order payments in England and Wales in December last was made at the Chief Office in London.

A curious illustration of the pertinacity of a careless habit in individuals is afforded by the fact, that while of the ordinary class of Money Orders issued, only 1 in 837 is allowed to lapse from neglect in presentation, nevertheless, of those orders which, though being too late in the first instance, are renewed for a certain period on the payment of a second commission, 1 in 39 is again overlooked and allowed to lapse.

In concluding his report, Mr. Jackson, the Controller of the Money Order Office, states as follows:—

"With reference to the alterations in the system of Money Order accounts recommended by the Commissioners, and which commenced 1st January, 1855, I beg to say that they have been fully carried out, and it is with much pleasure I am enabled to state they have in every respect answered; and although these changes have been accompanied by a steady and constant increase in the business of the Office, the work has proceeded most satisfactorily."

The alteration in the system of accounts referred to by Mr. Jackson, dispensed with the labour of 21 clerks, and this after previous simplifications originating in the department, which had produced a saving of labour equal to that of 75 clerks.

Owing, however, to the constantly increasing business of the Department, improvement, even when it economises labour, is not attended with the painful duty of discarding officers. The difficulty is met by simply omitting to fill up vacancies.

So far as the test of time has yet been applied, the new system of appointment and promotion recommended by the Treasury Commissioners—concurrent in by my predecessor, and adopted by your Lordships about a year and a half ago,—has operated very beneficially; so beneficially indeed, that the Commissioners are entitled to the gratitude of the whole Department; and I may add that indirectly they have conferred an important benefit on the country at large.

Complaints have, indeed, been made, notwithstanding the liberal manner in which the change was effected; but many of these complaints have come from persons who, under the present improved plan of appointment, would never have been admitted into the service, and whose withdrawal would certainly be a great relief. Still, as it would be cruel to dismiss them, however unfortunate may have been their original appointment, I purpose to retain them in the service, excepting of course any that may forfeit their claim to consideration by misconduct.

In some instances, voluntary resignation has followed the loss of all hope of obtaining preferment except by merit.

Erroneous reports having appeared in some of the newspapers regarding the London letter-carriers, I have inserted in the Appendix a copy of the reply which under my directions was made by the Controller of the Circulation department to such of the letter-carriers as signed the memorial respecting alleged grievances.

The general effect of the new system has been greater energy and increased efficiency.

In the Circulation Department there has not yet been time to give the new arrangements (which involve a reconstruction of the classes according to qualification and efficiency) a fair trial: but the following statements will shew the working of the system in other departments:—

Mr. Scudamore, Chief Examiner in the Receiver and Accountant General's office, addressing the head of his department, says, "The Cashier and the Book-keeper have desired me to add to my own their expressions of satisfaction with the conduct of the officers in our respective branches. Last year your attention was drawn to the officers employed in the examination of Postmasters' accounts and to the great mass of work performed by them, and also by the officers in the Book-keepers' branch. It is needless for me to add that the same amount of work is still performed by them; but I wish to direct your attention to certain items of the work performed in the Expenditure branch and in the Cashier's branch.

"In the expenditure branch upwards of 13,000 Payment Warrants (exclusive of Salary Warrants) and each having a corresponding account, were prepared and issued in the year 1855.

"In the Cashier's branch upwards of 118,000 remittance letters were received from Postmasters in the year 1855, being an increase of about 10,000 on the letters of the previous year.

"It is, of course, well known to you that the amount of money which passes through the Expenditure and Cash branches of this office on Revenue and Money Order account is quite independent of the Gross Revenue of the Post Office, and that changes which do not increase the Revenue, but only hasten the collection of it, very greatly increase the work of this office.

"As an evidence of the amount of work performed in certain branches of your Office, and of the increased activity of those who collect and distribute the Revenue, I will add, that in the year 1854 there passed through your Office, on Revenue and Money Order accounts, upwards of 4,685,000*l.*, and in the year 1855 upwards of 4,986,000*l.*, being an increased circulation of 301,000*l.*"

Mr. Jackson, Controller of the Money Order Office in London, states:—"My own endeavours have been ably seconded by those of my chief clerk and the first-class clerks; and indeed the whole body of officers have shown the utmost zeal and industry throughout the year. Much good has already arisen, and I feel confident the best results may be expected from the present admirable system of promotion, which so fully provides for the advancement of those who merit it, and there can be no doubt that the preliminary examination to which candidates are subjected, has supplied a more efficient class of probationary clerks than was the case previously."

Mr. Long, Accountant in the Dublin Office, reports:—"I am strongly of opinion that the efficiency of this Department under the present arrangements, will permit hereafter an increase of business to be performed without an addition being made to its present force."

In a subsequent part of his report Mr. Long speaks more specifically of the good results of the plan of probation before appointment, of the re-arrangements of the classes according to efficiency, of an augmentation of the salaries, and of the adoption of the principle of promotion by merit.

Mr. Lang, Controller of the Circulation Department in the Edinburgh Office, states:—"It affords me satisfaction to be able to add, that the revision of this Department, which took place in April last, has been attended with success and manifest advantage to the public service. Also, that the system of promotion by merit, then introduced, has animated officers of all grades with a measure of zeal which has contributed greatly to their efficiency."

Of 22 candidates for Clerkships in the London Office, last year, 11 were, on examination, appointed, and 11 were rejected; and of 8 candidates in Dublin, 4 were appointed and 4 rejected.

Of 431 candidates for the situation of Letter Carrier in London, 313 were appointed and 118 rejected; and there was a similar proportion in Dublin; but in Edinburgh the proportion of rejections was larger, although the examination there is not at all more strict.

The arrangement for allowing provincial Postmasters to appoint their own Clerks having been found to work satisfactorily, in securing the selection of better qualified officers, and rendering it practicable and just to hold the Postmasters to a higher degree of responsibility, it is my intention to take another step in the same direction, by giving to the Postmasters of the larger towns the choice of their Letter Carriers.

Before the appointment of any Clerk under this arrangement is confirmed, the Postmaster is required to make a written report on the candidate's age, character, and qualifications, accompanied with a specimen of his writing and power of calculation, together with a medical certificate respecting his health and constitution; and I shall lay down a similar regulation with regard to Letter Carriers. As respects both provincial Clerks and Letter Carriers also, I intend to make the appointment, in the first instance, probationary only, to depend for ultimate confirmation on the receipt of a satisfactory report at the end of six months; as is the case in the Metropolitan Offices.

The Letter Carriers, in several of the larger provincial towns, have been dressed in uniform, like those in London; an alteration which has been found not only to promote their general comfort, but to prevent loitering and neglect of duty.

The revision of the offices in Edinburgh and Dublin, and at Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, and Glasgow, mentioned in the First Annual Report, has been carried into effect; and similar revisions have been completed at Bath, Birmingham, Gateshead, Hull, Nottingham, Plymouth, Sheffield, and other towns. Considerable progress also has been made in revising the other chief provincial Post Offices.

In accordance with the rule that experience had shown to be necessary in the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, it is now a regulation of the Post Office that no person in its service shall make an application for increase of salary or promotion, except through his immediate Official Superior; with a provision, however, that if an officer have good ground for believing that his application has not been duly considered, he may write direct to the Postmaster General.

Officers who infringe this rule will be liable to punishment. It is most important in every way to make the officers of the department feel that they must rely entirely on their own exertions and merits for advancement, and that no interest, except that which is felt in a deserving man by those charged with his superintendence, will be of any avail.

Early last year it was determined to appoint, as a regular officer of the department, a medical gentleman to take charge of the health of the large number of Letter Carriers attached to the Chief Office to examine candidates for admission to the service, and to perform other medical duties. I know that it was Lord Canning's intention to nominate to this office Dr. Gavin, whose assiduity and success in the performance of similar duties during the cholera epidemic of 1854, were spoken of in the last report; and this intention would have been acted upon but for Dr. Gavin's untimely death whilst on temporary absence to assist in the organization of the military hospitals in the East. The post was subsequently conferred on Dr. Waller Lewis, a gentleman who, like Dr. Gavin, had given much previous attention to the means of improving the sanitary condition of large bodies of men.

Dr. Lewis' first periodical Report will be found in the Appendix and your Lordships will be glad to perceive that the general health of the officers since his appointment has on the whole been very satisfactory; although he is of opinion that there are causes in existence, particularly such as relate to the condition of the dwellings of many of the Letter Carriers, which prevent the health from being so good as it might be.*

The general freedom from disease which seems to be enjoyed by the occupants of the model houses that have been erected in the last few years, affords ground for hoping that immunity from sickness to a similar extent might be enjoyed by the Letter Carriers if their dwellings were equally good; an object which might in some degree be attained by the erection in the neighbourhood of the Post Office of suitable buildings, available, on the payment of a moderate rent, to such of the Letter Carriers as might desire to live there.

Such an arrangement would be beneficial to the men, not only by affording them better dwellings, but by saving their time and labour in walking to and from the Office ; while to the Department much convenience would be given by the opportunity of speedily summoning an increased force on the arrival of any large Mail from abroad.

* The chief illness was diarrhoea, and rheumatism. Of 2,000 officers, 986 were attended, Total deaths, 8. Of these 5 were from Phthisis, 1 from disease of the heart, 1 from dropsy, 1 from softening of the brain.

I do not propose that such buildings should be put up and maintained at the cost of Government, as I think the undertaking is more suitable to a public company ; but the Department might afford aid by securing to the company its rents, deducting the same from the wages of such Letter Carriers as become tenants.

Reference was made in the last Report to some measures which had been taken (by payments of part of the premiums) for encouraging the officers of the Department to insure their lives. This measure has proved very acceptable, and many have already availed themselves of it, as will be seen by the following extract from the Report on the Receiver and Accountant-General's Department :—

It is difficult to determine how many of these insurances were effected in consequence of the aid given by the Department (equal to one-fifth part of the whole premium), but it is believed that about one third of the policies in England and Scotland are due to this aid, and about one-half in Ireland.

It had been the practice among the General Post Letter Carriers on the death of any one of their number, to make a collection to pay the cost of the funeral, and to furnish the widow with a temporary fund for the support of the family. The contributions were £2s. from each man, according to seniority, every one being expected to give with reference partly to the time he had been in the service and partly to the official age of the deceased Letter Carrier.

The sum thus raised on the death of a Letter Carrier varied generally from about 25*l.* to 45*l.*; but owing to the union of the two corps of Letter Carriers, an apprehension arose that the collection of "funeral money" would gradually fall into disuse, consequently that the families of those who might continue to contribute would reap no benefit.

Under these circumstances my predecessor received a memorial from the General Post Letter Carriers, asking for assistance in the support of a fund to which many of them had long contributed, which they had looked forward to as a means of affording relief to their families at their death.

On examination it was found that if, instead of engaging to pay funeral money, each of the memorialists, when he entered the service, had insured his life, even for 50*l.*, in some regularly constituted Insurance Office, he would not have had to pay more in the form of premium than he had had to contribute in funeral money; while his position would have been safe from all danger such as that which had given rise to the memorial.

Proceeding on this fact, Lord Canning gave directions that every Letter Carrier who had hitherto paid funeral money, should be permitted to insure his life for 50*l.* in a regular Office, on the understanding that the difference between the rate of premium which would then have to pay, as compared with what would have been demanded at the time he entered the service, should be defrayed by the Department; the money to be taken from the fund which the Lordships had kindly placed at the disposal of the Postmaster General for promoting life insurances.

I am glad to be able to state that about 300 Letter Carriers included in the preceding table, have thankfully availed themselves of Lord Canning's offer, and are in course of completing their insurances.

The following are statements of the Gross Receipts, Expenditure, and Net Revenue, of the Department during the year 1855.—

GROSS REVENUE.

Letters, Book Packets, &amp;c. :		£	£
England	- - -	2,244,000	} 2,620,000
Ireland	- - -	189,000

Commission on Money Orders :		£
England	- - -	83,000	} 97,000
Ireland	- - -	7,000
Scotland	- - -	7,000
Total		- -	£2,717,000

This sum shows an apparent increase of 15,000*l.* on the Gross Revenue for 1854, which was estimated at 2,689,000*l.*, but which actually reached 2,702,000. Virtually, however, the receipts in 1855, instead of being larger than those of 1854, were somewhat less.

The discrepancy is thus explained; until last year the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under whose direction the Postage Labels and Stamped Envelopes are manufactured, paid over to this Department only the net produce of the Stamps and Envelopes after deducting the cost of paper and manufacture; but now our accounts are on the one hand credited with the gross produce, and on the other hand are debited with the expense of paper and manufacture.

As compared with the year 1854, the gross revenue of 1855 is further increased by an addition, for the first time, of a charge for the conveyance of Newspapers.

As already stated, the greater portion of this charge is received for impressed Stamps by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and is not brought into the Post Office accounts; but that which is collected for Postage Labels, amounting to between a fourth and a fifth of the whole (being about 25,000*l.* out of about 118,000*l.* for the half-year since the abolition of the Newspaper Stamp), is carried to the Postal Revenue, and forms part of the foregoing sum of 2,717,000*l.*

The virtual diminution in the Gross Revenue of the Post Office, notwithstanding the addition just named, and the increase of letters, is thus explained:—

1st. The diminished number of English Mail Packets between this country and the United States last year, owing to the war, not only reduced the correspondence, but transferred a large portion of the remainder from the British to the American Packets; thus causing a decrease of not less than 85,000*l.* in our share of the postage; to which must be added about 16,000*l.* for loss caused in the same way, in the receipts for letters to Canada.

2nd. Notwithstanding the increase in the number of letters to France, consequent on the reduction of postage, already referred to, there was in this branch also a loss last year of more than 19,000*l.*; but I think it not impossible that this loss will quickly diminish, and that before many years have passed, the amount of French postage may be as large as before.

I entertain similar expectations also, and a yet speedier realization, with regard to the recent reduction in Colonial postage; and am supported in these expectations by the results already arrived at.

Total	...	...	...	£1,591,

The sum, after deducting 32,000*l.* for the manufacture of Post Stamps, (an item which, as already explained, appears in the account for the first time,) shows an apparent increase on the expenditure of 1854 of 146,000*l.*; but £28,000 of this is owing to the circumstance of the charge for railway conveyance in the year 1854 not having included sums which, while really belonging to that year's expenditure, were not paid till the year had closed. In the account for 1855, however, the sum stated shows, as nearly as can be ascertained, the real expense incurred without regard to the time of payment, and this course will be adopted in all future accounts.

Thus corrected, the actual increase in expenditure last year compared with that for 1854, was about £118,000, or about 8 per cent.

The following have been the chief causes of increased expenditure :—

1st. An increase in the number of Sorters and Letter Carriers at the London Office, required chiefly on account of the holiday allowed to these men; the adoption of a higher scale of salaries for Sorters and Letter Carriers; and an enlargement of the pension granted to these officers in old age.

* The entries under this head show the expenditure properly accruing to the year, not the payments actually made.

† The Packet service is for the most part under the superintendence of the Admiralty, and is borne on the expenditure of that Department. The Contractors for the several lines being subject, in most cases, to conditions framed with other objects than the efficiency of the postal service. The above sum does not include the payments made by the Admiralty.

The omission in the expenditure of the Post Office of such part of the cost of these Packets as may fairly be chargeable to that Department is more or less counterbalanced by the omission (under the head of revenue) of the charge for the transmission (inland) of stamped newspapers.

2dly. An addition to the salaries of most other officers in the London Office, resulting from the more general provision of an annual augmentation made in the scale of salaries recommended by the Treasury Commissioners.

3dly. The revision, as already mentioned, of the Post Offices in Dublin and Edinburgh, and of some of the larger provincial towns. This revision is not yet complete, but it has already had the effect of increasing the number of Clerks and Letter Carriers, and of raising the salaries of many who were already in the service; producing in the aggregate an enlarged annual expence of about 32,000*l.*; to which sum must be added about 5,000*l.* for uniforms, supplied, for the first time, to the Letter Carriers in Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, Bristol, and Birmingham, and to a certain class of Letter Carriers in London.

4thly. Increased use of Railways, accelerations of Mails, and enlarged Postal accommodation generally; amounting in annual cost to more than 20,000*l.*

5thly. Increased expense of the Army Post Office.

In the last Report it was stated that there would probably be a very considerable increase in the expenditure of the year 1855 as compared with that of 1854; and I expect a further considerable increase in 1856.

The following tables may prove interesting to some of our readers:—

‡ Including 159,906*l.* for postage charged to Government Department.

From this condensation of the chief topics of the two Reports before us, the reader is now enabled to form a very just opinion upon, and has a perfect knowledge of, the rise, progress, and position of the Post Office.

It is satisfactory to find that foreign countries are improving in postal arrangements, and we find the following passages in the second Report, the information contained in it thus being derived from the most accurate and well informed sources :—

The countries referred to are 32 in number. Of these there are only two, viz., Sweden and Equator, in which no material improvement has been made since the introduction of Penny Postage into the United Kingdom in 1840.

In Russia, Spain, and Chili the lowest rate (which is generally applicable to the great majority of letters) has been reduced to sums above twopence but not exceeding fourpence ; in seven other countries, viz., France, United States, Bavaria, Hanover, Portugal, Sardinia, and Brazil, the lowest rate has been reduced to sums above a penny but not exceeding twopence ; and in Belgium and Denmark it has been brought down to a penny, though in Belgium this rate is confined to distances not exceeding 19 miles.

In the United States the postage for distances of 3,000 miles and under is 1½d. ; and for greater distances, 3d.

In twenty-three countries Postage Stamps have been introduced.

In two, viz., Russia and Brazil, prepayment of postage is compulsory.

In twelve, prepayment, though not compulsory, is encouraged ; the postage, when not prepaid, being greater.

In eighteen, the gross receipts of the Post Office are now at least equal to what they were before the reduction ; and in two others, the amount is nearly the same.

In three, the profits are nearly as large as before the reduction, and in nine the former amount has been fully regained.

In most of the countries embraced in this Return, the Post Office undertakes the conveyance of Passengers as well as of Mails ; and the receipts, expenses, and profits, arising from Passengers, are generally mixed with those relating to letters, and are consequently included in the sums entered in the column headed "Gross Receipts, Expenses, and Profits of the Post Office ;" it not having been found practicable to state them separately.

Again, in some instances, a large expense is incurred in the delivery of letters ; while in others, as in that of the United States, the Post Office does not undertake the delivery.

Moreover, in some countries, as in France, the conveyance of the Mails by railway is attended with little cost to the Post Office, in consideration, probably, of assistance given by the Government in the construction of railways ; while in others, the Post Office has to bear the full expense.

These circumstances render it very difficult to trace with accuracy the financial result of a reduction in postage, or to institute any trustworthy comparison between the receipts, expenses, and profits of the Post Offices of different countries.

In the Appendices to these two Reports there is much interesting and amusing matter. Two letters from Mr. Scudamore, of the Receiver and Accountant-General's Office, are particularly interesting.

From these documents we learn that the general accounts of the Post Office are preserved in an unbroken line from 1685 to the present. The net produce of the year 1687 was £76,192 8s. 9d.; and the total expense was £13,509 6s. Thus we find that while the "whole net produce" of the establishment for a year, was not equal to the sum which it derives from the commission on Money Orders in a year, at the present "net produce" of the single town of Liverpool is so also, the whole expenditure of the whole establishment in a year was but a little larger than the sum which we pay each month for salaries to the clerks of the London Office alone.

We find also that, during the wars with France, the boats were frequently attacked by French privateers, and clerks for pensions, on account of wounds, were frequently made by the Post Office by the sailors. Mr. Scudamore writes:—

Thus, after a fierce engagement which took place in February 1705, we find that Edward James had a donation of 5*l.*, because "musket shot had grazed on the tibia of his left leg;" that Gal Treludra had 12*l.*, because a shot had "divided his frontal muscle and fractured his skull;" that Thomas Williams had the same because "a Granada shell had stuck fast in his left foot;" that J. Cook, who "received a shot in the hinder part of his head, where a large division of the scalp was made," had a donation of 6*l.* 13*s.* for present relief, and a yearly pension of the same amount; and Benjamin Lillycrop, who "lost the forefinger of his left hand," "2*l.* for present relief, and a yearly pension of the same amount."

The Postmasters General, in a letter to their Agent at Falmouth on the subject of pensions for wounds, informs him thus; "an arm or leg amputated above the elbow or knee is 8*l.* per annum; below the knee is 20 nobles. Loss of the sight of one eye is 4*l.* the pupil of the eye 5*l.*, of the sight of both eyes 12*l.*, of the pupil of both eyes 14*l.*; and according to these rules we consider also how much also the hurts affect the body, and make the allowances accordingly."

The Postmasters General were evidently continually troubled during the war by special consignments to them of goods and parcels and even human beings, for whose safe transportation to their destination they were to be held responsible.

So various were the articles entrusted to them that I will set down a list culled from a very few pages of the Agents' Letter Book.

Imprimis.—“Fifteen couple of hounds going to the King of the Romans with a free pass.”

Item.—“Some parcels of cloth for the Clothing Colonels (sic) in my Lord North's and my Lord Grey's regiments.

Item.—“Two servant maids going as laundresses to my Lord Ambassador Methuen.”

Item.—“Dr Crichton, carrying with him a cow and divers other necessaries.”

Item.—“Three suits of cloaths for some nobleman's lady at the Court of Portugal.”

Item.—“A box containing three pounds of tea, sent as a present by my Lady Arlington to the Queen Dowager of England at Lisbon.”

Item.—“Eleven couple of houndes for Major-General Hompesch.”

Item.—“A case of knives and forks for Mr. Stepney, Her Majesty's Envoy to the King of Holland.”

Item.—“One little parcell of lace, to be made use of in cloathing Duke Schomberg's regiment.”

Item.—“Two bales of stockings for the use of the Ambassador of the Crown of Portugal.”

Item.—“A box of medicines for my Lord Galway in Portugal.”

Item.—A deal case with four fitches of bacon for Mr. Pennington, of Rotterdam.”

Really, with all these cares upon them, and what with scolding an Agent once, because “he had not provided a sufficiency of pork and beef for the Prince;” again, because “he had bought powder at Falmouth that would have been so much cheaper in London;” again, because “he had stirred up a mutiny between a captain and his men, which was unhandsome conduct in him;” again, because “he has not ordered the Dolphin to sail, though the wind is marked westerly in the Wind Journals,” whereat the Postmasters General “admire;” what with bringing Captain Clies to trial, “for that he had spoken words reflecting on the Royal Family, which the Postmasters General took particular unkind of him;” and reprimanding another for “breaking open the portmanteau of Mons Raoul (a gentleman passenger), and spoiling him of a parcel of snuff;” what with “purchasing new vessels, stores, and provisions, and ordering the old ones to be sold by inch of candle;—with all these cares, one sees that our Postmasters General had enough to do. Their letters are sometimes plaintive enough. “Wee are concerned,” say they, “to find the letters brought by your boat (from the West Indies) to be so consumed by the ratts that we cannot find out to whom they belong.” Another letter to their agent at Harwich shall speak for itself. It runs:—

“Mr. Edisbury,

“The woman, whose complaint we herewith send you, having given us much trouble upon the same, we desire you will enquire into the same, and see justice done her, believing she may have had her brandy stole from her by the sailors.

“We are your affectionate friends,

“R. C., T. F.”

In the Appendix to the Second Report we have the following sketch of the Scotch Post Office :—

To show the difficulties in the way of rapid communication at period [1678] from the condition of the roads in Scotland, it is stated that an agreement was made to run a coach between Edinburgh and Glasgow (a distance of 44 miles) which was to be drawn by six horses, and to perform the journey to Glasgow and back in six days. The undertaking was considered so arduous that the contractor was to receive 200 merks* a year for five years to assist him; but the speculation turned out so unprofitable it was soon abandoned.

In 1698 Sir Robert Sinclair of Stevenson, had a grant from King William of the whole revenue of the Post Office in Scotland, with a pension of 300*l.* per annum to keep up the post. The Post Office at this time appears to have been anything but a profitable concern, as Sir Robert, after due deliberation, gave up the grant, thinking it disadvantageous.

When Mr. Anderson took office on the 12th July, 1715, there was not a single horse post in Scotland, foot runners being the only mode of conveyance for the mails. In this manner direct bags were conveyed from Edinburgh as far north as Thurso, and westward to Inverary. There were three Mails a week from Edinburgh to Glasgow, and three in return; the runners set out from Edinburgh each Tuesday and Thursday at 12 o'clock at night, and on Sunday in the morning, and the Mails arrived at Glasgow on the evening of Wednesday and Friday, and on the forenoon of Monday. For his services the Post Office paid 40*l.* sterling per annum; but for the fraudulent dealing of the Postmaster of Falkirk, who made no payments, the runners seldom received more than from 20*l.* to 25*l.*

In 1716 the Duke of Argyll, who had then supreme control in Scotland, gave orders to Mr. Anderson to place relays of horse-posts from Edinburgh to Inverness, for the purpose of forwarding despatches to, and receiving intelligence from, the army in the Highlands under General Cadogan. These posts worked upon two of the best roads; the one went through Fife and round by the east coast, passing through Aberdeen; the other took the central road, through Perth, Dunkeld, and Blair Atholl. These horse-posts were, however, discontinued immediately after the army retired.

About the year 1750 the Mails began to be conveyed from stage to stage, by relays of fresh horses, and different post-boys, to the principal places in Scotland; but the greater portion of the Mails were still carried by foot runners. Before the system of relays was introduced on the North Road, the mode of conveying the Mails was very tedious. For instance, "a person set out with the Mail from Edinburgh for Aberdeen; he did not travel a stage, and deliver the Mail to another post-boy, but went on to Dundee, where he rested the first night; to Montrose, where he staid the second; and, on the third, he arrived at Aberdeen, and, as he passed by Kinghorn, it behoved the tide, and sometimes also the weather, to render the time of his arrival more late and uncertain." In this manner the Mail was conveyed thrice a week. The communication by post between London and Edinburgh was not much better. The condition of the roads, however, in Scotland, would not admit of anything like rapid travelling. The best roads, even in the populous districts, were often to be found in the channels of streams. The common carrier from Edinburgh to Selkirk, 38 miles, required a fortnight for his journey, going and returning; the channel of the river Gala, which for a considerable distance ran parallel with the road, being, when not flooded, the track chosen as the most level and easiest to travel in. Between the principal cities, the means of travelling were little better. It took a day and a half for the stage-coach to travel from Edinburgh to Glasgow.

---

* A merk is equal to 1*s.* 1½*d.* sterling.

In the year 1757 the Mail was upon the road from London to Edinburgh 87 hours, but from Edinburgh to London 131 hours. At this time, from a representation from the Committee of Royal Burghs, such regulations were adopted, that the time was reduced to 82 hours from London to Edinburgh, and 85 hours from Edinburgh to London.

In 1763, a further improvement was made on the London Mail, by having it despatched five times a week instead of three, as formerly. Previously it had travelled in so dilatory a manner, that in winter the letters which were sent from London on Tuesday night, for the most part, were not distributed in Edinburgh till Sunday between sermons.

In 1776, the modern stage coach was introduced into Scotland; the first coach arriving in Edinburgh on the 10th of April. It performed the journey to London in 60 hours. And in the same year, the first Penny Post in Scotland was established in Edinburgh, by Peter Williamson, an eccentric native of Aberdeen, who in consequence of keeping a coffee shop in the hall of the Parliament House, was frequently employed by gentlemen attending the Courts, to forward letters to different parts of the city. This kind of business increased so much that he opened an office, and established a regular Penny Post delivery of letters throughout the city. He had hourly deliveries, and agents at various parts of the town to collect letters. The men who delivered, of whom there were four (in uniform), also collected letters, and for this purpose they rang a bell as they proceeded on their rounds, to give information of their approach.

Williamson's success soon induced others to attempt a similar undertaking; but the authorities of the General Post Office, seeing the importance of this branch of business as a source of revenue, gave Williamson a pension for the goodwill of the business, and the Penny Post was then attached to the general establishment.

A direct Mail between London and Glasgow was not established before 1788, when, on the 7th July, the first Mail coach from London arrived in Glasgow. Previously the correspondence between those cities passed through Edinburgh; where it was detained two hours to be sent with the Mail to Glasgow at night.

Having followed the Scottish Post Office down to the close of eighteenth century, it may be observed that for a long time after introduction and establishment it was conducted solely with a view to the convenience and security of the correspondence of the public and that it frequently received assistance from the Scottish Government by pecuniary grants. And if we except the periods of rebellion when a certain amount of surveillance was exercised by the Agents of Government as a measure of state security, the Post Office in Scotland appears to have been conducted with great integrity and with freedom from abuse.

In April, 1713, the Edinburgh Post Office was removed to the first story of a house opposite the Tolbooth on the north side of High Street. At a later time it occupied the first floor of a house near the Cross, above an alley which still bears the name of the Post Office Close. It was removed from this to a floor on the south side of the Parliament Square, which was fitted up like a shop, and letters were dealt across an ordinary counter like other goods. At this time all the out-of-door business of delivery was managed by one Letter Carrier. From the Parliament Square the Post Office was removed to Lord Covington's house, thence after some years to a house on the North Bridge and finally it was removed to the present office in 1821, at which period the dispatch of the Mails was conducted in an apartment about 30 feet square. This apartment was purposely kept as dark as possible, in order to derive the advantage of artificial light, employed in the process of examining letters to see whether they contained enclosures or not.

In the body of the Second Report, a letter from Archibald Parker to the Secretary, Cecil, and bearing date Croydon, 22nd July, 1566, 4 o'clock, P.M., has the following indentments of successive Postmasters:—

"Received at Waltham Cross, the 23rd of July, about midnight at night."

"Received at Ware, the 23rd July, at 12 o'clock at night."

"Received at Croxton, the 24th of July, between 7 and 8 o'clock of the clock in the morning."

So that his Grace's letter, leaving Croydon at 4 in the afternoon of July 22nd, reached Waltham Cross, a distance of nearly 26 miles, by 9 at night of the 23rd; whence, in three hours, it seems to have advanced 8 miles to Ware; and within eight hours more to have reached Croxton, a further distance of 29 miles; having taken nearly 40 hours to travel about 63 miles.

From these Reports it is evident that many of the complaints made against the Post Office are unfounded. Doubtless where 21,000 servants are employed, some must be careless or dishonest ; but the following facts shew that the public are somewhat to blame :—

Notwithstanding repeated warnings on the subject, and in disregard of the facilities afforded by the Money Order System, as well as of the comparative security which can be obtained by registration, culpable heedlessness is often displayed in sending coin and bank notes in letters ; in the case of bank notes, even the simple precaution of cutting them into halves (withholding the second halves until the receipt of the first has been acknowledged) being often omitted. This precaution should be taken even when the letter is registered ; nor should it be necessary to add that the packet containing such enclosure ought always to be sealed. In one case which occurred lately in Ireland, a considerable sum of money was sent in a letter open at both ends like a book or a newspaper.

Whenever coin is sent by the post, special care should be taken to see that the packet is securely fastened. Sometimes, for want of such care, coins fall out even of registered letters.

In March last an unregistered letter, containing a 10*l.* Bank of England note, posted at Macclesfield, addressed to Manchester, was stated not to have reached its destination. Full inquiry was made, but the letter could not be found. Subsequently, however, the note was presented at the Bank of England, and on being traced, it was discovered that the letter had been stolen after its delivery.

In December last, a letter containing two 5*l.* Bank of England notes, was stated to have been posted at Leeds, addressed to a lady at Leamington, without reaching its destination ; but the inquiry that was instituted by the Department caused the sender to withdraw his complaint, and to prefer against the clerk whom he had intrusted with the letter, a charge of having purloined it before it reached the Post Office.

Last spring, a gentleman at Archerstown, County Westmeath, complained of a letter, containing half bank notes and post bills, amounting to 400*l.*, addressed to Dublin, not having come to hand ; but when the matter came to be fully examined, it was ascertained by one of our officers, that the letter was in a drawer of the house of the very person to whom it had been directed, but by whom it had been entirely overlooked.

In the spring of last year a young lady about 15 years of age, whose parents reside at a small town in —shire, was sent to a school not far from ——. The mother of the young lady was suffering from illness in April last, and letters were written from time to time to the daughter at school announcing the state of her mother's health.

The young lady declared that she wrote on the 17th of April to enquire how her mother was ; that letter was not delivered ; and that on the morning of the 19th of that month a brown paper parcel was placed in a very mysterious manner in the hall of the house at which the young lady was at school. This parcel contained a letter which stated that her mother was dead, and that the parcel had been conveyed by a friend, which accounted for its not bearing any post marks.

Other circumstances were related by the young lady, such as her having seen a man galloping on the road, who halted and informed her that he had left the parcel announcing her mother's death.

On the 21st of the same month, a letter enclosed in an envelope was posted at the town in —shire, informing the young lady that her mother was much better ; but when the envelope was opened, the young lady produced another letter requiring her immediate presence to attend her mother's funeral.

The case excited great interest, and suspicion arose that a conspiracy existed, aided by some person in the service of this department, to carry off the young lady.

The papers on the subject were referred, in the first instance, to the Surveyor of the Home District ; but he was unable to solve the mystery ; and the Surveyor of the Western District, to whom the papers were subsequently sent, was equally unsuccessful. At length the Solicitor to the Post Office suggested that Mr. Christopher Hodgson, an officer attached to the Home District, who had displayed considerable skill in investigating matters of this nature, should be despatched to the school to make further inquiry. This was done, and on a full examination Mr. Hodgson reported it as his opinion that the whole proceedings were but a plot of a school girl to get home, as its contriver afterwards confessed to be the case.

The first of these Reports bears the name of "Canning" Postmaster general ; the second bears that of "Argyll." It has, in reading these Reports, frequently appeared to us most singular that this absurdity of a Postmaster General, changing with the Ministry, should have been so long suffered to exist.

We place some aristocratic supporter of the Government in this important situation ; we give him authority to check and control men such as Rowland Hill ; we pay him an enormous salary and endow him with large patronage ; and just as he may be found to want brains and the application, acquiring some knowledge of his office and of its duties, a new Ministry may come in and with them a new Postmaster General.

Surely, if the Right Man is ever to be in the Right Place, this is a case for Mr. Roebuck and the Administrative Reform Association. Rowland Hill makes our Postal system, and the Duke of Argyll signs Rowland Hill's Reports. Rowland Hill has the head to design a feature in our social progress, and is made secretary to a Scotch Duke, who, however excellent he may be in other respects, cannot serve the Nation as well as those who have given time, thought and active toil, to the invention, elaboration, and successful working of a well designed principle.

Our task here, for the present paper, ends ; and if we have not amused the reader, we trust we have been able to show him

"What a wonderful man The Post-Man is!"

ART IV.—THE POOR RELATION: AN OUTLINE OF SOCIAL HISTORY.

BY AN IRISH WORKMAN.

The Census of Ireland for the Year, 1851. Parts I. to V.
Dublin. Alex. Thom, 1852-56.

The social history of the country whose society, in the same lapse of time, experienced more ups and downs than perhaps all other human societies put together, has not, that I know of, been so much as outlined. It is true that the political historian, the politician, the traveller—curious, philosophic, or benevolent,—and the novelist, every one after his own manner, has now and again with admirable fidelity pictured some impressive or instructive episode of this history; and therein has done so well that we feel he should have done better still in doing more to the same effect. But not the less stands the fact: as a whole, the social history of Great Britain's Poor Relation, Ireland, has not in any wise been portrayed.

In this sketch I have left untouched the political history of the country; conceiving that were that to be made prominent it would cast into the shade what I deem more important, the social history.

Veritas, lux vera, is the maxim with which I backed my first sheet: a bold maxim as it shows itself in its two-fold bearing. Seeing, in the first place, that with regard to the obscurer parts of this and every social history, the truth of the exposition grounds itself upon the fact of its being, like the light, self-evidencing. And again, if the truth of history in its important and leading points be manifested, that not alone the succession of cause and effect from good and evil—Right and Wrong—will in the past, as it is brought into the field of view, become apparent, but, still further, that society present—the Passing—so vast and complex and imposing as it is, that this, too, will have its weak points, its glaring defects exposed.

Veritas, lux vera! brave words or merely braggart; which, this history will in effect disclose.

It was sketched during the famine-time, in the endeavor to lay down for myself my own position and prospects, and my line of duty, whither leading, home or abroad.

I.

I am an Irishman, full-grown and healthy; for all which blessings I thank God. I have a desire for labor, to do what work may fall to my hand; and I am thus, I believe, so far further blessed, since the will to work is in a measure the grace of God. I do not desire to toil for myself only; but assuredly I must get a fairly proportionate share of the value of my labor. No man shall fatten through the sweat of my brow whilst I hunger or am naked; nor shall the lean kine of the land eat up all that I have herded with care. As I sow I shall and will reap: if not here, elsewhere. For while I love my country and its people—but the people rather than the land, if this people—if I, cannot live as becomes man, in comfort and independence,—if I cannot, without danger of social degradation, should I will to do so, take wife and (God send) have children grow up about me, whilst doing my duty as man and citizen, society here is a swindle; and I will not remain one with it a day longer than I need. The world is wide; there is space enough where the hopeful heart and helpful hand can find freedom to labor and good work to do and heaven for helper. For He who gave the burden holds the hand that takes it as a blessing.

Assuredly, if I can do my duty here, can live and do well, as here has been assigned my portion, so here it is right that I abide. This question then, I have to consider with myself and to discuss with my neighbours: are we, the present race of Irishmen, likely to prosper in the land of Ireland?—For us and ours we must look for no exemption from the common lot. If so, let us fix our home where it is. If otherwise, let us, in God's name, take up our household goods, bring with us all we may of those most near and dear to us, and go forth to build up a new home, to make green a better Ireland under more propitious stars.

Has it in fact come to this:—shall we, the refuse of our race, stay and see out our old world doom; or shall we too follow across the sea to take footing with the workers of a new and nobler destiny?

II.

What greater wonder has man seen than this, of which we are the witnesses: a whole people, as it would seem, hurrying from the land of their birth in search of strange settlements? "The hag has been at the heart" of the country now these five years past; and our poor people like affrighted children knowing not what afflicted them, have been seeking to hide their heads somehow, somewhere. Surely now it is time that the country shake off the hag and face its prospects. It behoves us to see really what it is that has so long, so widely, and so deeply distressed us; to know what great danger to be avoided, what great promise to be realised, what great call to be obeyed, causes the native Irish race, our fellows, to forsake Ireland. For, do not the light and good and evil affect us placed with them under the like circumstances?

Are the motives to the flight of our race rational motives? Is it the rational dread of disaster at home, a rational expectation of prosperity abroad, which now possesses them? What is it that drives them to it?

The present condition of our country may truly be said to be that of "pauperism." Pauperism is the state of all classes of our community, the exceptions being but many enough to make good the rule. The state actual may yet be only conditional; may have been produced under dispensation of passing calamity for future good. If it be in this instance, as Bacon declared it to be generally, that "adversity is the blessing of the New Testament," we have indeed been blessed! Blessed beyond all modern peoples, almost beyond all measure. But if, as many despise, presume to think, Ireland's calamity has been permitted in requital of Ireland's sin, it is right for us to look into our state, to bring together the tribes of our people, to discover what iniquity has been wrought amongst us and who have been the workers of it, so that the evil be removed, that the remnant of the people be not left to perish, that the threatened disinheriting of them be not enforced.

It is written, that like answers to like in the ways of Providence. So must we expect social crime to be followed by social retribution, and political offence by political penalty, as sin against morality by punishment of a moral nature. If, then, our calamitous condition is a punishment, our great sin must be of a social stamp; and we must look into the character, customs, and works of our society, past and present, for the origin of the evil or evils.

Our present state was not of sudden occurrence, is not the consequence of a single blow, nor even several blows given in rapid succession, though at first sight it seem so to be. We were not cast out from real and right prosperity to rest upon a dunghill; though the land, Job like, to-day be all over foul ulcers, its flocks and its herds despoiled, its sons and its daughters crushed, sorrow and suffering come upon the old Fatherland until it lies wholly in the hand of its enemy, only its existence spared!

For ages there has not been a true or common prosperity: and how could there be under the circumstances?

III.

Ireland is, and has ever been, almost exclusively an agricultural country; and its well-being, necessarily dependent upon agricultural production, is, therefore, nearly connected with the well-being of the producers. Hence the land-classes are the basis of our Irish Society. These proprietors and cultivators have very rarely held the position with respect to one another of mere parties to a bargain. The one class has held the other's single means of livelihood, and generally,—from the numbers of the people in relation to the production of the country for the time being, has been able to command whatever terms it was its policy to offer; to which terms the other class was, if it would live in the land, necessitated to accede:—"There was always a famine of land!" There was personal or hereditary quarrel between these classes. The one were, or represented, the conquerors; the other, the conquered. And for the most part they were as antagonistic in religious and national feeling as they were in race—"Sassenach" and "meer Irish."

It would indeed be strange, if under those circumstances the relationship subsisting betwixt these land-classes were right and constitutional, and altogether satisfactory to the dependent class. Far otherwise was it. The landlord was the master and law-maker; he had his peculiar notions, adopted from feudalism, of his high prerogative; he made his own terms and enforced them by power of law, civil or martial as suited the occasion. The tenant had to suffer; but he did not fail to feel injustice, nor to resist when opportunity and means presented. Hence arose and thence proceeded the struggle which, under various phases and names, religious and political, has for a century and a half periodically thrown the island into civil convulsions. Active and passive by turns, shown on the one side in the enacting and enforcing of laws—in rule and raid and eviction; on the other, in agitation and insurrection—in the Whiteboy, Oakboy, Peep-o'-Dayboy, Hearts of Steel, Rockite, Ribbon, and other like systems, and in all manner of agrarian crime and outrage. Throughout, is manifested the single struggle: of the lord, for supreme mastery; of the serf, for the right to live. Sometimes open and aggressive enemies, at best covertly hostile, they seemed to think that their interests were utterly opposed; so that whatever was injurious to the one must be beneficial to the other. One wonders if they ever felt that it would be their interest to maintain friendly relations. If so, when did they ever act upon the conviction? If they knew that co-operation must tend to their common benefit, how rarely did they use their knowledge to the purpose! It is, at the least, remarkable that the higher class did not understand that people who are bound together depend one upon another, should work together kindly, were it through the polite motive—self-love. Is there need to point the saying in explicit terms, lo! in ruinous result the influence of the dissipated delusion that evil to the one must be the other's good,—the fatal consequence to both parties; how the peasantry have to bear the load of lordly embarrassment till they have at length weighed down by the insupportable burden of a rack-renting class; and again see how the keeping down of the peasantry level of dependent serfdom has had for its effect the spreading widely that pauperism which now, under the Poor-laws, is swamping proprietary! Twin facts, nevertheless, of which we to-day are witness.

The exercise of despotic power, from the facility which it affords of raising income, is a prime incentive to luxurious living. During the reign of Elizabeth nearly until the reign of George the Fourth the Irish master-class exercised a despotism unlimited as the Sun. Their modes of life were luxurious even beyond their means. William of the state of the country in his time, a Viceroy, the famous Chesterfield, says, "all the causes that ever destroyed a country centre in this point to ruin Ireland. Premature luxury outruns riches, which in other countries it only accompanies." When wants became too many for their means, the owners sometimes resorted to wring from their serfs what should supply their requirements. Despite the unfortunate circumstances of their tenancies, notwithstanding enough inducing recklessness, a minority of the labor-class did with a will and become in a measure wealthy. But what they saved they as closely guarded, suffering at times the severest penury on account of their obduracy.† They hoarded with the hope of better times coming. And the time did, to be sure, come, when the labor class, not less needy but more knowing, was induced to make concessions.‡

While the United States of America were proclaiming independence, a partial adjustment of the relationship betwixt owner and occupier of the soil took place in Ireland. The disabilities of the Catholic tenant have and hold the land under lease, and, with certain restrictions, in fee, were then removed; and so far the return upon the labor of the industrious was rendered less insecure. The lease-right was granted

* "The original cause of the rising of the Whiteboys was that some landlords in Munster set their lands to cottiers far above their value; and to lighten their burden, allowed commonage to their peasantry, by way of recompense: afterwards, in despite of all engagements contrary to all compacts, the landlords enclosed these commons, and excluded their unhappy tenants from the only means of making their bargains tolerable." An inquiry into the causes of the outrages committed by the Levellers or Whiteboys. laid hold on by the labor-class. They paid freely for security in their farms. Hence a considerable portion of the lands of the country came to be let for long terms at the low rents which obtained in those days. Consequently, the holders of this lease-interest grew, every generation, into higher consideration, till they came to be landlords themselves and to exercise all the privileges of ownership; the head landlord, seemingly withdrawn into higher regions, being perhaps unknown, save in name, to the actual occupiers. In fewer instances the tenantry were enabled to purchase and possess in fee. And this latter privilege would probably have been more extensively availed of but for the restrictions imposed by the laws of Settlement and Entail upon free dealing in land. The owners, mostly, had but life-interest in their estates. Yet it was no part of their policy to break the entail: for no matter how extravagant the father had been, no matter how the creditors had ruled the rent-roll during his life, dying he left his son a clear estate. Such a state of things of course induced actual gambling. Lenders required enormous interest for their money, and traders extortionate prices for their goods, in consideration of the risk incurred. This system was, like all gambling traffic, ultimately found injurious to both parties. Wherefore a time arrived when the proprietary thought well to borrow from the capitalist, who lent at a moderate interest, but required to have a permanent lien upon the land, through the co-operation—co-borrowing of the heir and the holder in possession. Most of the great estates thus became encumbered.

IV.

When Dublin had an independent Parliament, during the closing quarter of the last century, it was said to be the gayest capital in Europe. It was the focus and most brilliant reflection of the extravagance of the higher class. There was a magic in the life and freedom of its society; an easy, dashing hospitality, very delightful to partake of if one could refuse to consider how this rivalry of pleasant prodigality must end. Poorhouses there then were none; but you might, occasionally, meet scions of broken-down houses breaking-in horses for their friends, or pursuing some such gentlemanly menial employment: trade was vulgar.

The passing of the Union Act, and the consequent withdrawal of the Parliamentary eligibles from their native Green, changed their sphere but not their movements, "cælum non animam mutant."—It drew them into a wider circle, where their gay social trifling was lost in the more serious business of London fashion. Thence incumbrances increased upon the lands, as, in consequence of increased expenditure, debts accumulated on the proprietors; and the estates were given over completely to the systematic management of the agent. It better suited the temperament and habits of the great proprietors to live at ease away from the trouble and turmoil of magisterial life in Ireland,—to get out of sight by turning their backs upon that wretched crawling mass which covered the robe of their gentility. It was preferable to have their properties managed for them even at a loss. But it proved that the Agent, once that supreme control and mastery had been given over to him, brought positive, immediate profit to his principal. Many of the first-class proprietors had thus become absentees—some wholly, others partially—long previous to 1800; but since, it is quite a rarity to find a first-class Irish proprietor resident in Ireland, regularly, during any portion of the year.*

* See "A list of the Absentees of Ireland, and the yearly value of their Estates, &c." By Thomas Prior, Esq., 3rd Edition, 1745."

It is true that this class when at home had, by example, so far and wide the seeds of excess, which took root quickly, bore fruit freely in the luxuriant soil of Irish nature. The effect of its withdrawal was as though much of the atmospheric pressure had been taken off our little world, and thence that men and things had no stability. And this, as will be seen hereafter, was a measure irrespective of the serious loss sustained by the nation in periodical exhaustion of its wealth.* Thus reclamation or improvement of the land was neglected; and all other great natural resources were almost unheeded. Commerce languished, and many flourishing trades died out. Practical ability left the country to employ itself where more profitably, or labored at home in the rank field of politics. Thence politics filled up the measure of our excess.

The Agent, thus become uncontrolled and irresponsible master of the lands and of the lives of the tenantry who were unprotected by lease, pursued an Agent's interest only in the well-being of the occupiers or the security of the owner in the estate. If he were a self-interested man, his play was evidently, to pander to the needy excess of the landlord through the utmost exaction from the tenant. He became quite a comfort to the employer when, from the accumulated savings of income and perquisites of place, or by other ways and means, he came to be the easiest lender. And so, frequently, he closed his account as chief financier. This land-agent system in Ireland swelled into a monstrous iniquity. Under its operation we have seen pass in close and rapid reckless competition and rack-renting, crop-lifting and murder. The owners were, mostly, bad masters, they had many redeeming qualities which won the regard often, and sometimes the respect of their tenants. If they did a wrong at one time, they were capable of acting generously at another—though "generosity," as has well been said, "seldom more than a small per-centage of justice."—They were free-holders to the poor man; they had hearts of flesh in them. Not so their Agents. Between these and those they ruled there was no bond of sympathy. They were hirelings merely. They cast the blame of harsh measures upon the circumstances of their places; or upon their employers. On the ground of obligation to do the best they could for those employed they often, possibly, justified to themselves the wrong, outrage and every law, committed by them or under their sanction. Their vices * Economically, the matter stands thus: the value of four millions of pounds, sterling, (Evidence taken before Parl. Committee, Third Report p. 481.) be it more or less, in corn and cattle, has annually been sent out of the country, in return for which we received land and receipts—happy if they were receipts in full, and no more. Had the landlords remained at home, corn and cattle to an equal amount would have been given up to them, a portion of which would have been consumed by themselves, their families, and descendants, and thus, taking into account the existence of butchers, bakers, cooks, &c., shall say, lost to the country as though it had been sent out of it; and a portion of this produce should have been exchanged for teas, wools, tobacco, and other foreign commodities, but the entire portion so expended would not have been sent away, inasmuch as a share of it would have remained to the Irish shippers, merchants, and other traders engaged in the supply of those imports; and yet another portion should most probably, have been exchanged for home manufactured goods. This was the case before the UNION; while another portion should certainly have been employed in forwarding improvements upon the estates.

tyranny of the most odious character, exercised with effect through their underlings, till at length a farmer could scarce kill a hen or pluck a goose without the cognizance of bailiff or driver. And the people abhorred them all with a far livelier abhorrence than they did the Devil himself.

Where the occupier did not hold under old lease he paid too much for his holding; and, consequently, was very much at the mercy of the Agent. Where his lease dropped, he was still more so.

It is natural for people unacquainted with the circumstances of Ireland to inquire: "Why should a farmer take or retain a farm under rent for which it was not value?" Farming and farm-work being the exclusive dependence of nearly seven-tenths of the people, land in Ireland was, up to the period of the potato-blight, 1845, at an enormous premium. As the population increased—and it was said to have doubled in sixty years, so, and nearly in the same ratio, did the demand for land increase? There were twenty, fifty, one hundred competitors, perhaps, for the farms to be let. A most pernicious rivalry seemed to have put in abeyance the common sense and prudence of the farming and farm-seeking class. They recklessly out-bid one another, offering in many cases rent which they could not pay and live; giving away as often a good part of their capital as a fine to the landlord, or a bribe—in "greasing" or "glove money"—to the Agent or the Agent's lady. The commercial rule A. 1, was that in general application to the letting of land. It was no part of the duty, or at least it was no part of the practice, of owner or agent in Ireland to consider whether or not the fine given, and rent bid were fair and equitable, such as, under the circumstances, a solvent tenant, meaning to be honest and with a just regard to himself could pay—"The value of a thing is what it brings." The Agent of course felt it incumbent on him to make the best, that is to say, the hardest bargain with the fool of most quality, in mark and means, who offered. People will even tell you of the landlord who made it a custom to calculate before setting a farm how many years it would take to break the in-coming tenant.

For a time, while the wars of Napoleon continued, the all-hazard desire for ground was not so much to be wondered at. Then, there was excessive demand for home agricultural produce; it was paid for at exorbitant prices; and, as a consequence, land assumed an extravagant value. After Waterloo, however, though the prices fell, the marketable value of the land was not lowered proportionately. For competition still continuing to an extreme, those who held farms if not bound to them, (as were many of those wise folk who looked upon Napoleon as a fixed star and war a fixed state,) still feared to throw their ground into the market; wanting other means whereby to make a livelihood, they held on desperately; though to go on with the assumed rent was to take deliberately the road to ruin. They clung to their holdings, many of them like children to a mother. "On this farm," said they, "my father and grandfather, and great grandfather were born, and lived, and died; and I will live and die on it if I can." They held to it with a desperate longing tenacity, even with beggary staring them in the face. They would live on dry potatoes only to be permitted to live there, to keep the cabin over head. They were for all practical purposes uneducated; they knew how to turn their hands to no other labour of production. And these men of the labour-class of the last generation had little of the world-scouring enterprise of their sons; who, thanks to the new fields over the way, will not stay to starve, though it be at home in Ireland.

Since the union with Great Britain, the first class proprietors generally, as is notorious, have ceased to reside in Ireland. The lesser proprietors and leaseholders, after this removal of the superior class, finding themselves the leading people of the country, should of course uphold its high-hospitable character. In truth they took and tried to maintain positions the requirements of which were extravagant beyond their incomes. They did no more than follow the example of their superiors at home and abroad, even, in many cases, but for different reasons, to the extent of becoming absentees.* As was to be looked for, the like course led to a like influence and a like end. The influence was two-fold; pauperising the labour-class by rack-rents, and demoralising it by the contagion of improvidence. The end one way or the other was the same, whether arrived at through the round-about of Chancery or by the short cut of the Incumbered Estates' Court.

Yet should we not pity rather than condemn the men upon whom this destination fell? They were born to a false, a bad inheritance, and it failed them in the day of need. They found themselves in a false position with a fictitious income to support it. Who can pass judgment on their mansions deserted or turned into an auxiliary workhouse without thinking of those who there lived out their palmy little day; of the gentle virtues that grew up around the hearth in kind hearts now sorrowful—doubly sorrowful, it may be, at the loss of hopes and friends for whom they cherished there in happier times? Let us look at the better side of the picture, try to forget their faults, except in justifying to ourselves the superior and severe justice which overrules all. If they have sinned much, they have suffered much; and all but their good qualities should be overlooked by us their neighbours. Thrown, many of them, utterly ruined upon the world, yet have they mostly stuff enough in them to make the most of their fortunes. They are truly our brothers now; and as such—let us think of them and act by them.

There have been rare examples to the contrary of all this; lords and gentlemen who lived within their incomes and did not go into the hands of their tenantry, but stood nigh with helping hand even when the day came. And there have been good agents. They deserve the highest admiration; who proved themselves strong against temptation; who stood forth as saving examples; "who could have sinners and did not: who are they and we shall praise them?"

We find a true and kindly relationship in general subsisting between those owners or agents and the occupying tenantry. We scarcely find an instance of a man of the labor-class holding under them who, if he had not notably been of bad character, has been driven

* It is of this latter class of absentees it may indeed truly be said

"They found that in other countries the scanty residue of the rental procured for them more of the luxuries to which they had become accustomed, than they could obtain at home. They were anxious to be relieved from the burden of supporting a high social position upon inadequate means. They were disgusted at seeing their estates ploughed under the management of a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery. They were annoyed by the importunities of their tenantry, and pained by the sight of misery which they could not relieve; and influenced by one or more of these causes, they sought in another land the consolation and enjoyment which they no longer met with in their own." Transactions of the Central Relief Committee of the Society of Friends during the Famine in Ireland, in 1846 and 1847. Introduction p. 12 into the poorhouse or forced to emigrate. It is probable that not even a single case will be discovered where, with an incumbered estate and an honest resident landlord—no middleman-interest intervening—the tenantry have not been enabled to resist famine and all the following pauperising influences so long at work towards the general destruction.

V.

A great part of the trading class,—farmers' sons born and reared in the country, as we Irish call the rural districts, with all their affections the growth of country-life, had all their joys deep-rooted in the soil. Their desires tended back to this condition of life. The goal of their earthly ambition seemed to be the making of enough to enable them to return to the country in a way of independence, and so to enjoy in it their prime, or at least renew their first childhood in their age. These divided themselves, as all men do practically, into two sets; the patient and the impatient. The latter having once begun to prosper would have immediate gratification of their desire, would farm, as well as work the shop or mill. At first it was for health's sake, to employ or to amuse their leisure hours. Next, having got into the spirit of it, each would farm for profit. If his farm was far from his business-place, then, unless he kept a steward for the farm or a partner—other than a wife—in the business, which perhaps not one in fifty of the set now spoken of did, he must obviously neglect one or both, and eventually lose one way or the other; "the business that is near is devoured by the master; the business afar off devours him." If his farm was near he almost invariably paid a ruinous rent for it. Moreover, he usually expended in "improvement," and in fancy tillage, far more than he purposed on setting out to farm. But the money went so gradually as scarcely to be missed whilst going. The till was ever at hand. From week to week what was spent on one thing or another was unfelt, but at the close of the account a large sum was found to have been expended without adequate return. Men of this set seldom succeeded in either business. But they had much influence in keeping up competition in suburban districts—in town-lots which gave a sort of lead to land rents generally. The other and wiser set, waiting until they had amassed money, gave up shop and took land, usually upon advantageous terms; and though rarely succeeding equally well in farming and in trade, they managed to live comfortably and respectably. The prudent well-to-do trader had but to change his coat to become the gentleman farmer. Having learned from the influence of town and business life the value of education,—for if he had not experienced the worth he had felt the want of it in himself,—he invariably gave his children the best, and genteel too, of which he knew. The daughters were made accomplished in the ornamental acquirements. The sons were made "gentlemen," or brought up to professions. There was, and there still is, though to a far less extent, a semi-feudality in Irish society, out of certain of the northern counties: and shop-keeping was a stench in the nostrils of the half educated semi-peeper, under-bred aristocrats. The effect of this was to make daughters and some ashamed of their parents, and even people themselves ashamed of their trade. As a consequence, they got rid of it as soon as they could conveniently. The sons of these people were formed to fill up a large portion of the list of Counsellors, Attorneys, and Doctors, who for some cause or another "didn't practise."

Those gentlemen with or without professions could not live on air. Indeed they commonly were quick-witted; and they exercised their wits for their livelihood, non-professionally. A little money they usually got from their fathers and perhaps by their wives. On this they traded in land. Those were mostly good-fellows with sporting tastes, who endeavored to keep hand-and-glove with owners and agents, and to command a preference of the farms that from time to time dropped to be let. Their ready money was often a persuasive—a conclusive argument with needy landlord or greedy agent. They took land and divided it, to cottier it out; and in the letting of it encouraged competition to the uttermost.

Cottiering of the land had for a first effect a rapid increase of population. The youth of the labor-class did not in all instances wait before trying until they had occupation of the soil. The rational instinct, common in other countries and in other communities operates to the prevention of marriage until those about to contract it shall be satisfied of the probability of having enough for the unborn, was not indeed less active in the Irish peasantry; but they felt and judged from their own conditions. They had few wants: a cabin, a bed, a pot, fuel, and a potato-garden. These were these easy, almost certain, as it seemed, of supply. They thought that what had been good enough for themselves,—that upon what they had grown up and thriven, would be good enough for their children. They were as sure as the mother should have health and enough of her usual food, so surely would she have sufficiency of nature's food for her child. He should be old enough to "eat the big one with the little one." They were not starving in those days. They left all to God, and did his bidding to "increase and multiply." Nevertheless there were sensible girls, a few who, if they could please themselves, preferred the "boy," the ground of his own; who could offer something better, in hope, than a "poor hire;" some stronger security for livelihood than the "close-fisted" farmer. And some "laboring boys" chose the laborer, the farm-servant rather than that more mingled one of joys and cares, the wife and children. But whoever had a holding had a wife. No matter how small the plot was, he needed some one to help him; to weed, to hoe, to trench, to bind while he reaped, to toss the hay after his mowing, to pick the potatoes after his digging; he wanted some one to sweep the floor, to cook the dinner, to keep the hearth and the heart warm: to say nothing further—there was no help-mate so cheap as a wife.

The more the land was cottiered, the more rapidly the population increased; the poorer in all but men became the neighbourhood. The more middlemen, the more misery!

* "I would now expostulate a little with our country landlords, by unmeasurable screwing and racking their tenants all over the country, have already reduced the miserable people to a worse condition than the peasantry in France, or the vassals in Germany or Poland. That the whole species of what we call substantial farmers will, in a few years, be utterly at an end. It was pleasant to observe these gentlemen laboring, with all their might, for preventing the bishops from letting their revenues at a moderate half-price, (whereby the order would in an age have been reduced to manifest beggary,) a very instant when they were everywhere canting their own land on short leases, and sacrificing their oldest tenants for a penny advance. I know not how it comes to pass (and yet perhaps I know enough,) that slaves have a natural disposition to be tyrants, and when my betters give me a kick, I am apt to revenge it with six of my footman, although, perhaps, he may be an honest and diligent fellow. I have heard great divines affirm that nothing is so likely

VI

Moreover, while this cottiering was going on, sub-division of their holdings by the farmers themselves, for love not money, was in many parts taking place.

At "Shrove" you might hear of a marrying young man and his friends going about the country, within a circle of twenty or thirty miles, match-making at the house of nearly every farmer who had a "colleen," and "means;" "differing," upon the point of means, till happily at length, somewhere, a bargain was closed. Then it only remained for the friends of the young woman to return the visit.—"It lay upon them," by personal inspection, "to see into" the ways and means of the suitor, "to certify" that "the girl and her fortune" were not thrown away, "her little means" to go straight into the landlord's pocket or the usurer's chest. Leases, rent-receipts, &c., were therefore to be examined. Sometimes a knowing or suspicious old farmer would take occasion to slip into the haggard and, by drawing a sheaf here and there out of the stacks, to assure himself that his proposing son-in-law was not a man of straw merely.

It was, usually, the part of the parents at either side to make the match; some kind friend or neighbour interposing to clinch the bargain, persuading one party or both to give way, supposing that they differed upon the boy's settlement or the girl's fortune.

Now, though much importance was given to money and means, still more was in many instances attached to "blood"—hereditary disposition; since it was remarked, and remarkable, that the men of any family you could name made affectionate husbands and fathers generally, or the reverse was the rule. So with the women of a family, generation after generation they proved devoted wives and saintly mothers; while those of another turned out vixens or worse, drunkards—born with a "bad taste in their mouths," verily perhaps, imbibing "the drop" even with their mother's milk.—It need scarcely be said that these last formed an exceedingly small minority.

Once that the match was made by the old people, short work was made of the wooing. The ceremony of previous acquaintance-ship was not deemed indispensable. While the details were determining, if not before, the young couple were brought together and left "to make up to one another." Certainly, for a warm hearted and impulsive race, this matrimonial custom of theirs was a something most singular. It would seem as if wilfully opposed to their natural disposition. They simply gave their hearts, with a will, to those whom God gave them to love. "Marriages are made in Heaven," they said. "The grace of the Sacrament makes you love whether you like it or no."

It may be, however,—for such things would sometimes be, that the young man had set his heart upon having one in particular, and not the eldest unmarried, of a flock of girls, or none of them; and the father of the maids would not give away his Rachel first, "would not cull his daughters for any man!" So if the young Jacob would not take Lia he might go elsewhere for a wife. Any one of those good girls would make a true and loving wife: there was no doubt of that. Thus they married and lived happily, bringing up their children in the fear and love of God. Furthermore, so satisfied were they with the result of "the old custom" in their own regards that they kept it up and carried it in the persons of their children. In fact such a thing as unfairness in the marriage state was nearly unknown.

There were then several ways adopted of settling the young people seemed but natural and proper that if the husband were the only unprovided for, he should bring in his wife to reside with his parents and vice versa, if the wife were an only child. It was not unusual, in certain circumstances, for the father to receive the fortune brought in by the son upon making over the farm to the latter. Sometimes, the young folk were happily set up all at once on their own account; their respective parents putting down "penny for penny," like the Blind Beggar of Bethnal-green, and then letting them take a farm for themselves. Very frequently, the parents at one side divided their own farm between their child, the other party to the contract getting money or meat for the match.

And thus, by more processes than one, it came to pass that the increase of population, consequent upon sub-division of the holdings,—the tilth of those holdings hardly if at all improving, was out of all proportion with the increase of production. What a comfortable condition of society to contemplate this, in which, as in the social scheme of the ancients, thus, population and poverty advanced, in many parts, nearly at the rate of a geometrical progression,—in other terms, every successive lustrum or clearance, that Wealth was just inversely as the Population.

VII

Thus the peasantry were not themselves quite guiltless. Each of them indeed has had its own liabilities; nor are we to suppose that any of them have been called to account for more than its own. We sooner come to look at our rights which are far from us than our duties which are next to us. It seems clear to us, in every instance but our own, that the true law to reach our rights is wrought with the rungs of Duty into the supple of Providence. And it is plain that such was not always the way with the tenant farmers of Ireland took. Are not the duties of the farmer, first, to till the ground efficiently; and, second, to care for their laborers? Many of them were ill cultivators. They were ignorant; they had been hereditarily kept so. They wanted capital: the amount of profit rarely allowed them to accumulate. They were wanting in energy and habits of industry, but too often: their circumstances offered no incentive nor inducement to one or the other. They were a class, hard masters. They not only paid badly, but besides used the power of position so as in great measure to defraud the laborer of his hire. The system, as carried out, was this:—The farmer employed the laborer at nominal wages—three shillings a week was about the average; and he paid in kind, mostly. That is to say, the laborer required for potato ground; and for this the farmer exacted a rent which, in a large majority of instances, required the full labor of the working man to pay. An acre of "garden" of the nominal value of eight pence sterling was held to be a set off against the whole year's work of the laborer.* The price charged was exorbitant. Every laborer

* "The general price of con-acre land was from £6 to £8, for the year's worth about £1 or £1 10s. per acre; and for land and manure, as much as £12 or £14 per acre; but the rent was most usually paid in labor and labour of the worst description, and the con-acre tenant was subject to no taxes: and the owner of the land having no security for deavored to have his "acre of garden;" and in it the digging, seeding trenching, &c., were to be done before or after his usual day's labor. If his potato beds were "lazy," they were not made in laziness. On the produce he depended for the food and clothing of himself, and wife and family if he had them: it is no wonder that they were poorly fed and clothed, and the children uneducated.

Yet the laborer too was not without means of making money, if he were active and industrious and provident. He had a pig or pigs, and sometimes goats and sheep. For the grazing of these last he had to pay the farmer. The pigs and goats had the run of the house and the "range of the road"—"the long meadow!" He fed and fattened the former upon the small and broken potatoes, and the potato peels that remained after meals. His wife had poultry, and sold eggs and fowl. By all which resources they contrived to make many pennies in the year. They mostly managed to spend them.

They lived wretchedly from year's end to year's end, excepting Christmas and Easter day. Throughout whole districts, they eat potatoes dry; a salted herring or milk were rarities. "If they had fish and tea" "on the night of the Big supper," a meat meal on Christmas day, and eggs at Easter, they were content—blessed in so being! They indulged in but one home luxury, tobacco.† They often, however, spent in excess on Sundays and fair and market days as much as might have enabled them to live all the year round in comparative comfort.

Almost every parish had its own amusements, in which gambling had a chief share. Goats, geese, and such small stock were frequently the stakes of cards. Many a shilling, hoarded amidst home privations, was betted away and swilled in porter or whiskey at the bowling or goaling (golfing) match. And the price of the pig changed hands sometimes rent in the event of a failure of the crops, the rent, when paid, included a sort of insurance to cover risk of insolvent years. In some parts of Conemara the usage was more favorable to the tenant; he paid no rent, but planted his potatoes in well manured ground, and gave half the produce to the landlord." Evidence taken before Land Occupation Commission. This alleged explanation, though cited as such, evidently is inconsistent with the facts; for during the growth of the crop the price, labor, was in course of payment. The farmer had the payment whoever had the crop.

* Martin Kenny, Laborer: "If they eat either the little pig or the butter they must go naked." John Griffin, Weaver: "Nine-tenths of this class would go to America, if they got any help; they would not say they would like to go, because it would disoblige the gentlemen; but they would almost all like to go, there is such a report here of the diet being so clever beyond." Patrick Cassidy, Schoolmaster: "The general food of the peasant is dry potatoes; he may sometimes have a herring or a drop of milk; it is a melancholy truth that they can rear the pig but they cannot eat the bacon!" Appendix, A. p.p. 357-8. First Report from the Commissioners for inquiring into the Condition of the Poor in Ireland. Session, 1835.

† The country people almost invariably stated to any of the higher order who attempted to reason them away from tobacco smoking, that they suffered from pain in the stomach which they found nothing to relieve but a "shaugh of the pipe." In many parts, the peasantry subsisted on two meals in the day; and in order to retard digestion of their after a game of hand ball or a cock-fight.* No doubt there were places where such gambling practices did not prevail; but it is more than probable that these were the fewer in number.

How far the poor ignorant laborer was to be blamed, who sacrificed not only his own but his family's comfort and security to satisfy, for the day, selfish inclinations, it is not requisite now to enquire. Enough for the present purpose to consider how far his customary conduct was well as that of the other orders of the state, tended to induce the social condition of Ireland in 1845, immediately previous to the potato blight. It is beyond doubt that, as a body, the laborers were improvident. They did, whilst "bachelors," or less encourage the excesses of the youthful and admiring "buck" the dances and Patrons; but theirs was the more innocent share. As wives, they were examples of self-denial and, for their sluttish customs of thrift also. With them it was all work, no play. They were accordingly the least chargeable with the common improvidence. But as man had to suffer with the woman in the early days, so woman was to suffer with man ever after. In the years of plenty our people knew providence, and when the years of famine came Providence seemed to "know them not." "Want came upon them as a traveller, and as a gary as a man armed." Their food was blighted: their single dependence against every necessity, for every want—the potato, failed. Their help failed with it. When it was gone, they had little to trust to but Providence. And they did die: the Merciful God alone knows how many, in suffering, and with what submissive patience.

VIII.

We need no speculative reasoning to explain how the failure of one kind of crop was effective of such desolation as that of the potato crop in Ireland:—destruction of life, ruin of property and of trade, degradation, demoralization, almost social disorganisation. If the potato was not in itself the root of our misery, it and the misery were not connected. With it the evils grew and flourished; and with it be-food, and so keep off hunger, they were wont to eat the potato in a cooked state—"with the moon in it." But certainly, they made no objection to a general plea for indulging in their favorite luxury. This is a case as reported to the writer by a shop-keeper:—"A laborer named John Hallinan, deceased"—residence stated—"had, during fifteen years, credit from me in the matter of soap and tobacco to the amount of from £5 to £8. The soap account amounted usually to seventeen shillings and four pence, yearly. With the produce of the sale of a pig, that he fattened and sold to meet this debt especially, Hallinan discharged half-yearly the amount accruing. Hallinan himself, his old wife Betty, and two out of three sons were smokers."

* Cock-fighting has withstood both law and enlightenment. The law against it is year after year transgressed with impunity; the fanatics of one district meeting those of another on some neutral ground there fighting out their "mains" satisfactorily. At these meetings, and that if mentioned might seem incredible are gambled; and some of the worst and most brutal passions are frequently excited amongst the engaged. It has been stated to the writer by a witness to the occurrence, that, not very many years since, a sporting gentleman farmer—now deceased—residence stated—staked and lost on a decisive match, fought against parish, the amount of rent £120, he it more or less, that he was about to pay in order to redeem his farm then under ejectment. This course, was an extreme case.

part of the produce of the soil. It was a plentiful crop, and while it yielded a return in kind there was little danger of starvation; for the poorest had his patch of garden. Even the migrative Mayoman or Kerryman had a potato-plot near his hovel, which he, after the trenching, driving a nail in the cabin door, "left to the care of the Lord," whilst he went to work in England, Scotland, or Leinster, and his family begged the country and were fed from the produce of larger "gardens:" for the farmer never refused a handful of potatoes to "the poor man's child." Moreover, it was the people's own. All other crops they grew for other mouths, this was their own. It was on this the peasantry entirely depended for support. Then the blight came. Still the landlord should have his rent and the creditor his debt; they also had to live. But when famine broods over a besieged city or when provisions run short at sea, the high and the low, master and servant, are brought to the same level; the common right of humanity asserts itself over and above the social rights of any. It was not so here in Ireland. Community of danger failed to induce community of interest; hence the destruction of life, the ruin of property, and loss in trade; hence, too, pauperism. More than a million and a-half, or rather above one-sixth of the entire people disappeared from off the face of the land: died of famine, pestilence, and their effects, or emigrated—more in dread than hope; and many of these last were from amongst the best and most efficient of the labor-class. And yet landlord and middleman broke down; how was that? It is plain enough upon a simple statement.

The farmer who, under ordinary circumstances, did but barely exist whilst paying the rent, or sometimes only a moiety of the rent, now could not do both after having lost that crop which, from the support it gave him and his laborers, was worth to him half his farm's produce. He struggled through the first year by running into debt or into arrear of rent, or by the sale of a portion of his farm-stock. He set the potato for a second blight. In his judgment it was worth the risk; for no known substitute could make up for the loss of the potato. Upon its soundness the entire social edifice depended. Rot was in the principals; and though the whole fabric of the system was bad and abominable, the farmer thought it worth the endeavor to renew the props even of decayed stuff, no better being at hand. Should the old house come down whilst he remained within it he could not expect to come forth uninjured.

The blight of the second year was even more destructive than that of the first. In most instances there was no compromise in rent—"the farmer should take the bad year with the good;" it was "the big one with the little one" over again! The landlord took perhaps a portion of the rent on account; else he distrained, whereby the occupier suffered in his goods and chattels. In either case the farmer had little inducement to cultivate the ground so as to make up for his losses by increased production. He had neither property nor money-interest in his holding. He had no confidence that he should reap what he sowed; or rather he was confident that, unless he crop-lifted, some other should,—landlord, shopkeeper, or rate-collector; since the produce would not suffice to pay all and enable him to live. If the landlord had allowed an arrear to lie over, the farmer had that as well as the current rent, together with a largely increased poor's rate, and shop-debts, to meet; if he had been distrained, he scarcely could expect more consideration in the time to come. Besides, having lost wherewithal he used to feed and pay his laborers, he found the maintenance of them no easy matter. Dispirited he held on, in most instances, cultivating more or less of his holding; but still, a considerable portion of land was again put under potatoes. Again they failed, and again. More distraint, more crop-lifting, fewer laborers employed. Then came the climacteric, the Season of Scattering!

The landlord now tried to compromise, to get up the land or to a the tenantry. All this while there was general suffering in absence general co-operation. There was less and less production where it was most want, whilst the fattening soil remained idle and the labor unemployed; all through want of mutual confidence.

The laborer immediately suffered most; in fact the blight began him at a sweep. For the almost only other matter of value which he possessed, the pig, depended, like himself, on the potato. The stock of swine, too, were at this period much reduced, in consequence of disease that just previously to the years of blight had made severe havoc amongst them. The few that the laborers had they were, through want of food for them, constrained to part with; and mostly at a sacrifice, the market soon having become glutted. The majority of the laborers could scrape together a sufficiency, emigrated. So also did a large number of the farmers, taking with them, in the aggregate, no inconsiderable share of the agricultural capital.

Meanwhile, the landlord had to meet his incumbrances as before. Those incumbrances amounted, it has been calculated, to seventy per cent on the rental. And how was the landlord of either order to seventy per cent whilst not twenty-five per cent, scarcely sufficient in many cases to support his family, was received by him out of his rental. Incumbrances accumulated; creditors became clamorous,—they too families; mortgages were foreclosed. Parliament passed "a Bill to facilitate the sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland."

What of the middleman? He had rent to pay, perhaps also incumbrances to meet, and a family to maintain upon nothing, in the shape of rent. For, his tenant, the cottier, deprived of the potato-crop, had nothing to pay away. Furniture, farm-implements, and small-stocks were sold by the cottier to enable him to quit the country; or, if sufficient for that purpose, to buy food. He allowed his plot to lie idle in order to labor on the roads under the Board of Works; and with Indian corn at nineteen pounds the ton his family nearly starved upon his earnings. Let landlord, middleman, rate-collector do their worst, he defied them. He had a handful of straw in the corner and a pot of the hearth; let them distraint these! In many cases it was not easy to eject; since the small plots were commonly held under "Proprietorship" which gave legal rights not easily dealt with as not easily defined. A practical solution of the difficulty was found in the addition of a clause to the new Poor-Law, forbidding relief to any occupier of more than a quarter-acre of ground. The cottier was pauperised; so, too, was the middleman.

There came a general stagnation in nearly all regular trading. A new importation of maize and other bread-stuffs, and traffic, all but excluded in the same, took place indeed; and Ireland thence became a large importing as well as exporting country. The stream of speculation was turned into this channel. The merchant-class seemed to think that the granaries of the world must soon be exhausted, or that the necessities of our people never would be satisfied. They and the British colleagues bought up vast quantities of corn in the North American and South European ports, and hoarded it for famine prices. Large fortunes were at first said to have been realized. Nor was this to be wondered at; since maize rose rapidly from £6 to £19 per ton. It fell even more rapidly. Food had been brought to famine prices; the people had died; and yet the merchants had not done well.

Doubtless that is a proper economic law which negates interference with private speculation; but there is an older law applicable to those transactions on the whole,—that the price of blood cannot add anything to the public treasury. In this instance it was taken from the stock of the people to become the property of strangers.*

* The removal of the protection from home grown grain, which took place at this period, had necessarily a very decided influence on Ireland, her staple production for exchange being corn. The repeal of the corn-laws did not cheapen the necessities of the agriculturist in a degree equivalent to that of the reduction which it caused in the profit of his produce; and therefore it constrained him either to lessen proportionately his expenditure in the way of second necessities or decencies—manufactured goods, &c., or to decrease in a like ratio his accumulative capital. In the majority of cases, the former was, necessarily, the occurrence; inasmuch as none of the surplus produce remained to him to constitute such capital. It did not, as in the case of manufacturing England, confer upon one and the larger division of the people benefit more than commensurate with the loss sustained by the other. Here the matter was reversed; the benefit accrued to the smaller, the injury fell upon the larger division; the proportion of the agricultural to what may be called the town population being reversed in the countries. There can be no doubt that, taking place during a time of general scarcity, it did, by the cheapening of the food which it caused, lighten very considerably the burden of supporting a mass of pauperism. And it did also render more easy, or rather less desperate, the struggle for self-support maintained by the half-pauper population. But it may be questioned whether the benefit so conferred upon the general people was equivalent to the injury experienced, less directly but not less surely, through the producers of the staple commodity.

Ultimately, however, the loss must come against the owners; and necessarily. Since it is evident that so long as there exist such facilities for emigration, and so many inducements to emigrate, no man dependent for support upon the produce of the ground by his culture of it, will continue to occupy and pay rent for a farm the cultivation of which has ceased to be remunerative. So far only then as the tenant in possession shall have such an interest that will admit of the certain reduction of profit, and yet allow of remunerative occupancy, will he consent to be the loser. And under the present system of tenancy at will or for a short term there can be but few such tenants.

The rents of 1845 seem little likely to be re-established, permanently, at least in our time. Doubtless, a better system of farming will obtain here, and many blades of grass be made to grow where now there is none. But in order to effect such a change it will be necessary, either to supply the want of industrial training in the present class of occupiers and to increase their capital, or to replace these with a new class possessed of the skill and capital required. Having done the one or the other of these things, it will be requisite, whether to preserve or to procure a class of skilled capitalist farmers, to give such farmers an adequately remunerative interest in their holdings; and that must be quite inconsistent with the keeping up of the old competition letting value. "If the rents of 1845 were in many instances even then excessive and far beyond any sums that could be collected from the tenants," (Report of Incumbered Estates Commission, dated 3rd May, 1851,) even then when men were willing to farm for mere subsistence' sake, and Thus have we seen how so much of the mischief of our social state was brought about :—How we fought and feasted ; how some of us fell in in the field and others under the table. How some of us turned our backs on home. Who took the posts of those, and who played their parts, and how. And who took their own parts, God bless them ! How then some of us fell and how some us rose or were “raised.” How some of us married and were given in marriage. How some of us worked. How some of us played and drank. How some of us starved. How the rest of us suffered. And now we come to see how something came home to some of us, after a long time ; and to reflect a little as to how much of all this was of our own fault, and how much of it our misfortune.

We have seen that in the general crash of interests connected with the land the incumbrancer was the last to suffer. Some have gone so far as to say that, under the circumstances, this was not altogether equitable ; that at least he should have had a child's share in the loss of the inheritance. The Legislature, however, in its wisdom, deemed otherwise ; judging that, inasmuch as investment with respect to land having been, by the proprietary laws, practically confined to mortgage, it was but just that the whole loss entailed by their own acts and deeds should devolve upon the proprietors,—that they and those who derived from them should suffer all the evil consequences of their own bad laws. “The sins of the fathers” have been “visited upon their children to the third and fourth generations.”

Mark, however, that even the mortgagee-incumbrancer did not escape loss when, as in many instances of cottiered estates, he was found fool enough to lend up to the rack-rent valuation. The later the incumbrance, of course the more speculative or the more silly must have been the incumbrancer. And now that the price of land has fallen, with the cottier system, the latest incumbrancer receives in answer to his claim —“No effects.” He speculated, and has lost.

Thus, too, turning our eyes backward, considering the connection of fact with fact, passing therefore from Incumbrancing to the extravagance which introduced it, we shall see how Bayard's saying, “Ce qui vient du gant s'en va par la gorge”—“What comes by the gauntlet goes when extra labor was to be had for next to nothing, and when the home-market was exclusive, we need not expect that land will reach to the old price when industry is to be compensated and labor paid for, when the home-market is free to the competition of the world, and population reduced one-sixth. While so large room for labor remains, it matters little, with respect to rent, what increase of produce there may be ; since every increase beyond a fixed point is gained at a more than proportionate increase of cost. It is only when the space for cultivation is limited, that it becomes profitable to expend labor upon the nicer care of garden culture ; for the fact stands, that a certain amount of labor and other capital is to be expended, and it is matter for calculation whether or not such capital can be employed more profitably in one mode of farming than in the other : it is manifest that Swiss cultivation in a North American clearing would not be the most profitable work. Here in Ireland, so long as the extent of land in a waste or untilled state is nearly as considerable as at present, there appears no room for doubt that fine farming must be the less profitable. The landlord must then, except in the case before named, be the loser eventually by free trade. Its immediate effect, however, was, as was said, upon the occupier. In many cases it placed the “feather too much” upon the backs already burdened by the blight.

through the gullet,"—the exponent of the social economics of Feudalism, describes as well the strong handed spendthrift of a later age: extravagance, surviving the nobler qualities with which it kept breach, and bed, and board. So in this instance, as in many others, we shall find that Good and Evil, twin born, do not die together; and that there is a measure of justice in the decrees of Fame:—

"Men's evil manners live in brass;
Their virtues we write in water."

Furthermore.—call them by what names you will, lordly luxury and base excess—genteel extravagance and vulgar improvidence, these, however different in degree, were not only the same in kind but were nearly related, closely allied to one another. 'Tis of human nature that men are extravagant in proportion to the facility with which they obtain the means of expenditure; are improvident in a ratio with the ease of obtaining means of subsistence. In no other civilised country was so fatal a facility of augmenting income or of growing the staple food; in no other country, within the same period, did extravagance attain to such a height or population to such numbers. And when events removed the means of raising subsidiary income through potato rents, and sustenance by potatoes, the ruin of estated property and the havoc of human life were such as no other civilised country, not even France during the Revolution, suffered.

ART. V.—CONVICTS—TRANSPORTATION AND REFORMATION.

First Report from the Select Committee on Transportation, together with Minutes of Evidence—Ordered to be Printed, May, 1856.

What is to become of our Convict population?—How is the dreadful amount of crime prevailing in these countries to be suppressed?—and what arrangements are to be made for the future support of those who have been convicted, but who are about to be again cast on society with the stigma of convictism on their character, are questions that have of late commanded a considerable amount of public attention, and which have called forth a considerable diversity of public opinion. England has for the last century quietly rid herself of these troublesome subjects, by transferring them to her colonies, there to propagate the influence of their baneful habits, and to infest the growing population with the experience of her greatest criminals—but of late years the inhabitants of nearly all those colonies have, after considerable exertion and agitation, succeeded in suppressing this system, by declining to receive any more.

Hence the question, "what is to become of our convict population?" a question more easily asked than answered, and one which has been recently deemed of sufficient importance and difficulty to merit the consideration of a Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to inquire into the convict system generally.

Before that Committee were examined men who had devoted much attention to the subject, whose sympathies are enlisted in the cause of reformation, and whose opinions are, therefore, of the utmost importance in devising a scheme calculated to improve the convict while in durance, and to restore him to society, with some evidence of having been benefited by the discipline which the law has imposed, instead of casting him loose, after a period, with his mind demoralised, in proportion to the extent of his incarceration. Few questions present such difficulties that a Committee of the House of Commons, with its ample power of examining witnesses and acquiring practical information, will not be able to unravel, and to suggest sufficient remedies; but in the case before us there are points that can only be determined by inquiry on the spot, and we, therefore, regret, that, in addition to the Committee appointed to consider this important matter, some measures were not adopted to inquire into the detail of the convict system in our Colonies, and to ascertain by that means the causes of failure and disappointment in that system which has met with such determined opposition from the colonists.

From this source, we think, the most valuable information could have been derived, and the most practical suggestions gleaned for future guidance. We propose, in examining a few of the suggestions supplied in evidence to the Committee, to state our own experience of the management and discipline of convicts in Van Dieman's Land, thereby supplying, so far as we can, an important addition to the labors of the Committee; and pointing out what we conceive to have been the causes of failure in resorting to transportation as a punishment, as well as showing the reasons why a convict population has heretofore been a serious evil in those colonies, where, under different circumstances and management, they would have been a decided advantage, both as supplying cheap labor, not otherwise to be procured, and as creating a large circulation of government money.

The witness, to whose views we give the palm, for good reasoning and somewhat of novelty, is Captain Walter Crofton.

We find that, that gentleman, on taking charge of the Convict Department in Ireland, had peculiar difficulties to encounter—over crowded prisons—"no systematic discipline—the prisoners morally and physically prostrate in every way—there was the want of the element of hope in them, of education, and of everything one would wish to find,"—this was in the year 1854. At the period of his examination before the Committee, we find that, by a display of extraordinary energy and zeal, all this had been remedied, that a complete system had been established, proper classification and separation, means of instruction and lecture adopted, and that even in the short period from the date of his appointment to that of giving evidence, Captain Crofton was able to speak of "extraordinary results"—and we doubt not that, under Captain Crofton's system, as explained in evidence, the best results will continue to follow.

The first point of novelty in Captain Crofton's evidence, to which we draw attention, is, his opposition to the generally approved method of granting tickets-of-leave, as a matter of right, to convicts after they have served a stated short period of their sentence with good conduct. On this subject he says, "However convenient it may be for Prison Authorities to hold out as an inducement to good prison conduct that the prisoners should lose 25 per cent. of their punishment, or be released at the end of the third year instead of the end of the fourth, I cannot think that such a course will tend to genuine reformation. I should be unbelieving in the reformation of any man who would require so strong a stimulus as to be let off one-fourth his punishment to induce his reformation." These sentiments have our full concurrence. We do not believe that the inducement to good conduct by that system is of the right sort, nor can we be satisfied that any improvement so effected could be of a lasting character. We are disposed to the opinion rather, that the outward evidence of improvement would be more the result of expediency in the convict, than of any inward moral conviction of the benefits of a different course of life—therefore we think, with Captain Crofton, that some other and more tangible test should be tried before granting such an indulgence. The manner in which Captain Crofton proposes to apply this test is, in our opinion, the best calculated for the purpose; instead of turning the convicts loose upon the world the moment they have served the regulation proportion of their sentence, with a ticket-of-leave, they are according to the plan explained by Captain Crofton, removed to other Institutions where they are detained until they can procure satisfactory offers of employment, or give sufficient guarantee that they have the means of earning an honest livelihood. It is during this detention that the right tests of reformation are applied; they are allowed increased liberty of action; they are employed as far as possible like free laborers; they are, some of them, sent of messages through the city, sometimes with money, their own earnings, in their pockets, and thus gradually introduced into the new stage of liberty about to be enjoyed by them under their tickets-of-leave.

Captain Crofton does not report any instances of failure or misconduct on the part of the convicts during this preliminary indulgence. Certainly if such did occur the convict was not yet sufficiently reformed to obtain his ticket, and hence the value of this gradual test under circumstances accompanied by a certain amount of temptation. This is, to us, a new feature in the code of Convict Discipline, but it is one that has our fullest approval as a sure test of reformation. We were always opposed to the uniform application of any rule in granting indulgence or shortening the sentence of the law. We wish to see an end put to that system which makes the convict feel that he is entitled to his conditional pardon when he has served a stated period of his sentence, if, even, he only "saves his distance" in point of good conduct. We, like Captain Crofton, want to see some real evidences of reformation before we again set him at large. Had such evidences been at all times insisted upon, and had the gradual test applied by Captain Crofton been brought to bear more generally on all convicts abroad before discharging them to earn their own livelihood, England would never have found herself in the "fix" she is in at present, wanting fields for transportation, while her colonies, sadly oppressed for want of laborers, refuse to receive her convicts. We deny that those colonies opposed transportation altogether on the ground of "pride" against being a convict community, or that such a ground of opposition formed even an important point in the motive for suppressing transportation. We shall hereafter show what were the real causes of grievances, and we think we shall make it evident that the failure of transportation, either to reform the convicts, or to supply the labor wants of the colonies, is more attributable to the system of treatment pursued towards the convicts, than to any objections that can be raised to a sound system of transportation. We are unable to follow Captain Crofton through the details of his most valuable evidence, to none of which can we take any exceptions; on the contrary, we are highly pleased with his system of "gratuity," his mode of education and lectures, and his gradual tests of reformation accompanied by a certain amount of confidence in the convict.

The next point of novelty suggested by Captain Crofton is that transportation (or "deportation" as he calls it) should be confined to such convicts only as show themselves actually reformed, in short, that it should be treated as a reward instead of a punishment. This proposition we conceive contains the elements of answering all the objections that have been raised by the colonists to the reception of convicts, and it also tends to afford the most lasting boon to the convict. We hold that transportation to a young and rising colony is, to a reformed convict, essentially a reward, as opening up a field not only for well paid labor, but also for acquiring position in the social scale, and, perhaps, considerable property. An inquiry into some of the Convict Colonies, Australia and Van Dieman's Land, would disclose many instances of these men, in defiance of maladministration, rising to good position and in some cases to vast opulence, or, as we heard a representative of Her Majesty once express himself, in addressing a meeting, they have become "Lords of Waste and Princes of Forests." These results have, however, been far more limited than they certainly would have been, had such a suggestion as that thrown out by Captain Crofton been acted upon from the beginning. Heretofore, the system has begun at the wrong end, the worst characters were selected for immediate shipment, or what is more to be deplored, all classes were indiscriminately mixed and sent off together. We have, hereafter, to point out some of the consequences arising from this mistake, which will also assist us in determining the principal causee of the opposition set up in the colonies.

Western Australia is the field selected by Captain Crofton as the future home of the reformed convicts—he suggests that place, we presume, for the same reason that will compel us to agree with him—namely, the want of any other; we, however, have our objections to this particular locality in consequence of its proximity to those places which have suffered so much from the former system, and whose free inhabitants will look upon the convict, not in the light of his reformation, but, as one of the old villainous stamp; however, we must accept this as the only colony now left to us for the purpose. Separated from the above objection, there are many advantages attendant on the selection of Western Australia calculated to give the experiment a fair trial. A wide field exists there for the disposal of the convicts; we believe we are not far wrong in saying that the territory comprised in Western Australia embraces an area about eight or nine times as large as the United Kingdom, with a favorable climate, and a soil of at least average quality. The want of laborers is also much felt, which want will increase as the resources of the Colony are developed—and if sufficient inducements to free settlers are held out, that developement will keep pace in sufficient activity to afford full and profitable occupation to all the reformed convicts that England can ever produce.

Our space will not admit of the discussion of the plans by which we would propose to follow out in Western Australia, the work of reformation so ably carried on here by Captain Crofton and his colleagues, or the means we would adopt to give the convict a lasting interest in his own good conduct, after he had regained his liberty, and to secure his anxiety for the welfare of his new home—but, intending to return to the subject on a future occasion, we will for the present content ourselves by examining the former system of transportation, with its results to the colonist and to the convict, and as we are about to do so from personal observation, and to bring the experience of many years to strengthen our inquiry, we hope we may thus throw some light on the principal cause of failure under the old system, and assist those persons whose inclination and opportunities may enable them to promote a better state of affairs for the future.

Before, however, proceeding with our examination, we are anxious to point out one indispensable provision which must be made in order to secure Captain Crofton's proposition a fair trial—we allude to the interval that must elapse between the period of the convict's being selected for deportation and his arrival in Western Australia. The test of Reformation in its most dangerous application will not have commenced until the convict is placed under new control, and has started on his voyage. Here the work of former conversion will be destroyed unless far different means than those heretofore adopted be brought to meet the difficulty. We believe that irreparable injury has in hundreds of instances resulted to convicts from the want of proper superintendence and employment during the long period of the sojourn at sea, and unless both are now provided, even for the reformed convict, we apprehend that much damage and injustice will be done to him. This voyage and its associations have been and will be found quite subversive enough to destroy all the improvement effected by training in the Reformatory Institutions, unless some counteracting influence be brought to bear; therefore, the danger should be guarded against, as it can be, by a little foresight and extra expenditure. If this be not done the preliminary reformation might as well have been let alone; and if the former mode of disposing of these men on board ship, and afterwards employing them abroad, be still persisted in, we shall have another round of agitation from the Colonies, the Reformatory Movement will be there looked upon as a failure, and those very men who have been selected for good conduct will be banished from the scene where so many anxious for their moral and intellectual improvement, are laboring, to be subjected to the most trying ordeals of temptation. Let us hope, then, that full provision will be made for the employment and improvement of those men while at sea, and, above all, that their spiritual advancement will be fully provided for.

We have now to turn our attention to the former administration of the Convict System, and to the remnant of it still existing in the Colonies; and we believe that in that administration will be found more of the evils than can be traced to the innate depravity of the convicts, and that to it may be, as already stated, attributed the opposition given by the colonists to the reception of any more of those unhappy beings.

In order, therefore, to lay before our readers the state of the case, as it existed to our knowledge a few years ago, we must trace the career of the convict from the period of receiving his sentence to his final destination abroad.

He was first transferred to the hulk, to await the despatch of a convict ship; and, during his stay in this temporary floating prison, he was associated with other convicts of more or less depravity, from all quarters, with every imaginable class of offence, each, consequently, bringing his quota of viciousness to fill up the aggregate of this floating Pandemonium. The same association, with somewhat less restraint, continued throughout the entire voyage, and in this state, from two to three hundred convicts remained during a passage of seldom less than six months, under the superintendence, medically, morally and spiritually speaking, of one naval medical officer. True, there were military on board, but they were only to prevent riot, and perhaps mutiny and a general massacre; but the moral guidance, we can not say training, of these men for the months referred to, was entirely, we believe, under the care of this solitary medical gentleman. This living cargo of crime, like a herd of condemned souls on their way to Tartarus, was crowded in the hold of the ship, where every species of transportable offence was blended, and in one common association were mingled, for mutual contamination, the adepts in all the vicious phases of an iniquitous career.

Of course, there usually were, as there must be, many of the number who were not as yet deeply dyed in guilt, or acquainted with the arts or deep laid schemes by which many murders, burglaries, forgeries, larcenies, and a hundred other such deeds, are successfully accomplished—still, there was no guard against free and frequent intercourse. The effects of this were painfully evident in the after life of some of these fallen, but yet not unredeemable, beings. Many commenced the voyage, in a measure, unacquainted with evil deeds, or a tithe of knowledge of what depraved humanity is capable; with but one fatal, perhaps repentant step, across the threshold of crime, yet they arrived at their destination fully initiated in all the plans and arts by which their more guilty companions had carried on their lawless course for years. Some who had heretofore been versed in but one species of crime, came out of this companionship well skilled in all, and sometimes endued with a yearning to try their hands again in some more dexterous scheme than that whereby they had received their own sentence of banishment. It has been an observable fact to us, that, whenever these men were allowed to congregate for conversation without the restraining presence of some one in authority, the subjects discussed were the modes in which villany may be most successfully practised, and the law “dodged”; here the greatest ruffian was the greatest hero; and never did one of our country’s real and admired heroes, on returning with his justly earned laurels, recount with more honest and allowable pride the deeds by which “fields were won,” than would some of these misguided and fallen beings boast of their wicked deeds successfully practised, and crime made a "lucrative profession." The ear, at first shocked by the dreadful recital, received a daily, nay hourly, tuition; gradually it became accustomed to the poison; the early shock was now followed by an interested attention, as the plan of crime after crime unfolded. The interest increased, as in a novel, when the next character comes upon the stage, to tell of his deeds of evil daring and reckless adventure, combined with plans and stratagems, which throw the last half mythical recital into the shade. The early abhorrence of these tales and their heroes was gradually turned to admiration for the men who could conceive and execute such great achievements; the ear was thus taught to believe that the greatest crime was the greatest virtue, that the greatest criminal was the greatest hero; and, stage by stage, lesson by lesson, the man who entered the convict ship, with little of crime and its mode of accomplishment to disturb his future career and reformation, leaves it well instructed in all the arts which constitute a thorough villain. Thus far, while the law had punished its transgressor, the mode of its administration had taught him to despise its purity, and to further transgress it without compunction; his mind being at the same time rendered callous to its moral excellence, and well instructed how to sin, and yet evade its enactments.

We recently printed in THE IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW an article on Prison Discipline, from which we extract the following description of one of the scenes enacted by these unhappy people when allowed uncontrolled association. Our attention was directed to this Article subsequently to having written the foregoing observations, and it therefore affords additional evidence of the evils arising from the system which we so much condemn:—

The scenes which take place in gaols of this description, especially at night, when fourteen or more are locked up together in one room, without inspection, and with such light only as the moon and stars furnish through the grated windows, baffle all description. Gambling with stealthily fabricated dice or cards for the next day's food, fighting, singing vile songs, reciting tales of villany and debauchery, teaching or concocting crimes, with the most virulent oppression of the few who may be better disposed, are the common features of the horrid scene. If there be men who have a turn for the drama, plays are acted, and the most solemn scenes of the Court of Justice are the popular subjects. The most guilty criminal is the one most looked up to.

"In the assize (writes a prisoner) there was a considerable number of what are called first offenders,—nine or ten including myself, the remainder forming an overwhelming majority; two of them murderers, both of whom were subsequently condemned to death. I cannot reflect without pain on the reckless conduct of these two unhappy men during the two weeks I was with them. As regarded themselves, they appeared indifferent as to the probable result of their coming trial. They even went so far as to have a mock trial in the dayroom, when, one of the prisoners sitting as judge, some others acting as witnesses, and others as counsel, all the proceedings of the Court of Justice were gone through,—the sentence pronounced, and mockingly carried into execution. I shall not soon forget that day, when one of those murderers was placed in the cell amongst us, beneath the Assize Court, a few moments after the doom of death had been passed upon him. Prisoners on these occasions eagerly inquire, ‘what is the sentence?’ Coolly pointing the forefinger of his right hand to his neck, he said, ‘I am to hang!’ He then broke into a fit of cursing the judge, and mimicked the manner in which he had delivered the sentence. The length of his trial was then discussed: all the circumstances that had been elicited during its progress were detailed and dwelt upon,—the crowded state of the Court, the eagerness of the individuals present to get a sight of him, the grand speech of his Counsel,—all were elements that seemed to have greatly gratified his vanity, and to have drugged him into a forgetfulness of the bitterness of his doom. He then dwelt upon the speech he should make on the scaffold, was sure there would be an immense concourse of people at his execution, as it was a holiday week; and from these, and numerous other considerations, drew nourishment to that vanity and love of distinction which had, in no small degree, determined, perhaps, the commission of his crime. To minds in the depths of ignorance, and already contaminated by vicious and criminal courses of life, such a man becomes an object of admiration. They obtain from him some slight memorial—such as a lock of his hair, or some small part of his dress, which they cherish with a sentiment for which veneration is the most appropriate term; while the notoriety he has obtained may incite them to the perpetration of some act equally atrocious.”

On the arrival of the ship at its destination, after being for months the pest house in which the united experience of between two or three hundred convicts has, by a species of human friction, increased in some, and matured in others, their vicious habits, they were then dispersed throughout the several Probation Stations to undergo a period of probation,—intended, it is presumed, to test the amount of moral improvement which their recent association had wrought in them, and to qualify them for private service, where they would have opportunities of dispensing to their employer’s children the morality acquired by the teaching of their companions. At these stations the same indiscriminate association was permitted, all classes of crime, character, and disposition, were congregated ; no rule that we are aware of appeared to apply in fixing their destination as they were called out in alphabetical order and arrangement, and were thus sent in batches varying from 20 to 50 to the several stations. Here they were encountered by hundreds of criminals, who had passed through the same sad apprenticeship but a few years or months before ; and here, too, old acquaintanceships were renewed, and former exploits gaily or regretfully, expatiated on. The new arrival interests his old companion with a history of the many villainies he had perpetrated since they were separated, while the "probationer" entertains his ci-devant "pal" with a history of the station where their mutual reformation is to be effected, and instructs him how, in furtherance of that reformation, he may best "dodge" the officers, and evade the observance of the regulations. Added to this there might be found at each of these stations, old offenders who received the sentence of the law ten and twenty years previously, but whom all discipline, (such as it was,) all coercion, and manifold punishments, had failed to reform. Not that the elements of reformation were entirely extinct, but that the means adopted to revive them in this unfortunate class of men were calculated more to harden the heart, to deaden all feelings of soul, to extinguish for ever all ideas of an over ruling Providence in their breasts, and incite to further crime.

With such men as those last referred to, whose record of offences, or "character," as they themselves call it, had long since filled the allotted parchment sheet, (no mean document in size), and who would require to live three times the ordinary period of human existence, ere they could serve half the additions to the original term of their sentence, with men guilty of every offence known to human laws, some of them of a character too revolting to name, were those newly arrived probationists placed in unrestrained community—what wonder, then, that many of those new comers, instead of reforming, and passing through their ordeal of probation in one or two years, imbibe the principles of their associates, and go on, from offence to offence, and crime to crime, till they become a convict and probationist for life. Nor is it to be wondered at, that such as pass through this ordeal and are transferred to private service, frequently disappoint their employers, break out on every opportunity, and indulge in every excess, for a time denied to the body, but confirmed, and made beautiful to the mind; that many of them, after a short period, are returned to their moral destroyers, to continue, and increase, if possible, their knowledge of depravity; and to end a life of misery, cut short by the slavery of chains, or the more speedy appliance, the hangman's rope.

We cannot too strongly deprecate this fatal error, little is known of it at home, because the fruit is seldom ripe until boardship and colonial associations are added to the sentence of the law; but were it in the power of any enquiring mind to carry itself to Norfolk Island, or Port Arthur in Van Dieman's Land, scenes of depravity and misery would there present themselves, beyond the power of pen to describe, and almost too horrible to contemplate. All nature sickened by the disgusting and revolting repudiation of her laws; men once possessing the germ of virtue, perhaps, in their breasts, but now totally eradicated, become beasts of such ferocity, that irons and chains alone can control them; and all this, we believe, the result of a system that sought alone to punish the transgressor by imposing toil and discipline on the body, while the real substratum of all moral improvement, the MIND, is not only totally neglected altogether, but actually forced into positions of imbibing the most fatal passion. We do not wish to be understood as saying that there was no provision made for the moral and religious instruction of these unhappy men, or that the system under which they were demoralised did not profess to teach them better things; but we do say that the provision was very inadequate, there being at most only one Protestant, and sometimes one of the Roman Catholic instructors attached to the largest stations, and those not at all times the most happy selections. It is not our object or wish to inculcate individuals, but it might prove a profitable subject of enquiry whether the instructors were men possessing all the elements of Christian benevolence and uniformity of temper, which should characterise their holy calling. We fear that in their case, as well as that of other classes of officers, it would be found that their sense of dignity and self importance often surpassed their moderation; that their mode of administering consolation sometimes tended rather to irritate than soothe—and that their self control was not of a character to excite admiration for their command of temper. It would be found perhaps that the convict has often paid the penalty for indulging in peculiarities of temper in presence of the officer, while the officer has shown himself incapable of subduing a similar disposition in presence of the convict. We have heard of instances where the spiritual consolation offered to one of these unhappy men, when subjected to solitary confinement for offences committed against the rules of the establishment, was to the effect that he was only, so far, served right, that it was a pity his punishment was not more prolonged.

Surely, under such circumstances, it would be very hard to persuade that convict of any improvement or benefit intended to his moral character, or to convince him that such a monitor possessed qualifications worthy of respect, or attributes calculated to bring balm to the wounded spirit. If any shreds or memory of early religious instruction remained, the convict could perceive at once that such a bearing in a consoler was entirely at variance with the religion of HIM who "was meek and lowly in heart."

We cannot too loudly denounce such conduct in men who, as messengers of Christ, accepted work in His distant vineyard, but who, by sad mismanagement in the vintage season, produced vinegar instead of wine,—sad offering for their Master's glorious banquet, where the repentant sinner is the most cherished guest, and where the feast is garnished by brotherly love.

Again, we would enquire whether in the selection of religious instructors where no such indecency as the above could be traced, they were in other respects men of that tact, energy, and mental capacity, as we require for such a work—we say emphatically, they were not. We know of one instance of a clergyman who, though a man of unquestionable piety and Christian benevolence, had the peculiarity of preaching and reading by a rule so contrary to all the methods of diction that we were acquainted with, that, though we were favored with his ministry for some years, we could never follow him through one of his arguments, or understand what he wished to convey. Yet this gentleman had the sole religious charge of two Probation Stations at a distance from each other of thirty miles, in a country without roads, or other mode of travelling than on foot or on horseback; besides which, he was the only minister of his own persuasion for the cure of souls in the entire county. It may be seen at once that, in the case of the two stations under the spiritual control of this clergyman, it was quite impossible that any instruction could be derived, or seeds of amendment sown, in the one hour each week devoted to the convicts for this purpose. They were, therefore, left to the chance of encountering a good example from their lay officers, who were not the most edifying teachers, though excellent disciplinarians. So that the convicts may literally be said to have dragged through their probation term without the consolations of religion, or the precepts of their lay guardians, in any proportion to their requirements; and to have passed into private employment, all of them in a degree worse men than when they set out on this voyage of repentance. Many of them soon return to the station in an infinite degree worse than when they left, with their relish for sinful indulgence whetted, and in almost the last stage of human depravity.

Our objections to this system are not, however, confined to the want of sufficient consideration being attached to the moral and religious training of the convicts sent abroad, as we have also to glance at the manner in which they are employed. This seems to have been made a matter of as little care and forethought as that branch of the system we just attempted to describe. We have accompanied the convict from the hulk to the station to which he had been sent for training, and, of course, a species of purification; we have seen the opportunities afforded him for mental culture, and we have glanced at some of the fruits—bitter indeed—of that system. Let us now hastily examine how far his employment at those stations was calculated to excite a desire for industry, to improve him in the trade or avocation he followed before his fall, or to enable him to be of most benefit to society and himself, when he is drafted to private service. From some perverted reasoning which we never could sufficiently comprehend, it appears to have been determined by the authorities in the Penal Colonies, that regardless of previous habits and education, without reference to birth, breeding, or early culture, and never taking into consideration the quantity or quality of crime for which the doomed one was convicted, all alike must in their first stage work side by side in the gangs, and become what is known in Ireland as “a laboring man.” Hence we have community of disposition and qualifications, all supposed to derive equal benefit from the same source and daily amount of labor. We did at one time seek to be informed how it was calculated that the objects of transportation were to be promoted by this system, and how the system was to be applied equally to men, all their former lives accustomed to labor, and those whose path heretofore was on the carpet walk of life, and to whom, therefore, the task of a trained workman would be an impracticability, without either showing partiality to the trained workman, or undue harshness to the untrained. It was explained to us that though the accomplishment of the daily task would in one case be attended with greater hardship than in the other, still the proportionate rate of punishment was equalised, for inasmuch as he of former respectability had less incitement to crime, and was, therefore, more inexcusable in its commission, it was considered only fair that his continued punishment should be more severe than that of the more ignorant offender. So, we presume, that the same astute mind which originated this theory, also determined by some process of mental calculation, that, in proportion as the offence in one case was supposed to be greater than in the other, so the deserts and dole of punishment would be nicely balanced by requiring each to perform the same description and amount of daily labor. We considered this, when we heard it, to be one of the most monstrous absurdities that ever came under our notice; yet its application was nevertheless rigidly insisted upon.

Now if we suppose the allotted task to be a hard day's work for a laboring man, as a punishment task should be, how then is the more delicate and uninitiated convict to perform so much, and yet if he does not keep pace with his hardy companion he is immediately punished for "idleness." He is sentenced, perhaps, to three days solitary confinement on bread and water, and is by that process made still less capable of attempting the work again; and, when he does resume work, it is with more depressed spirits, and, as a natural consequence of bread and water aliment, physically weaker and only ready to earn fresh punishment on the same score. Or, on the other hand, should the day's work be allotted with regard to the capabilities of those who had previously been unaccustomed to labor, then the strong and inured escape their fair proportion of toil, and the amount of punishment must in either case be unequal and disproportioned.

It has also been a matter of difficulty to us to realise the amount of good to be derived from the system of employing these men at occupations of which they had formerly known nothing.

We have seen a motley group composed of writing clerks, accountants, apothecaries, bakers, tailors, shoemakers, painters, with numerous other trades, and in a few instances former professional men, all working with the spade, or adding to their stock of knowledge by making roads, stone breaking, or drawing hand carts like beasts of burden. This we think a sad mistake, as it degraded such men, and gradually levelled their aspirations to the standard of ordinary day laborers, if not to that of the beasts whose position they were called on to occupy. We know it can be replied that such was the position in which they could be made most useful to the "system," and that there was not employment for them at their own calling, or even any thing at all like it. But we answer, that the system should have been made useful to them, instead of adapting them to a system notoriously bad, and if it was ever intended to improve them in mind or acquirements, the system should have inconvenienced itself, and made a field for their several callings. But alas ! this system, bad in all other respects, had not even the redeeming feature of consistency ; one of its avowed objects was to make the establishments as nearly as possible self-supporting. We have seen a Probation Station where enormous expenditure was incurred with this ultimate object in view ; mills, kilns, barracks, reservoirs, and many other costly works, were erected on a favorite spot where the surrounding soil was peculiarly fertile, and enjoying a climate as salubrious as could be desired. We have seen the immense forest "Grubbed up," become a vast and splendid farm, and beginning to assume all the appearance of the culture and old civilization of the mother-country, with a produce beyond all our experience in such matters. The establishment promised not only to be self-supporting, but we are convinced there would in time have been a large surplus, yet at this stage the whole was abandoned—for what reason we could never tell, or speculate to ourselves in a satisfactory manner—the splendid offices, granaries, &c., were left to moulder to decay, and the farm to return to its primeval state.

But to return to the arrangements for work in the field ; the men in these gangs happen to be composed of the very varied and opposite materials in shape of temper, that may be found in any promiscuous assembly, and it is perhaps to this indiscriminate herding together of conflicting elements, all to be controlled by the same officer, that the greatest misfortune to individual convicts may be attributed. We admit how difficult it would be to make a classification, in order to arrive at a harmonious blending, but it might be done to a considerable extent; however, our complaint against this part of the system is not confined to the mode of employment, but also to the class of men usually selected as overseers of gangs, and we allude to this matter in the hope that the Directors of the Reformatory Institutions may devote some of their attention to the avoidance of similar blunders. Many of those overseers came in contact with us, and though we are convinced they were men of unimpeachable integrity and uprightness of conduct, we are equally sure they were as innocent of the mode of dealing with different temperaments, and as ignorant of the methods of reform, as they were of the laws of Confucius. Selected from a class whose principal object was the earning a livelihood, and uninfluenced by the slightest anxiety for the future well being of their charge, without the power of discriminating between the constitutionally incapable, and the wilfully lazy—armed with an authority most dangerous to invest such persons with, we have seen these overseers “lord it over” their unfortunate fellow beings in a manner that has frequently involved the most disastrous consequences to the latter. The grand and, indeed, the only desideratum, as far as we could observe, of these overseers, was the exacting a certain amount of obedience, and a good day’s work, which good day’s work they would have at any cost whatsoever to the convict; here commences the downward career of many an unhappy prisoner; stung by the ignorance or want of discrimination of his officer, who is incapable of appreciating his exertions because those exertions fail to accomplish the allotted task, he despairs of giving satisfaction or creditably serving his period of probation, and in this dilemma he has the rashness to remonstrate. Then, indeed, he makes himself the victim of vindictive, uncompromising cruelty; he is immediately charged with “idleness and insolence,” of which the overseer really believes him guilty; no proof is required beyond the mere ipse dixit of his accuser, no palliating circumstances are sought for or believed, if offered, and he is summarily consigned to the dark and solitary cell for a period, varying according to circumstances, of from fourteen days to one calendar month, or the last scintilla of self-respect is quenched by the torturous stroke of the lash. We have known instances where the use of a little discernment, or discretion, would, we are persuaded, have had a most salutary effect on the mind and conduct of the convict, who was rendered desperate by coercion.

But the period of which we write was not considered one of reform; the entire object seemed to be punishment for past offences, and exacting discipline as a means to insure future good consequences. Many unhappy beings whose original sentence was only seven years transportation, and who have now served three times that period, are still toiling on in thralldom and chains, because they have been goaded to desperation by the, we will not say wilful, but ignorant zeal and persecution of their officers. We have had vast experience of these unhappy men, and we have seldom found them inaccessible to kindness and reason, indeed we have observed that those who revolted most against coercion, were the more easily subdued by firmness tempered with kindness, and, when once convinced that their own interest was sought for, and ultimate reformation desired, they willingly obeyed, and endeavored to improve. At the period of which we write, our mind was deeply impressed with the importance of endeavoring to win by encouragement, and edify by example, instead of brutalising by coercion and the lash, and to awaken in the mind of the convicts under our immediate supervision any latent good, or memory of any early moral instruction, instead of eradicating it, by provoking feelings of detestation to authority, and opposition to all discipline. Our authority was limited, and our views were necessarily confined to our own knowledge, as strict rule, discipline, and routine, were the features of the system we were employed to carry out, and by the general regulations, all infringements demanded and received summary punishment. It was our desire, as far as in our power lay, to cause all the rules and regulations to be strictly observed, but to avoid the punishments as far as possible—in other words, to make the observance of the rules a matter of principle, instead of a motive for escaping chastisement, such being, to our mind, the most effectual method of restoring those men to a proper sense of their position, and inducing them to acknowledge the justice of their sentence, and regret for its cause, on their emancipation from their term of probation.

The station to which we were attached usually contained between three and four hundred convicts, divided into four classes, the best conducted being the first class, while the fourth was composed of those who in consequence of local offences were degraded to work in chains; it therefore rejoiced in the local cognomen of "chain gang." All newly arrived convicts commenced their course in the third class, thence, at short intervals, they graduated upwards or downwards as their conduct merited. Our supervision was over the second class, the medium position, consequently our mode of treatment was of importance, inasmuch as, its consequences, either placed the convict in a recognized position of good conduct, or degraded him to work on in hopeless despondency. We confess that we imposed upon ourselves a most difficult, and often a most disheartening task, but we found that perseverance was generally rewarded. Often and often, have we had to take one of these men aside, ostensibly for another purpose, and having pointed out the misconduct that had come under our observation, speak to him as a being possessing human feelings, and liable to human weaknesses. We could recount several instances, where the most hardened, many of them patriarchs in years as well as in sin, had been melted to tears when in familiar conversation we have accompanied him through the scenes of his early history, and home recollections of "the old familiar faces," gradually reviewing his course, from the days of childhood and innocence, to the moment at which we were speaking. Then shifting our discourse to the capacity and disposition of our listener, tell him somewhat of the higher destiny for which man was created, and implore of him, not for our sake, but for his own, to act on our suggestion, to come to us with all his heart-burnings and troubles, to look on us as desirous to befriend him, and to seek our advice without fear of his motives being misinterpreted. Our disappointments were many; often within short periods have we had occasion to resume our warnings to the same person, but we did resume them, pointing out the ingratitude he had shown to us, reminding him of the consequences had we resorted to the ordinary discipline, and again appealing to his better feelings, and convincing him of his personal interest in the matter, we have, in numerous instances, brought about a state of obedience and good conduct, that no coercion, we are persuaded, would never have accomplished. Another plan of ours was to assemble our class occasionally in the evenings, after calling over the muster roll for bed, and in the yard adjoining the dormitory, without the presence of another officer, we would address them in a body, we would point out any circumstances with which we were displeased, and we would speak to them as if their short comings were a subject of personal grievance to us, as well as being an infringement of the regulations. We tried and succeeded in exciting a desire of emulation amongst them; and we hesitate not to say, as a result of our plan, that many whose case at first appeared hopeless attained private service, and succeeded well, so far as we subsequently had opportunities of tracing their career. As well as we can remember, at this period, there were but three instances where we had to degrade any of our men to a lower class, but we must in honesty confess to having received many of them back from the first class. This, however, in our partiality for our own plan, we were disposed to attribute more to the management of that class, than to the fault of the men,—perhaps a little of both was the true cause.

We found that by our system we were enabled to get comparatively willing labor—our class, with the assistance of an admirable overseer, possessing all the qualities we desired, soon distinguished themselves for their industry, order, and cleanliness. We received the marked approval of our superior officers, and we, at this moment, feel happy in the contemplation, that years ago we acted by the rule which is now receiving general approbation as the best. With our promotion, which we subsequently attained, our opportunities increased, as we could then interfere with men out of our class without being considered intrusive; on favorable occasions we spoke, as already described, to some of the worst characters of the “chain gang;” we promised to obtain for them a repeal of some of that degrading sentence, as a reward for certain appearances of an improvement in conduct, and if they did not infringe on our conditions for a stated period. In some cases we succeeded, in some we did not, but, even here, we found, that our system produced ample results, and that men, despairing of ever shaking off their chains, or enjoying liberty in this world, were roused to a sense of their condition, with new hopes awakened, and we afterwards saw some of these men in private service. We fear that these remarks present something of the appearance of self-praise, but we utterly disclaim all such feeling; we are simply endeavoring to explain the system which we found beneficial, indulging in the hope, that others may be induced to try its efficacy. In doing this we are unavoidably led to state our own share in the experiment, and we feel constrained to show that while our motives, and most of our adopted means were only known to ourselves, their results called forth the marked approval of those to whom we were responsible. We anxiously trust that the directors, and other authorities connected with the Reformatory Movement, will give their most careful consideration to the selection of the officers of these establishments, particularly, those to be employed in a subordinate capacity. On these, in an infinite degree, will depend the success of the scheme, and it will be found, that in proportion as the officers exercise their authority with discretion and firmness, but at the same time with a knowledge that they are dealing with fellow beings possessed of hearts and an immortal soul, so will the prisoners learn to respect and imitate that example, and be grateful to the system which, while it punishes crime, provides for their moral and intellectual advancement.

The failure of all past experiments may be attributed to the mode of their administration. The theory of the last system was not in itself bad—namely, to sentence an offender to a period of transportation, to send him abroad, and there to place him for a time under a system of discipline and training, and then to discharge him to private service. But we have stated some of the results of this system when left to a casual administration. We are more apprehensive regarding the selection of subordinate officers than those of a higher class, because, from the position they are called on to occupy, and their rate of remuneration, they are not generally of that class possessing the most essential qualifications, therefore this point will require careful consideration and judgment, more particularly when it is remembered that those are the officers who will have most frequent intercourse with the convicts, and whose influence and example will therefore be of the most material importance; and it may be relied upon, that unless the prisoner sees something in the officer placed over him commanding his respect and making him feel his own inferiority, there will be no improvement wrought in that case, but he will inwardly despise that which he considers unworthy of imitation. Opportunities seldom presented themselves to us of forming an opinion of the qualifications of the officers connected with prisons in England and Ireland, nor are we aware of the extent of their desire to benefit the moral condition of the convict, or of their power of self-control and moderation in cases where their example is likely to leave a lasting impression. In the class of officers with whom we were acquainted, we frequently had to deplore the extreme selfishness and disregard of example which characterized their exercise of authority; and we have often wondered at the rigor with which they would cause the convict to be punished for following an example set by themselves, or for indulging in a forbidden luxury, which they themselves had supplied. We will instance the case of smoking tobacco; that article was foremost in the forbidden fruit of the Probation Stations, its use or possession was an offence against the rules of discipline demanding summary chastisement. Possibly, nine-tenths or more of the convicts had formerly been much given to the habit of using it, consequently its want was a great and trying privation. The overseers in many instances would smoke all day when superintending their class at work, thus creating in the men a longing for that which they otherwise might have forgotten, and keeping alive a desire that might in course of time have died away altogether. This, to our mind, was both selfish and cruel to a degree. But they have gone farther; many of them have supplied the convicts with tobacco for some trifling service rendered by the convict in his spare time to the household economy of the overseer or other officer; or it has been given by their wives, and yet the convict has been punished and degraded for having it in his possession, and declining to tell where he got it, having received it under a solemn promise to that effect. Now, we do not complain of the fact, that tobacco and other luxuries are denied to the convicts while under penal servitude; we think it quite right that such an arrangement should be insisted upon. But we strongly protest against his appetite for those luxuries being excited, and made ravenous by seeing others use them under his eyes, and his longing for a smoke increased by the atmosphere which he breathes being perfumed by the pipe of his overseer. The entire absence of principle too, displayed in the overseer by allowing his family to supply an article and then punish the convict for yielding to the temptation. We hope such practices are not tolerated in the institutions at home, and that the officers of those institutions look with as much horror on such a proceeding, as we do; but, as we before observed, we have had no opportunity of judging for ourselves in this particular, or their disposition towards the convicts generally.

We were at one time acquainted with an officer from the Model Prison at Pentonville, who was called upon to exercise his powers of management in the country in which we met; he was a most worthy man, and a most rigid disciplinarian—one whose eye would detect a forbidden piece of bread, the size of a shilling, in a prisoner's coat pocket, or the smallest particle of dust on the sole of his shoe; he would also, at a glance, observe a half-formed spider's web on a ceiling fifteen feet high, or he would discover that an iron pot about to be placed the next moment on a smoking fire was not burnished to the finest polish of steel; but we believe that a prisoner's moral condition never cost him a thought; he literally made clean the "outside of the cup and platter," while the inside, (the prisoner's mind,) was uncared for as a thing not worth his notice.

If we take this gentleman's ideas of reformation as a specimen of the system pursued at Pentonville, where he received his training, we may feel fully assured that the establishment is very clean, well dusted, and conducted in a manner calculated to excite the highest admiration of a casual visitor; but we question whether there will be found existing between the prisoners and those placed over them a mutual feeling that the permanent or ultimate good of the prisoner is intended. We are bound, however, to believe, from what we have read of this Institution, that matters are conducted there in a more generous and discerning manner. When we remember the training of the poor banished convicts, and its influence on their subsequent career, we are not surprised to find that, the first act of the local legislature of Van Diemen's Land on obtaining a free Constitution was, to take vigorous measures for the stoppage of transportation to the colony altogether, and this at a period when the colonists were in the greatest difficulty for want of labor, owing to the discovery of gold in Australia, whither all the free laborers from the adjoining colonies at once flocked, leaving the old fixed "settlers" without the means of cultivating their farms. Had this step of the colonists been taken at an ordinary period, we could attach no importance to it, as they naturally enough might be considered desirous to shake off the stigma of being a convict community, and their island still continuing to be the receptacle of the crime of all the British Dominions, but we attach a vast importance to the act under such circumstances as the above, as, it proves, beyond all contradiction, that the colonists would prefer to leave their farms uncultivated, and their property uncared for, or pay a ruinous rate of wages for free labor, rather than be associated with men immersed in all villany, and debased by mutual contamination. Nor, when we bear in mind that the colonists were not at all times convinced of the integrity of their officers, or that the labor of the convict at the probation stations, was always applied for the benefit of the public; are we astonished by the announcement in the newspapers, that the same Legislative Body which successfully struggled against transportation, appointed a committee to enquire into the working of the remnant of the system still existing. But the head of the convict department, the Comptroller General, unwilling to encounter an unpleasant investigation, refused to appear before the bar of the House of Assembly, and subsequently, we believe, left the Colony altogether, to escape the tender mercies of the sergeant at arms. Let the Home Authorities then take warning by the facts spoken of from the south, and let them be well convinced that they do not fall into the same error. The ticket-of-leave system will soon begin to unfold to the public whether the convicts are improved by their present mode of treatment, or whether, as in the case considered, they have been made so much the worse, in proportion as they have been kept under discipline and under the teaching of each other.

Looking back at the bitter fruits of the old "system," we are not astonished at the colonists having almost a loathing for both convict and his labor; they found him a serpent in their homesteads and an unwilling drudge in their fields, all occasioned by the debasing "system." Indeed we think that these circumstances which we have brought to view, will afford full and sufficient explanation of the hostility of the colonists to receiving any more convicts, and that to them, rather than to motives of "pride," may be attributed the opposition the system has encountered in the face of a pressing demand for laborers; but we still hope that the dawn of a new era is breaking on this all important subject, and that under a proper and well regulated system, wherein the convict would be properly trained at home, and only those who show good symptoms of reformation sent abroad, the hostility of the colonists will be withdrawn. We also fully anticipate that the colonies will be again thrown open to the reception of all that can be made useful, as industrious and well conducted servants, by which arrangement we feel confident the interests of every party would be promoted.

In the present state of public feeling, and the manifest desire to restore these men to a recognised position in the social scale, we are not without hope that most of the evils and injustices to which we have drawn attention will be promptly met and checked, or that at all events the convict will not be made a worse moral subject by his incarceration than he had previously been. Years must elapse ere the evils arising from the mal-administration of the old convict system will have died away; in hundreds of cases they can only cease with the life of the convict, in others an improved system, even now in the twelfth hour, might have its due effect. We therefore hope that the present endeavor to improve the moral condition of the convicts at home will be equally extended to those in our colonies who have been the victims of a less discerning course of discipline. And we anxiously pray that such selection of officers may be made, both at home and abroad, as will ensure to the convict a fair chance of availing himself of the benevolent intentions of the advocates of the reformatory movement. Our principal ground of hope, however, attaches to the application of the reformatory discipline to the juvenile convicts; in their case the mind is not past moulding to a sense of better things, besides, this is striking at the root of the evil. Let the erring youths of our present community be taught the right path, with moral training accompanied by the ordeal of suffering for justly punished deeds, and there will be little dread of an important diminution in our calendar of crime. The iniquitous haunts of villany, once swept out, must yield to the enlightened progress of the day, and these youths, instead of becoming hereafter the fathers of a race destined to pursue the same vile courses, which they inherited as a birth-right, may become the honest and virtuous fathers of children born to a good example and a comfortable home.

So many admirable papers have been written, and practical suggestions thrown out, as to the management of our juvenile offenders, that we feel it unnecessary to enlarge on the subject; but, from what we have already written relative to the appointment of officers, it may be judged with what pleasure we perceive that the subject is now considered the most essential item in the great scheme of reformation. A judicious selection of teachers, unaccompanied by sectarianism and polemical differences, will, to our mind, produce the most beneficial results. But if party feeling and religious animosity are allowed to disturb the harmony of the reformatory institution, particularly in Ireland, the primary object will soon be swallowed up, in the unfathomable gulf of controversy and strife about words.

Being anxious to examine for ourselves the extent of improvement observable under the new system of reformation, so far as it has been tried in Dublin, we recently obtained admission, through the kindness of a friend, into the Smithfield Reformatory in this city, the first Institution of the kind established in Ireland, and that principally referred to in the evidence of Captain Crofton. We selected, as the time most likely to see things as they really are, not what they appear to the casual visitor, the hour of between 7 and 8 o'clock P.M., such being to our knowledge the period when order and regularity are somewhat thrown aside, being a sort of idle interval between the cessation of work and the arrangement for supper and bed. We did not want to see this Institution at a time when the prisoners and all things in the prison were in inspection trim; we had seen enough of that, and were prepared to know that the visitor might find all things very orderly and well regulated while his visit lasted. We desired to slip in, so to speak, and find matters in the undress of homely life. With what pleasure we record this visit—instead of finding the prisoners lounging about as was usual at that hour, indulging in idle, and often profane discourse, or chewing the cud of bitter and remorseful thought, we found that a lecture room had been established to improve and open up their minds, and if possible, win them back for society here, or make them steady, law-obeying men for one, or other of our colonies, Canada or Australia. In this room we found all the prisoners assembled, apparently contented, and listening to a most instructive, useful lecture, and one calculated to convince them that their moral improvement had really become an object of interest to the legislature; that they were not altogether forgotten in this world, and that the governing hand that was compelled to draw the sword of justice to punish, was also desirous to sow the seeds of instruction and goodness in their breasts, before returning it to its sheathe. The subject of the lecture was

"Prisons Past and Present." The lecturer—himself a young man, and, we understand, one who had raised himself above the accidents of birth and circumstances by an industrious tuition of his own mind, and who is now, we trust, on the road to a position where his talents can be made of still greater service in connexion with this good work—the lecturer pointed out to his audience with much ability, the well known history of former Prison Administration, culling therefrom (alas how few were his opportunities !) any bright and honorable exceptions to that reign of tyranny and bad management, and presenting, with just indignation, for the abhorrence of his listeners, the abuses and cruelties of that mistaken period.

Having paid a passing tribute to the virtues of John Howard, Elizabeth Fry, and others of their class, he proceeded, in a manner well suited to the occasion, to impress on the prisoners the opportunities and advantages now offered to them, the gratitude that should inspire them that they had escaped the lot of their early fellow sufferers ; and he then further impressed the necessity of strict morality and mental improvement, as being indispensable to their future happiness and advancement. This we felt to be a step in the right direction, but it is only one of many that are necessary ; however, we are sure the rest will follow, and that the men confined here will be duly improved by the exertions made for that purpose. We were gratified to observe that one of the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, Doctor Lentaigue, was present on the above occasion, an attentive observer of the whole scene, and, no doubt, improving the opportunity for his own future guidance. This shows that, in one instance at least, "the right man is in the right place ;" for were this gentleman only disposed, as is too often the case, to confine his attention to the ordinary and indispensable routine of office hours, he would, at the moment of which we speak, have been comfortably enjoying his own family circle ; but his heart is evidently in the work, and we wish him all success in his arduous calling.

It is also gratifying to record, that his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant is a frequent though private visitor at the hours of lecture, as well as others of the Directors, and we doubt not that the experience gained by such men under such circumstances will tend to produce the most beneficial results. But whether beneficial results follow or not, those persons who are now devoting their time and talents to the improvement of this unhappy class, are showing an example worthy of the highest imitation, and, even should their endeavors fail to produce the desired good, whether through the mismanagement of others, or the innate depravity of those they are endeavoring to save, they may be happy in the consciousness of having tried to grapple with and overcome a state of affairs ruinous to their country, disgraceful to humanity, and degrading to civilization.

ART. VI.—STEAM AND TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

General Remarks on Steam and Telegraphic Communication at the present day, with reference to the United Kingdoms as the centre. By Thos. Knox Fortescue. New Edition. Dublin : J. Robertson, 3 Grafton street, 1852.

We have for some time been flattering ourselves with the hope that Ireland is becoming decidedly practical; and we feel no small pleasure in giving expression to our humble opinion, that the experience of each day tends to confirm the idea, and to afford the most solid proofs of the just ground upon which it was at first conceived. The character of the people appears to be undergoing a complete revolution; to be in a transition state between its former restless and Utopian nature, and that happy species of existence, of which thrift, industry, and foresight, may be said to form the principal ingredients. Through whatever part of the Island we travel, (and for our part there is hardly any of it we have not seen within these last few years,) it is impossible to avoid beholding the steady development of these essential attributes of a Nation's greatness, either as exemplified in its seaport or inland towns, in the great agricultural improvements which have taken place, or in the more business like conversations which we hear on the Railway or at the Hotel. That all this is the natural effect of the comparative cessation of political agitation, (even while admitting the exasperating causes which produced it,) is evident at first sight. The minds of those classes who, from their position, naturally become the creators of commercial and agricultural greatness, if uninfluenced by unhealthy motives, having become quieted and refreshed by repose from the thunder of the platform, and the fiery rhapsodies of the press, pursue with serenity and redoubled vigor the more satisfactory and profitable employments of the farm or the counting-house. Abstracting the beneficial character of free expression, when it originates as the result of moral thought, is carried on in the true spirit of freedom, and never transgresses its legitimate boundaries, how great the contrast between the majestic though silent growth of a Nation's intrinsic wealth, and happiness, and the ephemeral blaze and rapid extinction of a system of mental excitement, which leaves nothing behind of a salutary tendency, save the example it teaches mankind to avoid !

The author of the pamphlet now before us, deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen, for the interest he has taken in the consideration of a question so intimately associated with the prosperity of Ireland, as that of, " Steam and Telegraphic Communication : " the subject of Transatlantic Communication has been before us for years, and the advantages our Island would derive from the carrying out of such measures as were proposed, one of which has, we are happy to state, been adopted by " The New York, Newfoundland and London Submarine Telegraph Company," are abundantly obvious. But Mr. Fortescue deserves the merit of taking a still wider view, and of suggesting a method by means of which, Ireland will become the centre of a collection of radii, whose extremities shall be connected with every country in the Earth. There is no benefit which may not be derived from the realization of this project, and we may here mention one which has already actually resulted ; it is, that by the able manner in which it has been brought before the public, it came to be discovered that the development of Irish Fisheries, would in every human probability be attended with the most marked and speedy success. In every new Company, therefore, that we see arise and which is identified with Irish Fisheries, it is only natural to suppose that each are more or less indebted for their existence, to the application of scientific principles, such as have been cited by the author of this pamphlet as being suited to our requirements. Mr. Fortescue is Secretary to, " The London and West of Ireland Fishing and Fish Manure Company," the admirable treatise of whose director we have already reviewed, and which we are happy to hear is progressing so favorably; our happiness, however, is materially alloyed by learning that very few shares have been taken by Irishmen, who of all others should be so well aware of the vast treasures which lie beneath the waters of their Bays. Let us trust that they will speedily be taught by the example of their neighbours, the remunerative nature of such investments, and that they will enter with spirit into the prosecution of an undertaking, replete with incalculable benefit to themselves and to their country, thus advancing another important step upon that golden path, which leads so faithfully to national renown. In the following lucid manner, the Author demonstrates the fact that our Island constitutes the grand focus of civilization.

On inspecting the general chart, we at once recognise this, our group of islands, as being the focus of "the inhabited," "the commercial," and "the civilized world," which again, on more minute inquiry, are found to have the Isle of Man occupying, as near as possible, the local central position. Within the circuit of this island, which is about thirty miles long by twelve wide, one may perceive in the little glens, streamlets, and waterfalls alone, the face of nature in miniature, the contrast of which with the majestic expanse that bursts upon the sight on ascending 2,000 feet above the level of the sea to the summit of Snea-fell, fills the spectator with intense admiration. This view—the only one of the kind in these dominions—is truly sublime in its extent, and none can stand upon this island peak in the midst of three great kingdoms, beholding the shores of each at almost equally short distances beyond "the glad waters of the dark blue sea," without experiencing that emotion which their various associations, and the contemplation of the grander phases of nature, are so well calculated to inspire. It seems as though a microscope having fallen from the eye, a telescope has been substituted; or as when the soul, which, imprisoned within its tenement of clay has known only the limited field which its circumstances permitted it to survey, suddenly bursts the bars of its prison-house and emerges into space, where the countless myriads of worlds roll in silent and solemn majesty before the astonished and enraptured vision.

Its superficial contents are about 130,000 square acres, of which about 90,000 are under cultivation. The streams are numerous, and the hills disposed continuously. Douglas is its most populous and chief commercial town; its harbour admits vessels drawing eighteen feet water, and is sheltered from the north, west, and south; but though open to easterly winds, there is not a more secure refuge in St. George's Channel. A pier and two lighthouses have been erected; and the formation of harbours accessible at all times of tide to vessels and steamers of any moderate burden, has received the attention of Government. The town itself is not only populous, but its neighbourhood is crowded with handsome mansions and villas. Castletown, on the south coast, is the seat of government, and residence of the Lieutenant-Governor. Peel is immediately opposite Douglas, on the west coast, and is celebrated for its cod and herring fishery; of the former the island enjoys the largest almost in these countries. At Ramsey, on the northern shore—the bay of which is one of the finest in the British Channel, and much resorted to—shipbuilding is extensively carried on by an active and busy resident population, and the Liverpool and Glasgow steamboats calling here regularly create an extensive traffic.

It is, in all respects, a producing island: corn, potatoes, cattle, fish, poultry, &c., are shipped. The produce in wheat is about 30,000 quarters; barley, 30,000; oats, 50,000; 4,000 fishermen are employed in the herring fishery, which produces 80,000 barrels annually. It imports British manufactures to the amount of £300,000, and yields a revenue to England of £25,000 a year. Rich in minerals—lead, copper, and iron ore being worked in considerable quantities, and many thousand tons exported annually—there is besides abundance of limestone, granite, marble, manganese, and the finest pottery clay. In the lead ore from 90 to 130 ounces of silver per ton are found. Mineral wealth, in fact, is the characteristic of the island; superior water-power exists, available for manufactories; salubrity of climate is among its prominent attractions, and the annual number of visitors is very great.*

Here also the Established Church of England and Ireland, which has always been the one acknowledged, is to be found existing in its original purity and simplicity.

However, in order that we may come as directly as possible upon the subject matter of this paper, and at the same time give Ireland

* In 1845, ever memorable year in railway annals, the following note was put forth by a "provisionally registered" company, who proposed facilitating the internal intercourse here, and which, as there is no fear of its causing a return of the "fever," is now reproduced:—

"The island is bounded by the following counties, viz.—Wigtonshire, Kirkcubright, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Lancashire, Flint, Denbigh, Carnarvon, and Anglesea, Dublin, Belfast, Meath, Louth, and Down. The railways from the inland counties, with the present lines of steamers, and extensions of them, render it accessible in a short period of time from every point. It is essentially a resting place on 'the great high seaway between Ireland and the north of England and Scotland.'

"The proposed line of railway will run from Douglas, by Union Mills, Crosby, Ballacraigne, and St. John's, to Peel; with a branch on the North from St. John's, by Kirk Michael, Bishop's Court, Ballaugh, and Sulby, to Ramsey; and a branch line on the south, through Ballasalla, to Castletown; with continuations to Port le Mary and Port Erin. No engineering difficulties exist. The land in many parts is obtainable at a cheap rate, and the local authorities, with the sanction of the home government, have power to grant the line, by which the delay, uncertainty, and heavy expense attendant upon obtaining an act of Parliament will be avoided."

the first consideration, it must be observed, that by reason of the geographical position which she holds, she is pre-eminently the natural site for the emporium of American and European trade—the commercial medium between the two hemispheres; and Dublin her capital, being the central metropolitan city of these kingdoms, the main line of Electric Telegraph to the extreme west point of Europe in submarine connexion, via Holyhead, with the lines already established to the eastward, must in time be found radiating thence, with a weekly steam communication to the ports of St. John's, Newfoundland, Halifax, Boston, &c., distant 1600 miles, or five days at the rate of 320 miles per day, or 13 knots an hour. To the northward, also, via the Belfast railway, and extended along the County Down line to Donaghadee, whence to Port Patrick the electric cables having just been laid down, completes the junction with the Scotch and English lines through Ayr and Dumfries: by this route also the rails will soon have reduced the journey between our metropolis and Edinburgh, to at least an equality with that to London. To the eastward (where the possibility has been shewn of reducing the passage to Holyhead from 4 to 9½ hours by means of a ferry boat 400 feet long, and 1600 horse power) the line extends to Crewe, at which point it diverges N.E. to the port of Hull, and thence direct to Hamburgh and Kiel, thereby including all the ports of the Baltic; and S. E. to London, Dover, Ostend, Calais, &c., between which latter ports the telegraph has been submerged in connexion with lines to the principal towns on the continent.

The writer goes on to expatiate on the wonderful advantages of steam, and comes at length to the consideration of Valentia, as a Packet Station between Ireland and America. Not being particularly skilled in nautical matters, our opinion on this subject may not go for much, however, from all we have heard and read, and the little we have seen, we are inclined to consider Galway a more suitable station, both for the magnificent extent and security of its bay as admitted by all, and more particularly for the safety which all vessels approaching or leaving it enjoy, owing to the general favorable direction of the winds. The two localities are we believe about the same distance from America, but the number of shipwrecks along the coasts adjacent to the Shannon, render the constituting of Valentia a Packet Station, a hazardous experiment. The focal point of America for transatlantic communication with Ireland is thus considered:—

But it is to Halifax, Nova Scotia, Sidney, and St. John's, Newfoundland, that our chief attention is to be directed. There is a spot which, owing to proximity to Europe, magnificent harbours, &c., bids fair to be the focal point of America for transatlantic communication via the west coast of Ireland; at present it has steamers to Newfoundland, St Andrew's and Bermudas, a station of much importance, and which thus becomes a common rendezvous for the American and West Indian steamers. This matter has attracted much public attention lately, but three or four discreditable feints only to run steamers on this route have been the result. Science, however, must shortly decide the question, to the total exclusion of the dictates of low local interests, or unworthy national prejudices. The extension of the telegraph to our western ports simultaneously with that from Halifax to St. John's, Newfoundland, (across Cape Breton Island, with submarine wires in the Gut of Canso, and from Sidney to Harbour Grace, which is now in progress,) and the formation of the Railway from Bath, Maine, to Halifax, completing the link with the existing lines in the Republic, will compel the mails to adopt this route, to the exclusion it may be of Collins and Cunard lines. At the same time a coast line, through all the Atlantic cities, accompanied by the telegraph, will have been laid to Wilmington, (North Carolina,) which, produced on to Tampa Bay, or Charlotte Harbour in Florida, will in time afford the shortest route for our West Indian intelligence.

There is also the branch line from Halifax through New Brunswick to Quebec and Montreal—of which, as it is a most important design, we may give the following estimate and propositions for its accomplishment: viz.—Cost for 550 miles, at £5,000 per mile, £2,750,000—say £3,000,000, to include extras; to be raised by a Government grant in return for the transit of mails, troops, and military stores, &c.; £1,500,000; grants from the Colonial Legislature, and by subscription of stock on the pledge of land to be sold to the company by the three provinces of Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, £1,500,000; total, £3,000,000.

Lands.—Nova Scotia to sell 100,000 acres; New Brunswick, 300,000; Canada, 1,000,000 acres. These to be paid for when the returns of the railway and the sales of the lands yield a surplus after deducting interest and the annual working expenses.

Cost of Working.—By estimate, the annual cost of working a railroad in New England has been found to be 1,200 dollars per mile, at which 550 miles would come to £165,000 per annum.

Total Annual Expense.—Interest on £1,500,000 (Government to give 1½ millions, as above, in lieu of the transit of troops &c.) at 3½ per cent., £52,500; cost of working, £165,000; total £217,500.

Inducements to Capitalists.—1st. Grants of land. 2nd, Pledge of payment of interest on capital by three Legislatures—say, Canada, one-half; New Brunswick, a fourth; Nova Scotia, a fourth. Capital to be expended in Canada—150 miles—£820,000; New Brunswick—265 miles—£1,445,000; Nova Scotia—135 miles—£135,000.

Mr. Fortescue is of opinion that "A Ship Canal," would be preferable to any other means of communication, which has been proposed for the purpose of uniting the central American Districts: in this opinion he is joined by no less a person than the Emperor of France, who, at a meeting held in London in 1847, suggested a line for one, which it is said he now intends to carry out.

The construction of a ship canal, however, is the preferable plan to adopt, and for which various lines are pointed out,—premising that in the Bay of Panama the rise and fall of tide is from 18 to 24 feet according as the ordinary or equinoctial tides prevail: at Chagres the rise and fall does not exceed as many inches; thus it happens that one time of tide the waters of the Atlantic are higher than those of the Pacific, at another they are on the same level, and at a third period the Pacific is above the low water level of the Atlantic. In June, 1847, Prince Louis Napoleon, at a meeting held in London, traced a line through Lakes Leon and Nicaragua which he recommended as possessing superior local facilities, salubrity of climate, populated character of the country, and the advantages of these lakes, which are deep enough generally, and at a small expense might be converted into harbours accessible at all times for vessels of heavy tonnage,—they are 130 feet above the low water level of the sea—the latter is 95 miles long by 30 broad, with an average depth of 15 fathoms. Prince Louis Napoleon has lately, it is said, expressed an intention of taking steps for the accomplishment of this project.

The uniting of the two oceans being, on all sides, admitted as a most important matter, more particularly since the revelations of the golden districts of California and Australia, as vessels would thereby be saved a circuitous and, at some seasons, a dangerous passage round the Horn, of several thousand miles, it becomes the interest of all maritime nations to unite for the accomplishment of this great object. From Europe to Australia via Panama is 1800 miles less than via Suez, and 2390 miles less than via the Cape of Good Hope. It would be productive, moreover, of great benefit to the world at large, and by diverting the present stream of commerce into a new and legitimate channel, would stimulate the exertions, and call forth the resources not only of the western coasts of America, but of the eastern portions of Asia, and all the intermediate islands of the Pacific; the ports on the Isthmus have all been recently made free, ships of any nation can enter and remain free of tonnage duty; and the customs duties on all goods, with two or three exceptions, have been reduced to the nominal one of one per cent. These advantages, combined with its central position for lines of steam navigation, point it out to the commercial world as an eligible position. Already, as has been said, there are, in connexion with the Royal Mail Steamers from Southampton to Chagres, lines south from Panama to Valparaiso, and north to St. Francisco and Oregon, &c., while from San Francisco a branch line has been extended by an American company, to the Sandwich Islands, and other vessels to China. In course of time, it is not improbable that the southern extremity of the line at Valparaiso will be connected by a line of screw steamers with that of the “Peninsular and Oriental Company” at New Zealand and Sidney, to which latter port that company has recently contracted for the conveyance of mails, &c., thus bringing the Australian colonies within sixty-four days distance of these countries, at the same time that the north and south extremities of the American west coast line may be reached hence in about fifty days.

The trivial cost of constructing such a canal, is nothing in comparison with the immense advantages to be derived from the communication which would then exist; a communication which in all probability would be attended with as important consequences, (if not more important in relation to the interests of mankind,) as the nineteenth century has seen. Fancy the effects of the partial annihilation in the distance between these countries and China! What a field would not then be opened out for the rapid and peaceful triumphs of Christianity and civilization! By what noble results might not the facilitated intercourse with Australia be attended! Viewing it in a commercial light, the prospect is indeed magnificent, and cannot be surpassed. Ceylon, from its favorable situation, comes now to be considered as affording the greatest natural advantages for a central steam depôt in the Indian Seas.

Under such a state of affairs, Ceylon, an island about the size of Ireland, with one-fifth its population only, and which hitherto has been comparatively little known, comes prominently before us as the centre, or site of a steam depôt, in the Indian seas; its favorable situation is of itself almost sufficient to make any one arrive at this conclusion—just at the entrance of the Bay of Bengal, between the parallels of 6° and 10° N. and 79° and 82° E. Long., directly in the middle almost of the “Peninsular and Oriental Company’s” Indian line, and presenting a point whence lines of steam navigation may radiate to nearly all points of the compass. It is, moreover, a remarkably fertile island, with an increasing trade to Australia; offers many advantages to European settlers; and possesses, at least, two good harbours—that of Galle, on the southern coast, and that of Trincomalé, said to be one of the finest in the world, on the N. E. shore, where there is a naval depôt and dock-yard. Including the whole of the Kandian territories, it came into the possession of the British early in 1815. Kandy, its capital, called by the natives Maha Nuwera, and sometimes Sankada Gala, in the province of Yatti Nuwera, is situated nearly in the centre of the island, Lat. 7° 28’ N., Long. 80° 47’ E., distant 72 miles N. E. from the port of Colombo, and 130 miles S. S. W. from Trincomalé, at an elevation of 1467 feet above the sea. The Maha-ville-Ganga flows round it to the northward, at about four miles distance, while the lake of Kandy, an artificial basin, three quarters of a mile in length, and 150 yards wide, with a smaller one at the foot of the adjacent high hills, form the southern boundary or base of the angular piece of ground on which the town is built. It is judiciously planned, being formed by two principal streets.—Colombo-street, which runs east and west, dividing the town into two equal parts,— and Trincomalé-street, which crosses it at right angles, making an almost similar division. The present regular arrangement of the streets, which all run in straight lines, was made under the direction of the late king of Kandy. The town was founded by Pandita Prakrama Baboo III., between A. D. 1267 and 1301, though it did not become the capital till 1592, and up to 1819 was little better than a collection of huts, with a population of about 3,000. Recent social improvements, however, together with extensive agricultural and commercial operations, have caused it to advance rapidly, and become comparatively handsome. It now contains some fine buildings, with an increasing population of 6,000 settled natives and Europeans, exclusive of military, with whom, up to 1832, it is spoken of as having been considered merely as a military post. Its first appearance is striking, surrounded as it is by verdant hills rising in amphitheatrical grandeur, and reflected in the silvery lake; but a closer inspection is not just at present found fully to meet all favorable impressions. Built in a basin, on a bed of gneiss, where the soil is exceedingly pervious to wet, the streets are rather unpleasant in rainy weather, which tells against its general cleanliness and health; but improvements are in progress which, when completed, will invest the place with a different character in these respects. This applies, however, to the town merely, for within fifteen miles around it are established the Indian missionary's and other sanatory stations, as high as 3,000 feet above the sea level. Nevertheless, the climate is trying to European constitutions, the thermometer ranging from 54° to 87°, with a mean of about 74°, while at Colombo, though it sometimes rises to 90°, it seldom sinks below 76°.

Gallé presents itself as the port of call for the "Oriental Company's" steamers plying between Suez and Hong Kong direct; and consequently, as a town and harbour, is improving rapidly in many respects; indeed, it is probable that much of the traffic to the central provinces will in time be transferred from Colombo to this port, as a considerable quantity of coffee and other dry goods are annually damaged whilst loading from the boats in the open roadsteads there, owing to the swell, which, in the finest weather even, breaks over the gunwale and wets the merchandize. These steamers touch there, and then proceed to Madras and Calcutta, the line being continued hence by fresh vessels to Singapore, Australia, and Hong Kong.

The following, as evidencing British spirit and enterprise in establishing steam communication, will be read with interest.

With the above internal changes in progress, steam navigation to the south and east coasts of Africa, Madagascar, and Mauritius, on the one hand, and to the Indian Archipelago and New Zealand, on the other, in addition to the two-monthly branch extension which has recently been made from Singapore to Ports Essington and Sidney—would reward the speculator, and bring prosperity and wealth to a community whose enterprise has already established steam communication with the following countries:—To Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, by the Hüll line, to St. Petersburg; to North Germany, by the Hull and London lines to Hamburg; to Holland, Belgium, and France, by the General Steam Company's vessels; to the north and south of Spain and to Portugal, by the Peninsular Company's vessels; to Italy, by the line from London to Leghorn; to Malta, the Levant, and Constantinople, by the line from Liverpool; to Egypt, Arabia, Ceylon, India, Singapore, and China, by the Oriental Steam Company's Vessels, to British America and the United States by the Cunard and Great Western lines from Liverpool; to the West Indies, Mexico, the north and east coasts of South America, by the West India line; to Peru and Chili by the West Coast line; to the Cape and Calcutta by the General Screw Steam Ship Company; to Australia by a branch from the Oriental Company's line at Singapore. The only colony of any importance which has not now the advantage of direct steam communication is New Zealand. The ocean mail lines are upwards of 60,000 miles in length, costing the Post-office about one million sterling annually.

None can doubt the importance of Malta as a link in the great chain of communication; valuable as has been her situation hitherto in a military sense, she is likely now to have that value tenfold enhanced; and also to become the main-spring of gigantic commercial action. Cromwell is said to have exclaimed upon first seeing Ireland, "this indeed is a country worth fighting for." In imitation of the great Puritan, we may with justice say, Malta is an island worth holding. To be the centre from whence radiate connecting lines to the principal cities of Europe, Asia, and Africa, all of which can be traversed with lightning speed, is sufficient to render the locality which commands such an advantage enviable in the extreme.

The average time between Malta and Alexandria and the coast of Syria, is, say, four days or ninety-six hours, (though this perhaps is somewhat more than the reality,) as nearly as possible equal to that between Malta and Gibraltar; thus Malta is manifestly the middle point between the two extremes of the Mediterranean. From Malta to London, again—(the focus of the political and commercial world)—at present occupies, on the average, six days, or one hundred and forty four hours, so that her position in this point of view may not appear to hold good exactly. However, after the continuation of the rail from Lyons to Avignon, which is at present in progress, one continuous line from Marseilles to Boulogne will be available, in length between seven and eight hundred miles, which is equal to, say, one day and a half or thirty-eight hours, at the rate of only twenty-five miles per hour. The whole time of transit of intelligence between Malta and London would thus be reduced to five days, on an average; but special or swift trains on these important occasions, would accomplish the distance several hours earlier—say, at the rate of twenty-eight, instead of twenty-five miles per hour, and the whole time occupied between Calais or Boulogne and Marseilles becomes no more than twenty-eight or twenty nine hours; in addition to this, between Malta and the port of Marseilles, the time at sea is about two days and a quarter, or fifty-four hours, on an average; and thus brings Malta within nearly the same distance of London as she now is of Alexandria. This would be the line of "latest intelligence between the United Kingdom, Malta, and the East;" while the direct bi-monthly communication by the Peninsular and Oriental Company's vessels, will continue to be the route of the majority of passengers, with whom the remaining in England till the latest day is a matter of no consequence. To include the transfer of merchandise would perhaps be useless, as heavy packages always take the cheapest mode of conveyance; whereas, in the case of passengers and news, expense becomes a secondary consideration. Independent of the above view, though by no means the less surely connected therewith by the results or effect produced, this island is made the head quarters, not only of all steamers direct between the United Kingdoms and the colonies in the East, but of all foreign steamers whose traffic in any respect may be worthy of a second thought, in a proportionately greater or less degree; for they have each their several depôts here, and in return they contribute to keep up a communication with those foreign ports to which at present no British steamers run regularly. She is the radiating point to Alexandria, Beyroutt, Smyrna, Constantinople, Athens, Naples, Rome, Leghorn, Genoa, and Marseilles, immediately on the arrival of mails from either of the extreme east or west points.*

The advantages to be derived from the realization of the project mooted in the next extract, will be discernible at first sight.

The two lines of direct communication between the United Kingdoms and Alexandria—that, via Trieste and Corfu—join in with each other off the western extremity of Candia, where perhaps, in a few years, policy will point out the eligibility of a British settlement being established, until eventually, the whole or the greater part of an island whose situation enables it to command the approaches to Greece, the Archipelago, Turkey, and the countries bordering on the Black Sea; and in the climate of which, all the necessaries and the luxuries of life, from the produce of the torrid to that of the frigid zones, find a temperature suitable to their almost spontaneous growth,—may be brought peaceably under the flag of the British Empire; and thus would one of the fairest portions of the earth be rescued from the curse of despotism and heathenism, to grace, as another rich jewel, the diadem of a Christian queen, the sway of whose sceptre recognises not the setting of the sun—nor the nocturnal repose of the tax-man.

* There is a map published by Augustus Legerot, No. 55, Quai des Augustins, Paris, shewing all the railroads in Europe and the lines of steamers in the Mediterranean, a glance at which will be sufficient to convey a general idea; and the more readily if the universal term, lines of steam, be mentally substituted for "railroads and "steamboats" while perusing the foregoing pages.

After entering into an elaborate statement of the superiority of Valentia as a Packet Station over Galway, the arguments contained in which, however, would seem to us to prove rather the benefits the south of Ireland would obtain from the adoption of the former, than the good resulting to the Island in general, the author winds up with a few excellent remarks upon some of the chief improvements upon our present condition, which will be likely to follow the establishment of Irish and American steam communication. There is nothing whatever chimerical in his suppositions; most naturally do they appear to grow out of a consideration of the question, and a most fortunate day will that be for the land of, "the holy hills" when the desired consummation shall have taken place. As to those submarine railways, &c., spoken of towards the end, we must confess ourselves rather sceptical of their success, and as far as the flying machine, and manageable monster balloon are concerned, we will not see them in the present century at any rate, as they have proved complete failures.

So much has been said and written, if not read, respecting the advantages which transatlantic intercourse would bestow on Ireland, that it will be as well to spare the reader upon the present occasion, merely mentioning the saving of three or four days to men in business throughout Ireland generally, and giving them the commercial intelligence at first, instead of, as under the existing erroneous system, second-hand; the drawing of commercial men of all nations through this island on business, and thus affording them an opportunity of seeing and judging for themselves, instead of being misguided by selfish or hostile reports; the saving of expense to passengers, by a reduction of fares as well as time in the transit and the diminution in the unpleasantness of the sea voyage; lastly, the economy in the expenditure in steam-vessels' fuel, wear and tear, insurance, pilotage, light dues, &c. Ireland, in fact, has yet to be born into the commercial world, and it is the establishing of a Packet-station that will most materially assist at her ovation.

Among other matters that have received their meed of passing notice at different times in the daily journals, may be mentioned, the construction of a submarine railway from Dover to Calais—an Atlantic submarine telegraph—a flying machine from New York—and a manageable monster balloon from Madrid; but although we would not, in these days of inventive science, and mechanical wonders, conclude with the presumption of ridiculing these as impossibilities, nor doubt their efficacy (to a certain extent) in promoting the regeneration of the human race, after they shall have become established facts, still it seems probable that they will be allowed to remain for the consideration, at least, of posterity in the indefinite degree of proximity to the present generation.

"Ericsson's Caloric Engine," may perhaps partially displace the present locomotive agent, but the difference will be found to rest more on the point of economy than on any other, it being what we may define as "a dry steam engine that does double the amount of work, at one half the present average expense."

Come what may, however, "Erin go Bragh!"

It will not be irrelevant to state here some information which has reached us, in reference to the different projects which are to be seen in Mr. Fortescue's excellent pamphlet. It would appear that the present Lord Dungannon, incited by the convincing nature of the arguments used by the author, has taken the Holyhead and Kingstown question into hands, and that we may indulge every reasonable hope of yet seeing 400 feet boats running on that line. Mr. Fortescue received a handsome letter from the "New York, Newfoundland, and London Submarine Telegraph Company," on the subject of his pamphlet, and a recent notice informs us, that they have already altered their intended eastern terminus from Galway to Valentia; that line being said to be ninety-five miles shorter, and have sent out the Arctic to mark the route. As to this statement of the distance, opinions differ; but for better, for worse, there is now very little doubt that with the completion of the Foynes Railway, the establishment of Valentia as a Packet Station will soon be an accomplished fact; and though some of us may regret that Galway is not the site, still we must all rejoice at beholding the realization under any shape, of a wish which we so long and so dearly cherished. There will soon be a line from London, via Great Western Railway, South Wales, Railway Steamer to Waterford, Waterford and Limerick Railway, and Railway from Limerick to Foynes; thus perfecting the communication between New York and London. Halifax, regarding which we have given an extract, bids fair to be soon in communication with the Lake districts; and "the Montreal and Liverpool Steam Company's" ships, have commenced running. The state of the central American question renders the Panama Canal doubtful, but the route up the river Atrato, with a short cut to the river Obispo, is supposed to be still in contemplation. The Ceylon Railway is framing, and has already issued its prospectus. A short time since, the report of the surveyed route from Lurg via the Bitter Lakes, to Tiurk Bay, was published as the one determined to be adopted ; at the same time the Railway from Cairo to Lurg is in course of construction. The Cape of Good Hope Railways have been signal failures, but since 1854, Railways and Telegraphs have sprung up in Australia. There have been constructed recently, submarine lines of telegraph, connecting Sardinia, Algiers, Malta, and Alexandria ; and General Chesney's expedition to survey the route via Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, speaks of advancement in another quarter. The Dover and Calais Submarine Railway, has not yet been summarily condemned. These facts must constitute cheering intelligence to all, and are far more eloquent than language, in showing the great strides which civilization is taking in every region of the globe ; they also go far to promise a speedy fulfilment of that prophecy, which asserts that the earth will yet be engirdled by a belt of electricity, by which intelligence can be almost instantaneously conveyed to its remotest ends. All countries will derive benefit from these universal Railway, and Telegraph systems ; their commerce will be increased, new knowledge acquired, the principles of philanthropy extended, and the motives leading to warfare almost completely removed. This latter assertion is perfectly obvious, for it is quite clear that a better understanding between nations will be the natural result of a more intimate intercourse ; and in like manner that the vast mutual advantages that intimate intercourse will assuredly bring about, will act as powerful drag chains upon the bellicose tendencies, to which humanity has hitherto been an unresisting victim. But the most precious fruit of such enterprises should be plucked by Ireland ; for not alone is her situation the most favorable for profiting by their existence, but her exports are as valuable, and her people as intelligent as those of any country in the world ; and add to this, that as she has never until now been placed in a position to compete for the prizes of nations, emulation, more in her case than in that of any other, should be a lively spur to urge her on in the race of improvement. Moreover, a small success obtained by a people who are unaccustomed to any, possesses tenfold the intrinsic worth, which a great one does to those to whom it is no novelty ; for unexpected fortune enhances the pleasure of the receiver, and wonderfully increases the value of the blessing. May we not most legitimately expect important results to this country, from every great commercial speculation which connects her with its designs? We are aware of her position, her resources, we know the physical and intellectual vigor which are the properties of her sons, and we have seen what those qualities have effected in every clime in which a field was laid open for their development; it is only then natural to conclude, that when their own land has been made the platform upon which the fabric of social improvement, and national wealth, may be constructed, unimpeded in its rise by the storms of unprofitable agitation, each stone cemented by honest determination, and the spirit of its builders buoyed up by the healthy breath of well grounded hope in its completion, not maddened by the intoxicating influence of dazzling theories, and extravagant day dreams, the children of that land will satisfactorily demonstrate that nothing but the opportunity was wanting to let the world see, that those attributes of industry, and perseverance, which they have manifested with so much honor to themselves, in England, in France, and in America, may be brought to still greater perfection at home, under the shadow of their native hills, each, "sitting under his own fig tree."

ART. VII.—IRISH CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.

The Irish Church. Speech of Edward Miall, Esq., one of the Members for Rochdale, in favour of the Impartial Disendowment of all Sects in Ireland. Delivered in the House of Commons, May 27th, 1856. London: Effingham Wilson. Dublin: McGlashan and Gill.

The remark has more than once been made by travellers who have visited the site of some celebrated battle, that nature seemed to have designed the locality for the great event which it had witnessed. There is too much of fancifulness in the consideration thus suggested to allow of its claim to any very serious attention, and yet the remark is not altogether inapt, for the simple reason, however, that the natural military advantages of a position will assuredly be recognized, and so far as possible turned to account by the leaders of armies approaching each other to decide a bloody issue. Meantime, full many a contest of paramount importance and influence in the strife of nations has pealed its thunders and struck its giant blows, and in brief, been acted out through all its tremendous details to the mighty catastrophe that concluded it, upon a theatre as little suitable as possible for extensive military operations.

Instances of a similar aptness or inaptness, fitness or unfitness, occur in the world of opinion and political movement, as in that of military action; with a similar apparent preponderance of the apt and the fit. Political warfare, like that which has its bloody arbitrement in the actual stricken field of fight, boasts of its own peculiar strategy, and that similar main point in it, of taking the adversary in the circumstance and moment of his least preparation. And while it is undoubtedly true that, in the following out of this strategy, a theme or an occasion will often be seized upon and made use of, which shall possess of itself the attributes of worthiness and appropriateness, yet full many a great moral struggle has been engaged in, and carried on to its decisive issue under circumstances the reverse of what could be considered grand and befitting.

It is not within our design, nor indeed within our province, to follow out this train of thought so far as even in a general way to indicate the cases which are adducible in instance and illustration of the foregoing remarks. There will be quite enough in a review of the single subject which we proposed to deal with in the present paper, to occupy fully all its allotted space. That subject—one which every day is assuming larger and larger proportions and a deeper and higher importance to the people of these countries—is the question of Religious Liberty. The consideration of its actual state at this moment—its prospects for the future, and the circumstances and result of its latest presentation in the lists of public and parliamentary controversy—will prove amply sufficient for the extent of pages which the other important topics treated of in the present number of THE IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW will permit being placed at our disposal.

As in all other matters of disputation, the most advisable thing in reference to our present theme is to begin by a sufficiently full and accurate definition of terms. By Religious Liberty, then, we explain ourselves to mean not the mere permission or license openly to profess and practice whatever forms of religion, however widely differing from each other, or even mutually adverse, the citizens, subjects, or inhabitants, of a state or kingdom may chance to favor, as individuals, or as communities, There is something beyond this which must be secured before the full meaning of the term "Religious Liberty" can be realized. The differing sects or denominations must be set free, not only as to internal restrictions, but as to external obligations. To their existing liberty of profession and practice of their own particular creeds, there must be superadded an entire freedom from exaction or contribution of any sort towards the maintenance of the ministers, and the worship or establishment of any other. In short, Religious Liberty to be worthy of the name must be really liberty—i.e.—the absence of all species of coercion, oppression or repression, beyond what the interests of society require in all cases for the maintenance of public order and the equal rights of all. This, then, is the definition—clear enough and simple enough we should hope—that we adopt in proceeding to review the subject chosen by us for the present paper.

The next step in our progress is to bring under the reader's attention the degree or measure of Religious Liberty, which is actually enjoyed in these countries. Members of the Church of England—the church by law established—have nothing to complain of in this respect, or so very little in the apprehension even of the most fancifully or hypercritically conscientious, as to be scarce worth a hasty notice in passing. They have to make no species of direct contribution, or payment whatever, towards the support in any manner or degree of any religious community other than their own. Indirectly it is true that they do pay something. Out of the common fund made up by the general taxation of the United Kingdom—to which fund they of course individually contribute in the same way as everybody else—there are certain allocations made—certain small allowances and salaries here and there to Roman Catholic and dissenting clergymen for certain purposes and services recognized and required by the state. Thus, Maynooth College has its grant of a few thousands annually, for the education at home of Roman Catholic priests, instead of leaving them under the inducement or necessity of going to a foreign Roman Catholic Institution for the purpose. Thus the Presbyterian Ministers have their Regium Donum. Thus too the services of Chaplains of the Roman Catholic and Dissenting communions are paid in hospitals, in prisons, and at military and naval stations. Still, it must be all but superfluous to remark, that the proportional contribution of an individual, or, to speak more exactly, that part of his proportionable contribution to the general Revenue which is applied to the purposes and objects last mentioned must be infinitesimally small, and if injustice there be in it, the injustice is shared by so many others as to deprive it of any claim to be considered peculiar.

For the full understanding, however, of the state of opinions and parties in reference to our subject, it is necessary to add, that not a few of the members of the Established Church, while manifesting no wish or intention of leaving it, do not hesitate to declare and protest against being compelled to pay towards even its support—professing their wish to see it upheld by the agency of what is called the “voluntary system” alone, and expressing the most entire confidence that not only would its stability be maintained under the altered state of circumstances so brought about, but that its security would be even enhanced, inasmuch as dutiful affection, and not hard legal constraint, would be the bond of connexion.

All classes and denominations of religionists outside of the pale of the Established Church, are at the heavy disadvantage in comparison with her members, of being under the coercion of law to pay towards her maintenance, while rejecting her teaching and believing her to be unorthodox. This is, of course, a very different matter, and a far heavier grievance than the mere compulsion to pay to the support of one’s own church; and is really an infraction of Religious Liberty. The movement, however, that gave rise to the parliamentary debate we shall have presently to notice, is one that, according to the declarations of its chief promoters, is great enough to have stomach for the largest and widest measure of reform in the premises before stated, and to extend the benefits, or mischiefs as the case may be, of the “voluntary system” in its most absolute entirety, not merely to those who repudiate the Established Church with all her works and pomps, but to those of her own children who, dearly as they love her, do not relish having their money taken by her, without leave asked.

For a long time those who profit by the existing state of things have succeeded in warding off all attempts at change, by a clamor that to assail the Church in the least of its privileges was to undermine social order, and all rights of property throughout the realm. The delusion, however, will not serve any further, and the millions of Roman Catholics and Dissenters will not much longer tolerate that their voice—the voice of the actual numerical majority of the people of these countries—should be stifled or neglected. They will insist, and do insist, upon either an adequate share in the good things hitherto solely possessed by the Established Church, or upon that which they would like better, the doing away with all compulsory provision in every case, and leaving each creed to work its way on its own resources.

To fight out this great contest, what more suitable or appropriate battle ground could be selected than Ireland? What portion of the empire offers such a field, with such advantages of opposition for both parties? The grievance of compulsory contribution is most notable in Ireland, where such a preponderating majority of the people differ in faith and worship from the adherents of the Established Church. On the other hand, the political argument for the maintenance of an Established Church, (of whatever value in itself that argument may be,) is weightiest in Ireland, assuming that political argument to be the greater stability to merely political and governmental institutions derivable from the close neighbourhood and alliance of a state-supported form of religion. The Established Church in this country has upon a number of occasions been declared to be so bound up with the fundamental provisions of the act of Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland, as that the one cannot be touched without disturbing and speedily upsetting the other. That this declaration is indiscreet can scarcely be contested by those who reflect a moment, and who must see that one direct and leading consequence of it must infallibly be to transfer to the Legislative Union a very large share of the odium with which the Catholic and Presbyterian portions of the Irish community regard the State Church. That there is really no such necessary and indissoluble connexion, all who desire to preserve the Legislative Union itself from attack, present or prospective, should eagerly labor to shew; for we much mistake the signs of the times if there be not at this moment “looming in not a very far distance,” an onslaught upon the temporalities of the Established Church—that is upon the Church as a Church Established—of a character far more energetic, persevering and dangerous than she has ever yet known.

The latest premonitory outbreak of the gathering storm was in May last in the House of Commons, when Mr. Miall, one of the members for Rochdale, brought forward the following motion :—

“ That this House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider the Temporalities of the Irish Church, and other pecuniary provisions made by law for religious teaching and worship in Ireland.”

At the very outset Mr. Miall was met with so singular an attempt to get rid of the discussion altogether, on the parts of the self-styled “ friends of the Established Church,” that we shall lay it before our readers, the more especially as it gave occasion for bringing at the very outset into prominence the point already alluded to, of the asserted indispensable and indissoluble connexion between the maintenance of the Legislative Union, and the maintenance of the Establishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland.

Mr. Stafford (North Northamptonshire) said he thought it was desirable that, amidst the rejoicings for a return to a state of peace, which were taking place, or about to take place, out of doors, the House of Commons should set an example of that unity which honourable members hoped to see prevail elsewhere. Unfortunately, the subject of the very first notice on the paper—the Temporalities of the Irish Church—was an old battle-field in that House, and the resumption of the combat on that subject would not only cause considerable strife, but would be tainted with the worst of all bitterness—the bitterness of religious feelings. Under these circumstances, he thought that no constituent could misunderstand the motive which would induce the House to defer the discussion on this subject. He had no wish to stave off the discussion, but he thought that the unusual position in which they stood justified him in the somewhat unusual—(Hear, hear)—course which he was about to take in moving “ that the House do now adjourn.”

Mr. Miall said he was taken by surprise at the extraordinary nature of the honourable gentleman's motion. (Hear, hear.) If it were so necessary to cultivate the exercise of good-will, now that the nation was about to celebrate a peace, at least the honourable member might have been sufficiently courteous to have given him some intimation of the course which he was about to take. (Hear.) The honourable gentleman seemed to suppose that the discussion would be embittered by displays of ill-temper ; he could assure the House that there would be no ill-temper on his part, and he thought there would be none on the part of any honourable member, except those who felt that they were endeavouring to perpetuate an injustice. (Hear, hear.) He hoped that the House would allow the discussion of a resolution which stood in his name to be taken. He had waited for some considerable time for an opportunity to bring forward the subject, and if he allowed it to go over, an opportunity might be long in offering itself. The intention of the motion of the honourable member was so obviously to get rid of the question that the country would have no difficulty in understanding why it was made. (Hear.)

Mr. G. H. Moore (Mayo County) thought that if anything could produce exasperation in Ireland, it was the speech of the honourable gentleman (Mr. Stafford).

Lord Palmerston concurred as to the inexpediency of discussing this question at the present moment; but as the honourable member for Rochdale had had great difficulty in obtaining a day, it would, perhaps, be discourteous to expose him to any further disappointment. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Stafford having withdrawn his motion, and Mr. Miall's name being called, Mr. G. H. Hamilton (Dublin University) required the clerk to read the 5th Article of Union between England and Ireland, guaranteeing the privileges of the Established Church.

The Fifth Article of Legislative Union here referred to will demand special attention in a later portion of this paper, and so we shall postpone for the present any particular statement, or analysis of its provisions.

Mr. Miall, whose speech was received by the House, without distinction of party, in a manner that clearly shewed how much not only the importance of the subject, but the purity and uprightness of his motives, were recognized by his auditory, is certainly entitled when brought before the public in any other way to have his reasons and opinions given in his own words.

We therefore proceed to set out the explanatory preamble or exordium of his very clever speech, and thence will proceed to consider its arguments and positions in detail.

Mr. Miall spoke as follows:—I am very glad that in the discharge of the duty now before me, I shall not need to utter a word offensive to the religious feelings of any honourable member of this House. (Hear, hear.) I am very glad that the motion with which I shall have the honour to conclude, does not require me to canvass the merits or demerits of any Church, either in respect of its creed, discipline, or ethics—to assail the character or efficiency of any body of clergy whatever—nor to cast aspersions upon any ecclesiastical community, Protestant or Roman Catholic, Episcopalian or Presbyterian. The arguments I shall adduce in support of the motion will be based exclusively on principles of justice, and considerations of State policy; and as they will be urged, I trust, in a spirit of moderation and catholicity, I venture to hope that the House may find it practicable to debate an important religious question without even a momentary excitement of sectarian animosity.

REASONS FOR MOOTING THE QUESTION.

Sir, I shall probably and very properly be expected to state the reasons which have induced me just now to bring under the consideration of the House the vexed question of our Irish ecclesiastical polity. I may be told, possibly, that I am taking an officious and obtrusive course, and one that the state of feeling which has prevailed of late years in Ireland does not demand. The policy I am about to criticise and arraign, it may perhaps be urged, if not theoretically defensible, has been practically acquiesced in—if it do not square with principles of abstract justice, it is productive of no very grievous oppression—for under it Ireland is as tranquil as could be wished—is blessed with a yearly diminution of sectarian strife—and rejoices in a rapid development of social prosperity. You may ask me, and you have a right to ask, Why not let well alone? At a time when religious feuds in Ireland are visibly subsiding, why launch again a question which has stirred such stormy passions? Why waste time in exposing discrepancies which have almost ceased to attract attention, and in meddling with anomalies which it is easy enough to render irritating, but not by any means so easy to remove? Now, Sir, without denying that interrogations of this nature have some force, I venture to think that in this instance they may be successfully answered. I venture to suggest in limine that they take a great deal too much for granted in regard to the present state of feeling in Ireland. Indeed, I feel pretty sure that honourable members from that part of the United Kingdom will be very far from unanimous in endorsing as correct so flattering a description of the ecclesiastical truce established there. Moreover, it would be childish to shut our eyes to the obvious fact that it is only a truce. (Hear, hear.) Why, Sir, the man who walks amongst explosive materials with a naked candle in his hand, has as good a right to reckon on complete security, as we have to calculate upon permanent tranquillity in Ireland under our present ecclesiastical policy. It is true that, of late, unusual care on the part of the executive, whether Whig or Conservative, coupled with an unprecedented combination of peculiar circumstances affecting the social condition of Ireland, has produced an unwonted calm. But it would be but poor statesmanship to mistake a temporary lull of agitation for settled popular contentment. Is the calm such as may be relied on? Are our existing ecclesiastical arrangements so well suited to the temper and wants of the Irish people, and so firmly grounded in their convictions, as to warrant the hope that the “great difficulty” of Sir Robert Peel has at length and for ever ceased to exist? Will the right honourable Secretary for Ireland undertake to assure us that the religious strife, which for three centuries has been the bane of that country, is at last effectually quelled—that there can be no reasonable fear of its resuscitation—and that rival sects in that part of the United Kingdom are so far satisfied with their respective relationship to the State, that no apprehension need be felt of their contentions in future? Sir, it would be idle to conceal from ourselves the fact, that our Irish ecclesiastical policy is not satisfactory to the great bulk of the inhabitants of Ireland. Left as it is, it cannot, in the nature of things, be satisfactory, and, consistently with self-respect, it ought not to be satisfactory. Therefore it is, I think, that this House, warned by the past, and reasonably apprehensive of the future, may be very properly invited to avail itself of the present interval of popular quiet, to lay the foundation of a more stable order of things. But, Sir, this is not the main consideration by which I have been moved to bring this subject before the House at the present moment. I place my chief justification in the fact, that existing ecclesiastical arrangements are in imminent danger from another hand. If it were true that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were disposed to acquiesce in them, it is notorious that the Protestants of Great Britain are not. (Hear, hear.) Every member of the House must be aware how impossible it will be to preserve inviolate that compromise on which our Irish ecclesiastical policy is based, in defiance of the strong Protestant feeling which pervades the constituencies of England, Wales, and Scotland. The honourable member for North Warwickshire, the representative of that feeling, has already obtained the assent of the House to the introduction of a bill for the repeal of the Maynooth College Endowment Act. No doubt, that assent was most reluctantly given, and was wrung from the House by the extreme pressure of constituent bodies. Very likely the honourable gentleman may find it impracticable to carry his measure through all its stages in the present Parliament. But if it should be so, the difficulty is only evaded for a season. The same strong feeling—the same unreasonable prejudice, if you prefer so to regard it—which has compelled you to assent to the preliminary resolution, may also compel you to pass his bill. Even if the present Parliament should contrive to avoid giving legislative effect to their own resolution, the next Parliament will, in all probability, be returned upon a clear understanding that the compromise shall be put an end to, and the question settled. Well, but should such be the case—should Parliament withdraw a small State endowment from a Roman Catholic institution, the only one it grants to that body, leaving its endowment of other religious bodies untouched—where will be the boasted tranquillity of Ireland? Can you hope to maintain it? (Hear, hear.) I speak not now of physical violence—that, I rejoice to believe, you would have no reason to apprehend. But are there not consequences of a more subtle, but not less mischievous, character, which would flow from the success of the honourable member's proposition taken alone? We have already had ample experience of the social devastation wrought by the demon of religious discord, even where it stops short of actual outrage. We have seen how, wherever it fairly gets head, it withers, as with a cleaving curse, all a nation's better capabilities—how it loosens all the ties by which society is held together—dries up the kindly feelings which spring out of the common relationships of life—weakens mutual confidence—discourages enterprise—checks industrial development—and substitutes for the glow of a healthy national activity, the fever of popular excitement. It is among the greatest calamities which can befall a nation. You can attempt nothing hopefully for the social amelioration of a people among whom this spirit is rife. But this is the spirit which you must look to see evoked, by carrying, as an isolated measure, the disendowment of Maynooth College. Sir, spite of these consequences, I believe the Protestant feeling of this country will compel you to disendow that institution. (Hear, hear.) I believe you will have to do it at no distant date. (Hear, hear.) I believe further that it is in the category of things which ought to be done. (Hear, hear.) And because I am convinced that it cannot be safely done alone—(Hear, hear.)—because I think that the real difficulty in the way of dealing, not only with it, but with the bitter sectarian animosity which the Maynooth grant was meant to allay, lies coiled up in the very core of our Irish ecclesiastical policy, I have felt not merely justified, but constrained to invite the House to go into committee on religious teaching and worship in Ireland. (Hear, hear.)

To those who are really acquainted with the condition and temper of Ireland, the observations of the speaker upon the folly of trusting to the present calm in this country in matters regarding her ecclesiastical arrangements, will appear singularly apt and well founded. Truly, as he says, the hope of permanent peace in Ireland, while things remain as they are, in reference to Church-policy, is about as well founded (and no more) as that of the man who should count upon safety when carrying an unguarded light through a powder magazine. True it is, that “only a truce” really exists; and that this truce may end at any moment, and the calm be succeeded by a storm; and on all hands it will be admitted, that if there is to be a change at all, its necessity or advisability, its nature and extent, can far better be discussed just at present, when the “unwonted calm” of which Mr. Miall speaks, is prevailing, than when the fierce winds of agitation are again abroad, and the billows are surging up and driving furiously before it over the whole surface and down into the depths of society.

Ireland will not—indeed cannot—be contented while she is left under such an anomaly as the Protestant Church Establishment upon her Catholic people. Her resistance and hostility to it may be more or less energetical according as her general strength and activity may chance to be at flood or at ebb; but, whether active or passive, that resistance and hostility must be enduring and ultimately must prevail.

Mr. Miall proceeded to give a historical review of the Ecclesiastical policy of Great Britain towards Ireland, and divided that portion of his subject into three parts, viz.—the stage or phase of persecution—that of ascendancy, and finally what he styled “indiscriminate endowments.” Upon the two first he entered into the following disquisition:—

The problem which your policy attempted to solve was, how to transfer from Roman Catholic to Protestant hands the ownership of the soil in Ireland, together with all political influence, all social distinctions, all the ordinary powers of achieving gain, all the potentialities of civilization, comfort, and affluence. The agencies chiefly relied upon in solving this problem were arbitrary laws, wholesale confiscation, cold steel, and gunpowder. And what are the staple materials which make up the history of that period? Robbery by the civil power, and retaliation by the outraged people—tyranny without limit followed by insurrections without pity—desperate sieges and hideous massacres—a country laid waste—a population alternating between the extremes of rage and terror—a priesthood hunted up like noxious vermin—a whole race crushed beneath a heavier doom than slavery. Sir, seldom, indeed, has a bloodier drama been acted upon God's earth. (Hear.) You cannot read it, even at this distance of time, without feeling your blood curdle in your veins. And in what did it all issue? Why in this, that in the reign of William III., Protestantism had the wealth of the country, but Roman Catholicism still retained the affections of the people. Such was the first great failure of your Irish ecclesiastical policy—I will give but a hasty glance at the next. The second phase of the Church Establishment principle is that of ascendancy—that is, the application of the power of the State to the elevation of the Church, with which it is united, above all others in worldly position, privileges, and security. You tried this modification of the State Church theory in Ireland from 1689 down to 1829. Your attempt was to foster Protestantism into strength by privilege—to depress and weary out Roman Catholicism by civil proscriptions and penal laws. The tale is a very familiar one—but familiar as it is, it falls within my purpose to repeat it—and it may be condensed into a very few sentences. I will not go into detail to show the peculiar favour your policy displayed towards Protestants—how you allowed them to appropriate to their exclusive advantage the land, the Church, the franchise, the Parliament, the municipalities, the learned professions, the University. Let us see what were the tender mercies of that policy to Catholics. They may be read in the Irish statute-book from 1690 to 1790. Well, look first at the disadvantageous position in which Irish Roman Catholics were placed by law, as respects the offices and ministration of their own Church. Their higher ecclesiastics were sentenced to perpetual exile, and large rewards offered for their discovery within the kingdom. Their parochial priests were compelled to register themselves, as a kind of ticket-of-leave functionaries—(a laugh)—to give heavy bail that they would not go beyond the limits of their respective counties, and to engage that they would never exercise their functions out of their own parish. They were forbidden to assume any ecclesiastical title, and to wear any professional dress—to erect any steeple, to toll any bell, to officiate in any grave-yard. Their images were to be destroyed, their crosses thrown down, their pilgrimages prohibited. But, on the other hand, handsome annuities were offered by law to those priests who should apostatise from the Romish faith. How were the Irish Roman Catholics treated in regard to education? Every Catholic School was closed, every Catholic schoolmaster subject to transportation for life, with the penalty of death in case of his return. No child of Catholic parents could be sent abroad for education without a special license—and lest the act should be evaded, any magistrate might at any moment demand that the child should be produced. What was their case in regard to the ordinary occupations of life? They were incapacitated from holding any commission in the army or navy, and from serving in any office under the Crown. They were excluded from every liberal profession but that of medicine. They could purchase no landed estate—nor occupy any farm, the profits of which exceeded a third of the rent. If they betook themselves to industrial or commercial pursuits, they were literally at the mercy of Protestant municipalities. If, in spite of these restrictions, they acquired some property, what was their control over it? It was taxed ad libitum by the State, county, municipal and parochial authorities. No one belonging to the discouraged sect was allowed even to possess a horse of above £5 value. He could receive no real property from Protestants, either by deed or gift or by bequest—and if, during his life-time, his eldest son turned Protestant, he lost all legal control over him, and became incapable of charging his estate with portions for his other children. Finally, in regard to the general privileges of citizenship, no Roman Catholic could marry a Protestant lady, nor entrust, at his death, the guardianship of his children to his wife or friends, or exercise the elective franchise, or sit in Parliament.

ADOPTION OF A NEW POLICY.

Well, Sir, what was the issue of this execrable system of legal and political ascendancy in regard to the rival churches? Dead failure—worse than failure. Roman Catholicism grew the more it was trampled upon—grew until its resentment became formidable. When once it became necessary, either for her own purpose, or for the resistance of foreign invasion, to unite the whole population of Ireland, this elaborate frame-work of ecclesiastical tyranny was obliged to be pulled to pieces more rapidly than it had been put together. During the last decade of the last century most of these penal laws were repealed; and in 1829, at the bidding of an inexorable necessity, you condemned the very principle of Protestant Ascendancy, by passing the Catholic Emancipation Act. Sir, I say you gave up the principle of Protestant ascendancy because you surrendered the only means by which it could be effectually maintained. Well, Sir, it was impossible for you to rest there, for you had an exclusive Church Establishment richly endowed with national funds, and, as you still held firmly by the principle of a State endowment of religion, you were compelled to entertain various propositions tending to place the Church of the majority in a relation of approximate equity at least towards the church of the minority. Slowly and cautiously your policy took a direction towards the third and last development of the State Church principle—namely, equality of favour by means of indiscriminate endowments. By the Church Temporalities Act of 1833, you professed to cut down the Protestant Church Establishment in Ireland to the wants of the Protestant inhabitants. By the abolition of Church cess you recognized the inexpediency, not to say injustice, of levying upon members of one church a direct tax for the exclusive benefit of another. By removing the charge of tithe from the Roman Catholic occupier to the Protestant landowner, you sought to veil the hardship of quartering the clergy of the few upon the resources of the many. All these, however, were but negative changes—changes calculated to tone down into harmony with the milder spirit of the age, a harsh and indefensible expression of the State endowment policy.

From this Mr. Miall went on to show what he considers to have been the first positive step towards establishing equal relations between the two Churches and the State. The Maynooth College Endowment Act, brought in and passed by Sir Robert Peel in the year 1845, was the first step, according to him, in this direction; and he quoted an opinion expressed by Lord John Russell in that year, to the effect that the argument on which the propriety of passing the act just mentioned was based, would prove as sound for proposing at a future period the making a provision for the general endowment and maintenance of the whole body of the Roman Catholic Clergy in Ireland;—in other words for the quasi-establishment of the Roman Catholic Religion in this kingdom.

The next positive step in the direction indicated by Mr. Miall was, according to him, to have been the actual bringing forward by Lord John Russell of a bill, embodying the proposal last spoken of. This, however, was prevented, and all further progress stayed, at least for a time, by the strong demonstration that soon after commenced in England of ultra Protestant feeling, and which was aggravated to such almost frantic extremities by what has been denominated the "Papal Aggression."

The Honorable Member for Rochdale continued for some time to expatiate upon these topics, and put the question to Parliament, what was the policy to be adopted now that further progress in the direction of a general system of ecclesiastical endowments was plainly impracticable, and that a return to the old exploded systems of religious persecution and Protestant ascendancy was at least equally so. And having put the question, he professed himself ready to supply the answer, and forthwith set about doing so. As this involves the whole meaning and object of his motion and speech, we copy from Hansard's Report his exposition of it, abbreviating, or omitting, only what was comparatively unimportant.

IMPARTIAL DISENDOWMENT THE ONLY PRACTICAL POLICY.

I respectfully submit, then, that inasmuch as the divided religious feeling of the country prevents you, and ever will prevent you, from placing the different sects in Ireland upon an equitable footing as it regards the State, by means of indiscriminate endowments, you should accomplish it by means of impartial disendowments. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") And that as you cannot hope to render justice to the Irish people by a public support of the religious institutions of all sects, you should withdraw that support alike from all. And here let me say that, in recommending the House to adopt the policy of impartial disendowment, I am far from desiring a hasty, sweeping, inconsiderate application of that policy. When I come to lay before you an outline of the plan I would suggest for carrying this policy into effect, I think you will see that it was quite possible to combine with the disendowment policy the most scrupulous regard to the equitable rights both of religious communities, as such, and also of individuals. But, Sir, saving all such rights intact, I own that my proposition would be worth nothing, unless it covered the entire ground—unless the policy of disendowment reached everything which the State has an equitable right to deal with. A simple and determinate principle of this sort appears to me to have an immense advantage over every kind of compromise. The statesmanship of the present day, I am aware, is adverse to this simplicity of purpose, and aims rather at producing a kind of composite policy, by an amalgamation of conflicting principles. Well, Sir, I am not very confident in the superior wisdom of that statesmanship. I admit, indeed, that changes, involving a great variety and extent of interests, ought to be carefully and cautiously effected. That is one thing. But it is another and very different thing to produce a conglomerate of heterogeneous principles, none of which is consistently carried out. Such is not the course I venture to recommend. I am anxious that the House should express itself in favour of religious equality in Ireland by the only practical means—namely, impartial disendowment. I wish you to let the people of Ireland understand that this is to be your future policy, pure and simple. This resolution will not preclude you from taking whatever time you may think necessary for effecting your object with safety—nor from using whatever precautions you will to avoid or surmount the practical difficulties lying between you and your object—nor from displaying all the qualifications of true statesmanship in your choice of opportunities and means. The vote which I ask to-night is, in fact, a vote pledging you to complete religious equality in Ireland by the only means in your power. Sir, I venture to think that the slight historical survey I have just taken of our Irish ecclesiastical policy is itself the most decisive condemnation of employing the authority and resources of the State to force upon an unwilling people a Church with which they have no sympathy. I have no need, on this occasion, to discuss the abstract principle of a Church Establishment. (Hear, hear.) I content myself with the simple avowal that I regard it as essentially unsound, calculated to involve the civil power in numberless embarrassments, to degrade the Church into humiliating bondage, and to injure religion by misrepresenting the true secret of its power. But I rest my argument to-night upon no such abstract opinion. Because, if the theory of a State Church be ever so tenable, the application of that theory to Ireland has been proved by the issue to have been a profound mistake. (Hear, hear.) To it, without doubt, that country may trace much the greater part of the wretchedness it has endured. (Hear, hear.) For surely, if there be any one thing in respect of which a dominant nation ought to be forbearing and indulgent, it is the religion of the people subject to their control. This wise maxim of state policy you have all along set at naught in your government of Ireland. You thrust into the midst of a people whom your arms had subjugated a church with which they could have no communion, and you endowed that church with property snatched from a communion identified with their dearest affections, and receiving their implicit confidence. State necessity may be pleaded in excuse of the original perpetration of this political crime, but cannot be accepted as a justification of it. Nor can it be said, as it may of some crimes, that time has transmuted its results into a blessing. The original vice remains. The great bulk of the people of Ireland—the peasantry—the poor—for whom, if any, a Church Establishment should be maintained—(hear, hear.)—are not, even after the lapse of three centuries, benefited by the spiritual teaching and offices of your Establishment. It is still maintained for the Saxon rather than the Celt, for the gentry rather than the humbler classes, for the well-to-do minority rather than the helpless majority. Such a system as this is at once the offspring of tyranny and the badge of conquest. (Hear, hear.) Nothing on earth can justify it. We may disguise it as we will, but in the eyes of man and of God it is not the less a crime. (Hear, hear.) That existing ecclesiastical arrangements in regard to Ireland ought to be, or can be permanently maintained, is a proposition which I imagine no one will undertake to affirm. The choice of the House will eventually lie between dealing with them separately, or, as I suggest, with all together. The practical question with the House will be, no doubt, whether the remedy I propose is not more violent than the disease. Well, Sir, as far as Ireland is concerned, the effect of applying the policy of disendowment will not be by any means so extensive as it seems. It can hardly be pretended, for instance, that you would thereby leave the bulk of the people destitute of religious teaching. Probably five-sixths of the inhabitants, comprising too the lowest and most needy classes, are shut out already from the benefit of your existing endowments. Whatever may be the case on this side St. George's Channel, in Ireland the Established Church can hardly be looked upon as "the poor man's Church." The extinction of the Maynooth College endowment, one of the objects I propose, would not touch those means which the Roman Catholics have found adequate to maintain their religious institutions for the last three centuries. The discontinuance of the Regium Donum would cut away a portion only of the stipends of Presbyterian ministers—a portion which Presbyterian wealth in Ireland is well able to supply. (Hear, hear.) Even your disendowment of the Irish Church would affect but a small minority of the people, constituting, moreover, the richest section of society in Ireland. And, therefore, although it is true that in this last case you would have to deal with a large amount of property at present set apart for religious purposes, it is equally true that you would thereby disturb but a comparatively small amount of spiritual means.

Here certainly there is no ground for any charge of concealment of purpose, or ambiguity in declaring it. Frankly, manfully, and decidedly, Mr. Miall announces the great object and end for which he and his rapidly multiplying fellow-laborers in the same cause are contending, to be the total and absolute severing of all ties, or species of connexion whatever, of a public and formal kind, between the state and any church whatever—Maynooth to lose its grant—Colonial ecclesiastics, without distinction of creed, to be deprived of their allowances—the Presbyterians to lose the Regium Donum—and last and greatest of all, the Established Church to be stripped of its temporalities. The grand experiment of this sweeping change to be first made in Ireland, but Great Britain herself not by any means to be long left unvisited by the peaceful Revolution once it shall thus have begun its sweeping march.

This proposition of universal disendowment, and throwing every community of religionists in the Empire, whatever their respective denominations may be, upon their own resources, has been much more succinctly, if more roughly, epitomized in popular assemblies under some such formula as the following : “Let every man pay his own clergyman, as he pays his own physician or lawyer, when he has need of them.”

The advocates of the proposition we are dealing with, whatsoever their formula of expression, are ever ready to meet on the very threshold any objection on the score of its appearing to involve injustice to particular parties, by proclaiming in the same breath their willingness to save intact all existing interests : that is, the interests for life of all ecclesiastical persons at present receiving support or emolument from, and on the Protestant Church Establishment. The late Mr. O’Connell was strenuously and scrupulously careful to enunciate on all possible occasions this proviso, and very constantly declared that he would not only not seek, but would be foremost to reject, any measure abating what he considered the national injustice of the Protestant endowment, if it did not provide at the same time for securing to the existing Protestant clergy the life enjoyment of their revenues. His usual remark was, that those parties had entered upon their profession, on the faith of the nation, and that at all hazards and any cost the faith of the nation should be kept with them, and his numerous followers at all times seemed to receive this opinion with approbation and to re-echo it upon all suitable opportunities. Neither his assurances, however, nor theirs, we are bound to say, seem to have had any weight with those who assume to speak as the organs of the Protestant party in England and Ireland, who shew themselves disposed to treat the suggested concession very much in what is called a "thank-you-for-nothing" spirit, but profess utter incredulousness of the sincerity of those from whom it emanates, and Mr. Miall and his immediate supporters have as yet had no better success.

So far this high-handed and contemptuous policy has met with no mischance and occasioned no disaster; on the contrary, it has on the whole rather served the cause of those who would maintain entire the existing condition of things in reference to church arrangements with the State. But the continued rejection thus absolutely and scornfully of all species of proposals for so altering that condition of things as to do away with, or at least to mitigate, the heart-burnings which the present inequality in religious matters, and temporal superiority of one class of religionists over all others, necessarily gives rise to, and keeps up in the bosoms of those of the less favored creeds, cannot ultimately end well. The old story of the Sybilline books, though a fable in itself, yet has its sound and often verified moral. A glaring injustice like this inequality cannot possibly be for ever, or for any very long period, upheld or submitted to. The signs of the times are significant and frequent, that its days, though not yet absolutely determined as to their span, are inevitably approaching a close. When that close shall be at hand, the offers so lightly rejected before may indeed be repeated, but may be, and will undoubtedly, be much diminished in extent and value, and there will be no choice between acceptance and an utter and unconditional surrender. There are not wanting already many and many a loud clamorer among the assailants of the Church Establishment, who protest against reservations in favor of life interests:—declaring that, whatever might have been just or advisable to propose in that respect at first, (and they do not allow that there was anything in itself just or of right in the case even at first, holding that the Church Establishment was an injustice and a robbery ab initio, and those benefiting by it no better in reality than participes criminis)—all claim to favor or to merciful consideration, and much more, all right to concession has been forfeited by the obstinate resistance to the march of reform, and the blind and somewhat insolent rejection of proffered terms and conciliatory propositions.

After having given in the portions of his speech from which our preceding quotations have been taken, a pretty plain and unmistakable view, or glimpse at the least, of his and his party's great end and object—the total disendowment under any and every shape of all religious bodies throughout the Empire and its dependencies, Mr. Miall set about endeavoring to qualify his actual motion, protesting that he did not mean to bring into question on that occasion, the “abstract principle of a Church Establishment,” contenting himself for the nonce with the simple avowal that he regarded such an institution as essentially unsound, calculated to involve the civil power in numberless embarrassments, to degrade the Protestant, or any church so established, into humiliating bondage, and “to injure religion by misrepresenting the true source of its strength!”

His argument of the night he rested, he said, upon no mere abstract opinion, but upon the case and operation of a Church Establishment in the particular instance of Ireland. Supposing the theory of such an establishment to be as tenable as its warmest and most enthusiastic supporters could desire, the application of the theory to Ireland was distinctly proved, according to him, to have been a profound mistake beyond possibility of dispute; and he called upon the House to set matters right as regarded her, without encumbering the subject and embarrassing themselves by entering upon the wider and more intricate considerations connected with the relations between Church and State in the other portions of the United Kingdom; and thus taking Ireland as his chief and for the time his only illustration of the evils of a connexion between Church and State, he naturally came to deal with that article of the so-called “Treaty” of Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland, upon which the Protestant Church Establishment in the latter country is at present based. This article, which, as we have seen, was on the motion of Mr. George Alexander Hamilton, one of the Representatives of Trinity College, Dublin, read by the clerk of the House at the table, previous to Mr. Miall's being allowed to commence his speech, runs as follows :—

ARTICLE 5th.

“That it be the 5th ARTICLE OF UNION that the Churches of England and Ireland, as now by law established, be united into one Protestant Episcopal Church, to be called ‘the United Church of England and Ireland’; and that the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the said United Church shall be, and shall remain in full force for ever, as the same are now by law established for the Church of England, and that the continuance and preservation of the said United Church as the Established Church of England and Ireland, shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union; and that in like manner the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland, shall remain and be preserved as the same are now established by law, and by the Acts for the union of the two Kingdoms of England and of Scotland.”

Before we proceed to shew the manner in which Mr. Miall dealt with the objection thus raised in limine to his proceeding, it may be permitted to us as Irishmen to offer a few remarks upon the foregoing; without entering at all, as it is not our province or present desire to enter, upon the much contested question of the merits, or demerits, whichever our readers may happen to consider them, of the Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland, and equally without contesting for the moment the expediency and rightfulness, or otherwise, of the particular provision before us, or of any other in the Treaty or Act of Union contained, we would call attention to a point in his favor which the honourable member for Rochdale himself omitted to notice. There is an almost universal agreement now-a-days—founded on the irresistible cogency of thoroughly established facts—that the manner and means of carrying the Union were so bad and flagitious, that corruption, falsehood, and force, were so unscrupulously made use of for the purpose, as to deprive that measure of any shadow of a pretension to having been a voluntary and mutual compact between Great Britain and Ireland. There is no prescription against right and justice, and the fifty-six years which the Legislative Union counts since its enactment, have hedged its provisions around with no sanctity where they can be shewn to be unjust, and given them no claim to any greater tenderness of handling, than that as they were enacted under the forms of law, so should those forms be observed in their modification and amendment, or if justice so require it, their abrogation.

It really is most germane to our subject to dwell a little on the topic here suggested. There is much insistence upon the circumstance of the Irish Church Establishment having been thus enshrined as it were in the "Treaty" of Union and without in the smallest way trenching on the domain of international controversy as to the maintenance or repeal of that Union, we not only feel at full liberty to point out the cracks and unsoundness of the enshrining edifice itself, but consider it a duty to truth, justice, and religious equality, to avail ourselves of the opportunity here presented to us, of depriving the advocates of sectarian ascendancy of one of their most relied upon arguments, and forcing them to debate the question of the Protestant Church Establishment on its own intrinsic merits alone, if it can be shewn to have any, and not upon any external consideration whatever.

Lord Castlereagh, the artificer of that Union, declared that as "half a million or more, had been necessary to break an opposition upon a previous occasion, the same or a greater sum was necessary then," (viz. 1799) and he followed up his words by expending a million and a half in bribery to carry the union—a sum, by the way, which was afterwards charged upon the finances of Ireland herself; who was thus made to pay the cost of her own degradation! The late Lord Plunkett described the manner in which the "Treaty!" of Union was carried, in these scathing words; "Licentious and impious France, in all the unrestrained excesses that anarchy and atheism have given birth to, has not committed a more insidious act against her enemy than is now attempted by the professed champion of civilized Europe against Ireland—a friend and ally—even in the hour of her calamity and distress; at a moment when the country is filled with British troops—whilst the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended—whilst trials by court martial are carrying on in many parts of the Kingdom—while the people are made to believe that they have no right to meet and deliberate, and are palsied by their fears—at the moment when we are distracted by internal dissensions—dissensions kept alive as the pretext of our subjugation, and the instrument of our future thralldom; such is the time in which the Union is proposed!"

The eloquent denunciations of Bushe and Saurin to the same effect, are equally well known. As, however, they travelled over much the same ground, we shall confine our Irish quotations to Lord Plunkett, subsequently calling into court an English statesman of that and our own day, the late Lord Grey : Lord Plunkett then at another time added this protest against the constitutionality, if we may use the word, of the Union :—

“I, in the most express terms, deny the competency of Parliament, to pass this measure—you have not been elected for this purpose—you have been appointed to make laws, not legislatures. You are appointed to act under the Constitution, not to destroy it—to exercise the functions of legislators, not to transfer them, and if you do so, your act is a dissolution of the Government, you resolve society into its original elements, and no man in the land is bound to obey you!”

In the English Parliament (the last separate Parliament in England) in 1800, Lord Grey, speaking to the same question, thus delivered himself :—

“If the Parliament of Ireland had been left to itself, un-intimidated, untempted, unawed, it would without hesitation have rejected the resolutions, (articles of Union). One hundred and twenty out of its three hundred members strenuously opposed this Union, having among them two-thirds of the county members and the representatives of Dublin, and of nearly all the places which are to send members to the Imperial Parliament. The majority of 116 were placemen, several of them generals on the staff without a foot of land in Ireland. All persons holding office under government, if they hesitated to vote with the Minister, were instantly dismissed. Even this step was ineffectual and other arts were resorted to which I cannot name in this place..... Twenty-seven of the thirty-two counties of Ireland petitioned against the measure. Dublin, and almost every other town in Ireland, did the same, and, despite every effort of Government, the number of petitioners against, to that of petitioners in favor, was as 700 to one !... Could a nation in more direct terms express its disapprobation of a political measure, than Ireland has of this Legislative Union !”

We have quoted enough to shew that there was no voluntary agreement, or “treaty” mutually consented to in the case, and therefore that it is absurd and directly contrary to the fact to say that the Irish people took on themselves the maintenance of the Established Church, by reason of the act of Union having included that maintenance in the body of its articles. If our argument has necessarily drawn us some way into another and a larger controversy—if our course has necessarily tended somewhat

“ Per ignes suppositos cineri doloso ! ”

the fault and the blame are not with us, but with those who wantonly have provoked a re-consideration of the circumstances attending the carrying of the act of Union, in their desperate efforts to prop up in any way a doomed and tottering injustice.

But willingly quitting as soon as we could the larger field of controversy, we follow these injudicious partizans in their retreat, and press the point directly upon them whether they can attempt to dispute the fact, that the United Parliament itself has more than once waived, abrogated, or altered, the articles of Legislative Union? It is impossible that they can deny this, on a moment's review of those articles, and of the manner in which the things provided for in them are now managed. For instance, in Article IV., it is provided that Ireland shall be represented in the Imperial Parliament by one hundred commoners, “the mode by which they shall be summoned and returned to the same Parliament” being according to an act “passed in the Parliament of Ireland previous to the Union,” such act “to be considered as forming part of the treaty of Union!” Yet Ireland has now 105 representatives, and the mode of their election is no longer regulated by “an Irish act forming part of the treaty of Union,” but by two or three different acts of the Imperial Parliament. We do not complain of these changes; but they are clear precedents for altering any other article of the “Treaty.”

Again, the VII. Article of Union is most notoriously and flagrantly violated and set at naught. It provided for a separate financial status for Ireland, such separation to be maintained for the space of twenty years after the Union, unless on the occurrence of certain circumstances specially set forth. At the expiration of those twenty years a new arrangement was to be made to be triennially revised, but always to preserve the principle of separate taxation for debts contracted previous to the Union, unless the occurrence of the circumstances in question, namely, that the debts of the two countries contracted before the Union should be brought within something of a proportion to each other (the English debt being then enormously greater than the Irish,) and that at the same time Ireland should have become so rich as to be able to bear equal taxation, which she confessedly was not in 1800.

In the year 1817, three years, that is to say before the rightful period according to the VII. Article of Union, this rearrangement was taken in hands and carried out, although the circumstances stipulated for had not occurred. Nay, the very minister who proposed the arrangement declared that Ireland had grown poorer and less able to bear taxation! Yet the protecting Article of Union was abrogated, and we were thenceforth, and are to this day subjected to any taxation England has chosen and may choose to impose upon us, in despite and distinct violation of the VII. Article of the "Treaty."

But even as regards the Church Established itself, the "Treaty" is violated. Article the Fifth provided, as we have seen, that the "doctrine, discipline, and government" of that church should be and remain in full "force for ever, as the same were then established for the Church of England" Yet since then nearly a dozen Bishops have been struck off the muster roll, and there have been many changes of discipline and discrepancies in that respect between the sister-churches.

We leave then this part of our subject, satisfied that we have shewn that neither as regards the "sanctity" nor "integrity" of the Act, or "Treaty" of Legislative Union, is there anything to strengthen the position of those who would maintain the injustice of a Protestant Church Establishment in this country. We now turn again to Mr. Miall, and let him speak for himself.

The argument—if such it can be called—which is attempted to be deduced from the Fifth Article of Union, was met by him, with in the first place a disclaimer of any desire to meddle with the "doctrine, discipline, worship, or government, of the Protestant Church." In the second place, he denied that "temporalities" meant the Church, and finally he argued from various declarations at different times of leading statesmen in Parliament, and from the Church Temporalities Act of 1833, and the Tithe Commutation Act of six or seven years later, which struck off at once 25 per cent. of the tithes in Ireland, that Parliament had asserted and exercised a power of revision of the ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland and might do so again. He then proceeded as follows:—

The next objection which I apprehend will be urged against the policy of disendowment, impartially applied, is, that in regard to the Church Establishment of Ireland it would amount to nothing less than wholesale confiscation. The revenues, it will be said, that I seek to withdraw from the Irish Church, are her own by the same right as that by which a gentleman holds his estate—her title to them, indeed is older than can be produced for any private property, and can only be set aside by an act of legislative spoliation. This, Sir, is a grave objection—fatal if well founded—and therefore the House will bear with me, I trust, if I examine it somewhat closely.

The broadest and most obvious reply to this assertion of exclusive and inherent right on behalf of the Irish Church is, that it rests entirely on a fiction. For, what is the implication contained in the plea that the title of the Irish Church to her revenues dates further back than that of any private property? Manifestly that the Church holds her estates in right of donations and bequests made to her some ages back. Sir, I call this a miserable fiction, because it is notorious that between the donors of these estates and the present beneficiaries there is no line of equitable and moral connexion. If a valid title to these estates can be traced back by any party to the will of the original donors, then they belong of right to the Roman Catholics. Such an inference, however, which I should have supposed no one acquainted with history would deny, has been set aside by a quibble. These revenues, it has been said, were originally bestowed on the Church of Ireland, and by the Church of Ireland they are still possessed. It was competent to that Church to reform herself, and to purge out the errors which had grown up within her, without forfeiting her claim to her property. She has never lost her identity, though she has undergone a reformatory process. Sir, this is a mere play upon words, falsified by all the known facts of Irish history. When did the Roman Catholic Church of Ireland, to whom these revenues were given and bequeathed, reform herself? At what period did she change her views and become Protestant? Never! No, Sir, she was ejected—forcibly, ruthlessly ejected by the State, and another tenant put in. She was thrust forth without ceremony, and her inheritance given to a stranger. There never was a grosser perversion of historical fact than that which represents the Church of Ireland before the Reformation, and the Church of Ireland after the Reformation, as one and the same body. The one was indigenous—the other was an importation. The only semblance of identity between the two was, that the Protestant Church took possession of the title and the property of which the Catholic Church had been in previous possession.

The only title, then, which the Protestant Church of Ireland has to her revenues is to be found in the will of the State—a good and valid title, in my opinion, so long as it lasts. Apart from the will of the State she has no proprietary rights.

The Church of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Church of the Common Prayer-book, the Church of the Protestant Episcopal hierarchy, never had a being in Ireland apart from the Legislature. It was the civil power that said, "Let it be"! and it was. It never had an independent existence. It was, I may say, born a State-Church—it did not become so. State policy was its parent, and, apart from State policy, it never had and never can have, a claim to its revenues. And so the State has ever dealt with it—most constitutionally and most justly, Parliament has imposed the conditions under which the Church of Ireland should enjoy her property, has freely regulated the distribution of it, and within the last thirty years, as I have shown, the State surrendered and extinguished not less than a fourth of the entire income with a view to the easier collection of the remainder.

To the anticipated objection that any interference with the Established Church in Ireland, would be a dangerous precedent as regards that Church in England, he replied by denying any necessary connexion between the two cases—asserting that, on the contrary, the former was condemned by almost every one of the arguments by which the churchman in England would uphold his Church. The Protestant Church in Ireland is not the Church of the majority. In England it is. The Protestant Church in Ireland is not the instructress of the poor—has no hold upon the minds of the people—no historical associations connected with it in their memories—in England the same Church is, or assumes to be, the instructress and guide of the people, is bound up with all that the compilers of school-books and popular literature allow them to know of history, and is represented to them to be, as it were, the Palladium of their liberties. Mr. Miall did not exactly say all this, but such were the general features of the contrast which he drew.

He considered himself next bound to defend his proposition from the charge that it was directly calculated and intended to inflict (to use the often quoted and celebrated words of the late Lord Melbourne), "a heavy blow and a sore discouragement upon Protestantism," at least in Ireland. His view of the matter was that a wide distinction existed between Protestantism as a spiritual principle, and Protestantism as a religious institution. Wealth does not constitute religion, nor the strength of religion. The very reverse he believed to be the case, and that wealth, especially when unjustly obtained, as he contended had been the case with the temporalities of the Protestant Church in Ireland, was really a cause and source of weakness and decay. He accused those who advocated the maintenance of her establishment in this country of being her real enemies, while professing to be her friends. She had "been sent on a mission of love, in a garb of exclusiveness, insolence, and enmity." She had been made odious to the population, whom it was her proclaimed object, her duty, and her pressing interest, to have endeavored to conciliate, and to win over to her fold. He himself retained full faith in her principles, her clergy, her members; but had "no faith in the preposterous arrangements in her behalf" subsisting in Ireland. Well, indeed, might she cry out and pray to be "saved from the folly of her own friends!"

The peroration of his speech embraced a statement, or sketch of the plan by which he proposed to work out the "principle of impartial disendowment."

And now, Sir, although I am conscious of having trespassed upon the patience of the House at too great length—(cheers)—I feel myself bound to present a rough sketch of the plan by which I conceive the principle of impartial disendowment might be reduced to practice. The House will allow me, I hope, for the sake of shewing the entire extent of that plan, to suppose that I am free to deal with all existing State endowments of religion in Ireland. I am aware that such is not the case at the present moment, the abolition of Ministers' Money having been negatived by a vote of the House during the present session, and the Maynooth Endowment having been taken out of my hands by the bill of the honourable member for North Warwickshire. Still, for the sake of unity I will assume that I have to make provision for carrying into effect the policy of disendowment in all the directions in which Parliament can now apply it. Well, Sir, I would suggest with a view to this, the constitution of a special court—for a limited term—analogueous to the present Encumbered Estates Court—"hear, hear," and laughter)—having at once the power of an executive Commission, and also of a Court of Equity. I would vest in that court the fee simple, if I may so call it, of all state Ecclesiastical Endowments in Ireland. It would take possession at once of the fund standing in the name of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland, and to it would be annually paid the sum charged upon the Consolidated Fund for the Endowment of Maynooth College, and the grants voted by this House for Belfast Professors and Nonconforming ministers. But in the case of the endowments and property of the Protestant Episcopal Church, with the exception I have already named, it would come into possession only upon the decease of each existing beneficiary. The first claimants upon the funds thus accruing would be those clergymen who, in case of the abolition of Ministers' Money, the repeal of the Maynooth Endowment Act, and the discontinuance of the Regium Donum, are entitled to receive whatever they now receive from the State during the remainder of life. This list, of course, would be gradually cleared off by the death of the recipients. The second class of claimants would be the private patrons of livings, who have a right to expect full compensation for the anomalous property which State policy would extinguish. (Hear.) They, however, do not number in Ireland above 300 altogether. The third class of claimants would be Protestant congregations, who have voluntarily expended their own money in the improvement of the Church property of their respective parishes. I suggest that the Court should act as a Court of Equity in determining the validity and amount of such claims, subject to appeal, if it be wished, to a superior tribunal, and that it should be authorized to pay over to individual claimants or to trustees on behalf of Protestant congregations such compensation as may be legally awarded. The property left in the hands of the Court for the benefit of the Irish public would comprise Church edifices, glebe houses, lands, rents, rent-charges, &c. With respect to sacred edifices, I think perhaps the most satisfactory arrangement would be to leave Protestant Episcopalian congregations in undisturbed possession of them, and in respect of lands and glebes the Court would have the power of sale. The rent-charges would constitute the main difficulty, because if left in their present shape, it would be necessary to maintain an extensive and costly machinery for their collection. I would suggest that power be given to the landowners to redeem them at, say ten or twelve years' purchase. Well, Sir, the whole of the nett property thus accruing in the proposed Court, by the falling-in of life interests, ought, I think, in common fairness, to be expended in Ireland. I propose that this property should be made available in the first place to the founding and supporting of infirmaries, hospitals, lunatic asylums, and reformatories—and that what is not required for these objects should be laid out, under the direction of a Board of Works, in the construction of piers, harbours, light-houses and quays—"hear, hear," and laughter)—in providing arterial drainage, in deepening rivers, and in such other public undertakings as would best develop the great natural resources of the country. Sir, having thus submitted a rude outline of the plan which I should recommend as the fittest for carrying the policy of impartial dis-endowment into effect, I am most anxious that the House should understand that I do not ask the House to pronounce any opinion on that plan, by the vote which it will give to-night. But it would hardly be candid to conceal from the House the resolutions I should propose in committee, if the House should consent to resolve itself into one. I have no need to include the question of Maynooth—a bill on that subject being already before the House. I cannot, in accordance with the forms of the House, embrace the abolition of Ministers' Money—that matter having been decided by an adverse vote of the House this session. The three resolutions I should propose would be the following—

1. That it is expedient to make provision for the application to other than ecclesiastical uses, of all sites, glebes, tithes, rent-charges, and estates, at present enjoyed or received by any clerical person of the Protestant Episcopal Communion in Ireland, for the support of Divine worship according to the rites of the said communion—but so as not to affect in any manner existing life interests, and to pay due regard to any equitable claims which may arise out of the secularization of such property.

2. That it is expedient to exclude from the Estimates annually presented to this House on account of the grant commonly called the Regium Donum, all sums an account of new congregations—and also to reduce the said grant, and the grant now annually made for the Professorships of the Belfast College, according as the lives fall in, of any persons at present in the receipt of any monies out of either of such grants.

3. That the Chairman ask leave to bring in a bill to carry these resolutions into effect.

And now, Sir, my whole proposition is before the House. I cannot adequately express my gratitude for having been permitted to make it, and for the patience with which I have been listened to. (Hear, hear.) I will not further abuse that patience by making any appeal. What I ask for is, in one word, justice—justice to a people whose long endurance of wrong entitles them to this reparation. (Hear, hear.) And I venture to add the expression of my belief that in doing justice to Ireland, you will at the same time gain the respect, and subserve the best interests, of the people of England. Sir, I move the resolution I have placed in your hands: “That this House resolve itself into Committee to consider the temporalities of the Irish Church, and other pecuniary provisions made by law for religious teaching and worship in Ireland.” (Loud and continued cheers.)

That the motion and speech we have been discussing should have been displeasing to the church party, high and low, was of course to be expected: but there were others who considered that they had grounds for being dissatisfied with it. A large proportion of the representatives for Ireland, nearly the whole in fact of those popularly elected, held the opinion that whatever might be the professions or intentions of Mr. Miall and his English supporters, the tendency of his motion and its most immediate effect—perhaps its only effect—would be to strengthen the hands of Messrs. Spooner and Newdegate in their attacks upon the Maynooth grant. A cover and shield was provided by it for every pretended friend of religious liberty, but real bigot, while those who in all honesty and equity of purpose had hitherto voted for the Maynooth grant, as some small compensation to their Catholic fellow subjects for the large sums they were plundered of to support the Protestant Church, would have the disfavor they had already incurred by their votes with their prejudiced constituencies much and still more unfairly increased, if they hesitated to support the specious proposition of immediate disendowment.

But besides the liberal Irish members, the extreme reform party had a ground of quarrel with the proposition, inasmuch as its present range was to be limited to Ireland; whereas they thought that disendowment of ecclesiastical bodies should be general throughout the United Kingdom and its dependencies; and they utterly repudiated the position, even though taken up only for the sake of argument, that the Established Church in England was in any way the Church of the poor, and questioned if where dissent was so rife, multiform, and wide spread, it could be considered as the Church even of a bare majority. Neither the Irish members, however, nor the extreme advocates of what is called the "voluntary principle" took part in the debate on this occasion, preferring to leave the field to the uncompromising opponents of all change and all reform in matters ecclesiastical.

The van of the opposition to Mr. Miall's motion was led by Mr. Kirk, the Presbyterian representative for the town of Newry. Spare the "Regium Donum" in any case, and at any rate, was the burden of his speech, as might be expected from the "foremost man" in the House of the Northern Presbyterians. According to him it produced every good and was totally innocent of any evil, and to take it away would be to take away the mainstay of religion and morality, wherever its influence had existed! Seventy-five thousand pounds a year, we believe, is its present amount—a small sum to ensure the preservation of religion and morality, if those great blessings be, as he tried to persuade the House, dependent on that amount, and so rickety as not to be able to maintain themselves without a golden prop! Mr. Kirk's theory, however, in this regard was totally contravened and upset by the next speaker, Mr. Lindsay, the extensive ship-owner, Member for Tynemouth, who instanced the far greater efforts made in support of their Church by the Scotch Presbyterians, than those by the Irish, and the at least equally flourishing condition of religion and morality, although unsupported by any Regium Donum.

The abstract merits of the question being thus, at the very beginning of the debate upon it, lost sight of, the next speaker, Mr. Newdegate, M.P. for Warwickshire, improved upon the bad example, and partly to still further divert attention from their calm discussion, and partly to gratify his own offensive bigotry, and that of his supporters out of doors and in the House, commenced an attack on the Roman Catholics. The motion he stigmatized as a "Roman Catholic attack on the Church of Ireland," and its proposer as the "advocate of Roman Catholic views." "It was painful," he complained in the very second sentence of his speech, "to hear members of the Roman Catholic persuasion, after the engagements they had contracted upon oath on their admission to the House, encouraging without scruple a Protestant to attack the Church."

The party, or section of a party, to which Mr. Newdegate belongs, have now for several years made it a part of their tactics to endeavor to frighten the Roman Catholic members by accusations, more or less direct, of disregard of their oaths, from proposing, supporting, or voting, for any measures regarding the Protestant Church. To a considerable extent they have been successful—over scrupulousness, actual timidity, or simple disinclination for squabbles, having from time to time deterred many from taking part in discussions of the nature just mentioned. But the bulk of the Roman Catholic members have wisely and firmly refused to be ensnared by this disreputable artifice, and repudiating either with very justifiable indignation, or calm contempt, these attacks more disgraceful to those who make them than to their objects, have used their rights as Members of the Imperial Parliament on this as on all other questions, fully, freely, and manfully.

There is no doubt however that the continual mooted of this point, and the manner in which it is urged, have created a difficulty in the way of the "Religious Liberty" movement in Parliament, by weakening the number of its supporters; and that as the point is one which refers itself to individual conscience, the amount of support derivable from the Roman Catholic members to the movement in question, must be always variable and uncertain. We do not of course dream that it has been reserved to us to pronounce ex cathedra upon the subject, compose all doubts and silence all objections. But it may be permitted to us, and it may be not altogether without use in the controversy, to review briefly its history and bring out the actual facts concerning it, leaving as before every person at liberty, of course, to draw their own conclusions, and form an act upon their own opinions.

The oath then which Mr. Newdegate and his collaborateurs would have the world to believe utterly and flagrantly violated by those Roman Catholic members who speak or vote for, or in any way forward or support, any motion respecting the Protestant Church, even though but for the re-arrangement of the smallest portion of her temporalities, is the oath prescribed by the "Emancipation act," or "Catholic Relief" measure of

1829, to be taken by Roman Catholic representatives, at the bar of the House before taking their seats therein, and runs as follows:—

“I, A. B. do sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to — Majesty, and will defend — to the utmost of my power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatever, which shall be made against — person, crown, or dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to — Majesty, — heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies, which may be formed against — or them. And I do faithfully promise to maintain, support, and defend, to the utmost of my power, the succession to the Crown. Which succession, by an Act intituled, An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject, is, and stands limited to the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience or allegiance unto any other person claiming or pretending a right to the Crown of this Realm. And I do further declare that it is not an article of my faith, and that I do renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion that princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any other authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or by any other person whatsoever. And I do declare, that I do not believe that the Pope of Rome, or any other foreign prince, prelate, person, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm—I do swear, that I will defend to the utmost of my power, the settlement of property within this realm, as established by the laws; and I do hereby disclaim, disown, and solemnly abjure, any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment as settled by law, within this realm. And I do solemnly swear, that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled, to disturb or weaken the Protestant Religion or Protestant Government in the United Kingdom, and I do solemnly, in the Presence of God, profess, testify, and declare that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever— So help me, &c. &c.

The first and great question immediately suggesting itself, upon perusal of the foregoing is, what were the extent and meaning of its proposer in so wording it? Were Roman Catholic representatives, upon taking it, to understand that they were thenceforth tied up and restricted upon questions relating to the Protestant church—that the liberties of Parliament were for them curtailed and narrowed on such questions, and that in fact they were to be legislators only to a certain point and no farther? Mr. Newdegate, cum suis, loudly proclaims that this was the intent. But Mr. Newdegate was yet in college when the Emancipation Act was passed, and, as he has always been its opponent and denunciator since he came into public life, we cannot accept him as its interpreter. The late Sir Robert Peel introduced it on the first occasion of his "honorable apostacy" ! He had the chief hand in framing the Act, and has, therefore, the right to be considered its author and father. What, then, did he say on the subject, what explanation did he give of his object in providing for the taking of the above oath by Catholic members of Parliament ?

During the earlier discussions upon the measure, while yet in its infant state, the late Sir Wilmot Horton made a motion in the House of Commons on the subject of the "securities," as they were called, which many politicians desired to see exacted from the future Roman Catholic members, for their good conduct when admitted to Parliament. In his brain, ever fertile in impracticable crotchets, he concocted some extraordinary form of assurance or engagement to be by them taken, and brought it before the House for formal discussion, and insertion in the "Catholic Relief Bill" if adopted. On this occasion Sir Robert Peel used the plain and significant words, that he never contemplated, and would not contemplate, the making the Roman Catholic representatives, members by half as it were ; but that they were to have powers and liberties as full as their Protestant fellow-legislators.

Twenty years afterwards—in the year 1849—the nature and meaning of this oath again came under discussion, as on many occasions during the intervening series of years. The particular occasion we refer to was distinguished from the others by the circumstance that Sir Robert Peel once again, and for the first time since 1829, went into something of a detailed statement of his views and intentions in proposing the Catholic Relief Bill of the latter year with the oath in question. The debate having arisen upon a rather sharp passage of words between Catholic members and their ultra-Protestant assailants, the right honorable Baronet was appealed to in the course of it to re-state once more his interpretation of that oath, and thus the controversy, at least in the minds of all reasonable and dispassionate men, whether in or out of Parliament, was ended.

Beginning his reply to the appeal just made with a not very maintainable protest against being called upon to explain and answer for the measure of 1829, and after endeavoring to make a stand upon the quibble that, as he took the form of oath from a previous Act of Parliament, he was not in any way accountable for it when adopted and embodied in his own Act, he proceeded to make a species of counter-appeal to the Catholic members and the House in general, as to whether he did not stand innocent of having ever charged the Roman Catholic members of Parliament with perjury. .

From this he went on to read a considerable portion of his own speech (when proposing the "Relief Bill") in 1829, the purport of which was to repudiate the idea of limiting the functions or powers of Roman Catholics, when admitted to the Legislature as members thereof. The inexpediency, the unconstitutionality, and in fact the impracticability for any useful purpose of such restrictions or limitations were strongly brought out in this extract, and the conclusion he had come to on a full consideration of these and other points was all but plainly stated, and was certainly most plainly deducible from the premises thus laid down. That conclusion was against all restrictions or limitations, or at least against their enactment and compulsory imposition.

With reference to the actual debate, then going on, he used these words: "I leave that question (scil. the true meaning and purport of the Roman Catholic oath in the "Relief" Act) to be determined by each Roman Catholic member after mature reflection upon the terms. I believe his decision, whatsoever that decision may be, will be a conscientious one."

This was, on the whole, about as clear and distinct an exposition and declaration as there was any hope or possibility of eliciting from one so fond of circuitousness and diplomatic verbosity as Sir Robert Peel, when having to deal with any subject upon which it happened not to suit an immediate interest to speak plainly and briefly. A manlier and a fairer course was obvious; but although it is to be regretted that he should have temporized in such a matter at all, the fact is not the less clear, that his original and enduring intention was to act in accordance with the Constitution, and when compelled to admit Catholics to Parliament, to do so in the only manner the Constitution could recognize, namely, as having equal powers and rights with all other members, without which equal powers, privileges, and rights to them, their constituencies would in fact be disfranchised to the extent of the limitation, and thus the injury be to the community and not merely to the individuals.

The words of his which we have quoted in inverted commas in the second last paragraph, convey a species of hint to the Roman Catholic representatives to use tenderly the unlimited legislative powers given to them—in a word, to let expediency, or a consideration for, or dread of, the prejudices of others, influence their conduct, and induce them to abstain from much meddling, where the Protestant Church might be the subject of Parliamentary discussion. And this view of matters may be said on the whole to be that most in favor with the House of Commons, always excepting the ultra-bigots of it, who believe, or for party and sectarian purposes (and in "all uncharitableness," ) affect to believe, that the Relief Act was restrictive, and that Catholic M.P.'s have frequently perjured themselves since.

But such a rule of Parliamentary conduct as the observance of hints and indirectly intimated wishes would be as unconstitutional as unwise. No member of Parliament has a right to forego any of his powers. He may, in the exercise of his fair judgment and discretion, vote on one side or other in a contested debate, or on a particular occasion may abstain from voting, where the positive merits of either side of the question do not come out sufficiently distinctly to satisfy his judgment. But to abstain frequently and systematically from expressing any opinion, or taking any part upon one great class of questions, and questions materially affecting and touching both the interests and the feelings of his constituents, cannot be considered as otherwise than a positive and serious breach or abandonment of duty on his part, and an inexcusable abuse of the high trust committed to him. Of course, if he have a conscientious scruple on the vote, he is right in obeying the dictates of his conscience; but he ought, previous to the occasion arising, to forecast what was likely to happen, and distinctly to inform his constituents that on such and such a class of questions he cannot represent them, and leave it to them to decide whether, under such circumstances, they would continue him in his trust, or wish him to resign it to some one who could and would identify himself by speech and vote with their views upon those questions.

The present Duke of Norfolk, when in the lower House, (and his example was imitated by one or two other English Catholics there,) always walked out of the House on such occasions, declaring that he considered he had entered it as a private gentleman does a club, subject to whatever regulations the club may have chosen to impose upon candidates for admission. The fallacy here was gross. In the first place he quite forgot that a private gentleman entering a club enters it as a private gentleman, representing only himself, and responsible only for and to himself; whereas a member of Parliament, as such, represents a multitude of other people, and is responsible to them for a full discharge of duty and full exercise of functions. In the next place the rules of a club bind all alike, whereas the restriction on voting on Church questions was pretended to be on Catholics, and on Catholics alone.

Other Catholic members abstained, and do still abstain, from such votes through an overscrupulousness. As we have before said, their course should be to consult their constituents, and not any longer to hold their seats unless their constituents consent to be thus practically disfranchised upon so great and vitally important a question as that of the Protestant Church in Ireland.

Again, another section of Catholic members hold a kind of middle-term doctrine, under which they say they are at liberty to vote on measures of Church Reform, and intended improvement of arrangement or distribution, provided such measures are brought forward by Protestants, and not originated by a Roman Catholic. The answer to this is simply, that if, as they believe in the case of their own religion, that rich endowments would be injurious to it, the same should hold good in the case of the Protestant religion; yet the objectors to their votes consider that the reduction for which they thus would vote, would be really a spoliation, and render them quite as obnoxious to the foul imputation of perjury as if they had moved for the total destruction, root and branch, of the Protestant Church. And as regards the originating of the motion, there is no valid distinction in morality between the author and the abettor of what may be an evil action.

The late Mr. O'Connell frequently challenged those who talked about perjury, to take a vote of the House as to what was, and should be taken as, the true sense and meaning of the Catholic oath. He referred to the declarations already quoted of Sir Robert Peel, the author of the Emancipation Act, and in accordance with the most distinct opinion uttered by that statesman, he considered he was left at liberty to judge and act for himself as to the interpretation, until such time as Sir Robert Peel, or the House of Commons, or both, should distinctly and dogmatically define and limit out the powers of Roman Catholic members. At the same time he declared that in case of such definition and limitation he would resign his seat, not being willing either to be a consenting party to the outrage upon the Constitution of crippling the functions of a representative of the people, nor to the disgrace he would feel it to be on himself to retain his nominal position as such when thus crippled.

In the absence of the expressed limitation in question, he claimed and exercised the full rights and powers of a legislator, and as a lawyer practised in the law as well as in the constitution, denied that the actual words of the oath were to be or could be construed into a restriction. The rule of law is, that any penal or restrictive enactment is to be construed strictly and stringently, according to the plain and apparent meaning of the words, and not according to any assumption or inference. Taking then the words, "I abjure any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment as settled by law," Mr. O'Connell and the other Catholic lawyers in the House held that the very insertion of the expressions we have just italicized proved that a temporary state of things was contemplated and not a permanent, and that what "law" could "settle," law could unsettle and re-arrange;—otherwise all legislation would be at a stand still. The House itself had shewn that this was a just interpretation, by altering and altering again since 1800 the Church Establishment in Ireland, although "fired for ever" by Article V. of the Union Act; and also by inviting the Catholic members to vote for these alterations in 1833-34 and 1837. He also contended that as he believed disendowment to have really strengthened his own religion, and that all state connexion was injurious to religion, he could not be accused of seeking to "disturb or weaken the Protestant Religion," unless Protestants would declare that "Religion" meant "money." As to the words "Protestant Government," neither he nor any one else knew what they signified.

When the "Incumbered Estates Act" was under discussion, the assailants of the Catholic M.P.'s were reminded that as the act in question confessedly and declaredly, as well as evidently, went to disturb "the Settlement of Property as by law established"—(which "property" included the greater portion of the old "forfeited estates," for the security of which in the hands of their English or Protestant owners the Legislature had been active ever since 1691)—the Catholic members were quite as open to the charge of "perjury" for voting, as they were invited to do upon that act, as upon any question touching the succeeding branch of the oath, namely, the "Protestant Church Establishment as settled by law." Yet these calumniators did not dare to bring forward in this instance their false and foolish and most uncharitable accusation.

We trust that no one amongst our readers will consider this review of the much agitated and vexatious question about the Catholic oath, to have been otherwise than a necessary part of our subject, when treating of the battle for complete Religious Liberty which is going on in Parliament. A point that involves not merely the votes of some thirty members or thereabouts, but the due representation of the feelings and wishes and convictions of the many hundreds of thousands who have returned them to Parliament to speak those feelings and wishes upon the monstrous anomaly and injustice of a Protestant Church Establishment in Ireland, as on all other matters, cannot be looked upon but as directly and intimately germane to the consideration of the subject of Mr. Miall's motion.

Mr. Pollard Urquhart, M.P., Weastmeath county, himself a Protestant of the Establishment, warmly supported the motion, saying amongst other things that "there could be no greater robbery than to spend the revenues derived from the people, not upon the people's education, but on that of a small sect." He was followed by Mr. George Alexander Hamilton, M.P. for Dublin University, who argued that the state had a great "Christian duty to perform, namely, to adopt a form of Religious worship!" He did not undertake the labor of shewing how it could be consistent with justice or reason, for the "State," which in our times is an aggregation of individuals of widely differing tenets and modes of worship, should select one particular set of those tenets or modes, and impose it, so far as pre-eminence and pecuniary maintenance are concerned, upon the holders and favorers of other forms of religion. His next argument was that which we have already discussed, namely, the asserted inviolability of the act of Union.

Mr. W. Fox, M.P. for Oldham—a great name amongst the dissenters of the United Kingdom, and at least formerly a rather famous preacher amongst those of his own denomination, came next into action, and as a specimen of the opinions of the English Dissenters generally, (always excluding the Western Methodists and one or two other sects, who have lately been coquetting with the Established Church,) we sub-join a brief and compressed report of his speech :—

Mr. W. J. Fox, (Oldham), said, the honourable gentleman who had last spoken desired to place the endowment of the Church of Ireland on the high ground that the teaching of Christianity ought to be endowed. But how, if Christianity became divided into so many sects and so many opinions, that one form of establishment could not be maintained without injustice to others, ("Hear, hear," from Mr. Hadfield.) The omission of any mention of temporalities in the Act of Union was a very remarkable circumstance, and might be taken as a proof that the spirit of the union was intended for the benefit of both countries. The favoritism of the state was, he believed, the cause of apostacy in religion. (Hear.) But what said the honourable member for North Warwickshire? Why, he could not understand the Protestantism of the honourable member for Rochdale. He (Mr. Fox) thoroughly believed in the difficulty he experienced. (A laugh.) The Protestantism of the honourable member for North Warwickshire was bound up in forms, dogmas, and ecclesiastical corporations. The Protestantism of the hon. member for Rochdale was opposed to dominion over the conscience, and asserted the right to free inquiry. He (Mr. Fox,) denied that this motion had been brought on in any fear as to the result of the Maynooth Bill. It was equally desirable to strike at the endowment of the Roman Catholic religion. The explanation of the phenomena of Roman Catholics turning Protestants when they reached America, was to be found in the favorable aspect under which Protestantism was exhibited in America, as compared with its aspect in Ireland. The question now to be decided was—first, whether parliament had a right to deal with the so-called church property in Ireland? and, secondly, whether, if right, it was expedient to exercise it? (Hear, hear.) The right to deal with such property was made manifest, he thought, by the previous interference of parliament with such property. Parliament could deal with it just as it would deal with charitable bequests, if abused. The expediency of dealing with the property of the Establishment he founded on the failure of the Irish Church. It had no claim to nationality. It ought to have such a claim; it had not, and it never would have. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) As a mission the Irish Church was a confessed failure, considering the vast effort which had been resorted to to prop it up. He believed that the Irish Church Establishment would never cease to be a source of trouble and conflict in Ireland. Its very existence as an establishment was a standing insult to the Irish people; and so long as it was so regarded it could not be a beneficial teacher of its own form of Christianity to the people of Ireland. He should support the motion of his honourable friend, not having in his own mind any particular plan. The necessity of revising the distribution of monies devoted to religious teaching and worship in Ireland had become greater since the recent vote on the endowment of Maynooth.

Mr. Napier, the second member for Dublin University, and Lord Palmerston closed the debate. Mr. Napier's position was certainly a novel one, novel in the debate, and novel to the public outside, and as singular as novel. He asserted the right of the Protestant Church to Church property, because, according to him, the Church of Ireland was originally Protestant! "He spoke (he said) of a period long before the Reformation, and before the English invasion, and consequently before the introduction of the Papacy!" Leaving this unique bit of historical information to be digested as it may, we turn to his less transcendental arguments. The 5th article of the Union Act was again brought forward here, and hunted to the death. Then came the following extraordinary position:

"Under the present system every one, whether differing from, or agreeing with the principles of the Church, possessed the most perfect liberty of conscience, but the honorable gentlemen would strike at that liberty and deny to the Established Church those advantages which he himself enjoyed. Why should he want to deprive the Irish Protestants of the right of handing down to their children that Church unimpaired, whose blessings they had the happiness to live under?"

So far as the foregoing is distinctly intelligible, Mr. Napier considers that to deprive the Protestant Church of its overgrown wealth, would be to impair it—(the plain inference being that he considers there is a direct, immediate, and necessary connexion and relation between money and religion!)—and that to take from it this wealth which it at present possesses to the exclusion and at the cost of the members of every other form of religion in these kingdoms, would be to put it in a position of inferiority and disadvantage to those other religious bodies, although it is not proposed to endow them!

In short, the doing away with an unjust exclusive privilege, would be, according to him, the placing its late possessors in an unjustly disadvantageous position towards those who had not been sharers in it, but had suffered from its maintenance!

Lord Palmerston closed the debate. After some generalities as to the desirableness of seeing the different bodies of religionists throughout the Empire, contending in works of charity and not in polemics of any kind, he thus broached his arguments, beginning with that on the Act of Union.

I think that those who argue that that article has no reference to the temporalities of the Irish Church argue that the article has no meaning at all (hear, hear); because if the article simply means that the doctrines of the Church are to be maintained in Ireland, that is a result which no act of parliament can enforce—an obligation upon opinions and consciences which it would be in vain for any legislative instrument or article of treaty to insist upon. And, therefore, if the article has any meaning according to the dictates of common sense, it must mean that the Church of Ireland, in harmony with the Church of England, was to be maintained. (Here, here.) I can attach no other possible signification to the article; and it appears to me to be only playing with words to contend for any other. (Renewed cries of "hear, hear.") On the other hand, I do not go so far as those who would argue that that article prevents you from dealing with the Irish Church. ("Hear, hear," from the ministerial benches.) To maintain that doctrine, you must go further, and say that parliament is precluded from dealing with the English Church. Nor was it deemed inconsistent with this article of the Union to effect great reductions in the Irish Established Church. But then you must deal with the Church, not for the purpose of destroying it, but for the purpose of rendering it more effectual for its objects. That was a purpose quite consistent with the article of the Act of Union. So far, therefore, as regards the article in question. But we are told by honourable gentlemen that these endowments have been diverted from the purpose for which they were granted, and that they are now possessed illegally, and contrary to the intentions of the founders by whom they were originally conferred. Why, Sir, that argument applies precisely as much to England as to Ireland, for the endowments of the Church of England were held when the Church was Catholic. Therefore, that argument appears to me to have no force. These endowments were given to the ministers of religion for the purpose of religious instruction, and if by the force of events the Church was made to change its creed, I hold that it is no perversion or misapplication of those endowments that they should be possessed by the ministers for the time being of that which is the Established Church. Still I do not go along with those who maintain that the property of the Church strictly belongs to the ministers of religion, and that Parliament cannot deal with it. (Hear, hear.) No doubt the property of the Church belongs to the State, and the State, represented by its proper organ, the legislature, has the power and the right to deal with that property according to the circumstances of the times (loud cries of "hear, hear"). The real question, however, between my honourable friend and those who differ from him has no reference to the Irish Church; for, although he directs his motion to Ireland, yet the whole course of his argument takes a much wider range, and brings under discussion the question of an Establishment or no Establishment. I, for one, am decidedly of opinion that a Church Establishment is a proper part of the organization of a civilized country (hear). If example is to be our guide, it is the invariable practice of all nations who have any regard for religion, with the single exception of the republican institutions of North America, to maintain an Established Church. I hold that an Established Church is essential for the well-being of the community. But it is said that that Church ought to be the Church of the majority. Well, if that argument is good for anything, you can have no Established Church in the United Kingdom; because I apprehend that no section of the Christian community can absolutely affirm that it is in a decided majority in the United Kingdom. Take the Presbyterians and Catholics, and set them against those who belong to the Church of England; take the Church of England and Presbyterians, and set them against the Roman Catholics; or take the Roman Catholics and Church of England, and set them against the Presbyterians, and I apprehend that if you are to be bound by the exact rule of making the Established Church the Church of the actual majority of the population, you will find it very difficult upon that principle to found an Established Church in this country at all. I cannot, therefore, admit that the Established Church is to vary from time to time with the proportions of the different sects of the Christian community.

Well, I am now brought to consider the state in which things are. I find the Church of England to be the Established Church of Ireland, and I am called upon by the honourable member not so much in his motion as in his speech, to substitute for the Establishment the voluntary principle. I must say I cannot go with him to that end, and, therefore, I am not disposed to concur in the motion which leads to that result. As a general rule, it is much more easy for persons to object than to propose, and I must say my honourable friend has, without seeing his danger, run into a state of embarrassment by launching into a proposal as to what he would substitute for the Establishment. He purposes to take from the Church of Ireland its resources—and if that were done in Ireland, the same principle must be adopted in this country—and to establish a board which would be invested with all that property, being prepared at the same time to adopt such conciliatory arrangements as would make his plan acceptable to a variety of interests. Thus, the landlord would be afforded the opportunity of redeeming his tithes at ten years' purchase—a very advantageous offer, no doubt, and one which my honourable friend the member for Northamptonshire, as a large landed proprietor, would cheerfully agree to (laughter). Then he proposes to counties the construction of bridges, of lunatic asylums and gaols, besides works of arterial drainage, and that the lights of the Church should be converted into lights of navigation (renewed laughter). I must say, however, that a proposal of that sort is hardly likely to be seriously entertained, and if Parliament is ever brought to contemplate the abolition of the Church Establishment in this kingdom, and the substitution of voluntary contributions, instead of the endowments which now exist, I think it probable that some better and more fitting application of those great revenues would be discovered than that which my honourable friend suggests. Sir, I purpose to avoid going into those other topics connected with religious differences which it is most desirable, if possible, to avoid in discussions of this house. But being of that opinion, and having a deep conviction that a Church Establishment is essential in every country in which it is desirable that religion should be diffused and inculcated in the minds of the population; being, therefore, perfectly determined never to agree to the substitution of the voluntary system for the system of an Establishment, and seeing that the motion of my honourable friend goes directly to the point which I am anxious to avoid ; and believing also, that with reference to that part of the motion which has regard to Ireland, that it is at variance with the engagements contracted between the two countries at the period of the union, I feel compelled to give my vote against the proposal now before the house. (Hear, hear.)

It is said that the great endeavor of a minister having to prepare a speech for the sovereign to deliver at the opening of Parliament is, that it shall really mean nothing. The ministerial speech we have just quoted, may be said to be in the opposite extreme, and to mean everything or anything ! No doubt in the difficult position of a minister in these shifting times, that is a great point to attain. But to see how much (or how little) of sound principle and manful assertion of the right there is in it, let us shortly set out the points, divested of their cloud of words.

1st.—The Act of Union (Article V.) either has no meaning at all, or provides for the maintenance "in full force for ever, as the same were then, (1800) established for England, of the temporalities, as well as the doctrine, worship, &c., &c., of the Protestant Church in Ireland."

2nd.—But Lord Palmerston does not think that precludes "great reductions" in the Irish Established Church, (although those reductions be not made in the English.) What then becomes of the "maintenance in full force for ever as then established in England." &c., &c., &c.

3rdly.—He considers that the perversion of ancient Catholic endowments to Protestant purposes is no misapplication, where "by the force of events the Church was made to change its creed." Yet the Catholic Church in Ireland did not change its creed.

4thly.—At the same time he denies that the "endowments" or "temporalities" belong to the ministers of Religion, and that Parliament cannot deal with them "according to the circumstances of the times." This declaration was hailed with loud cheers by the advocates of Mr. Miall's motion.

5thly.—Considering the question to be really "Establishment" or no "Establishment," he declares for the former, as "essential to the well-being of a country," although "not the church of the majority"—there being, according to him, no section of the Christian community in the United Kingdom, that can affirm itself a majority. Why the Establishment and temporal pre-eminence of a particular church not being the church of a majority, and therefore being thus pre-eminent and "established" to the exclusion and disadvantage of the majority, should be essential to the well-being of a "country," he did not attempt to explain.

6thly.—He objected to the mode of distribution of the Church Revenues after disendowment—proposed by Mr. Miall, and finally for all these "reasons" (!) he "felt compelled to give his vote against the proposal now before the House!"—the word "now" being a significant reservation, which taken in conjunction with the diplomacy and incongruity of other portions of this characteristic speech, intimates that at a future time, under other circumstances, entire religious freedom may not meet a very deadly enemy in a statesman who has so long observed and conformed himself to the current of events and the fluctuations of public opinion—anything (as the lawyers say) in the Act of Union, or any other "Treaty" or arrangement to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding!

The motion was then negatived on a division by 163 to 93—or taking into account "Pairs" and "Tellers," by 191 to 121.

These relative numbers are held to be significant, and undoubtedly are so, of the advance of the question in popular estimation. The minority in favor of it is much stronger than the lists of former divisions on the same subject have ever exhibited, and the whole number voting, pairs included, is also greater than ever before known, and clearly demonstrates the large increase of interest and importance attached to it of late in the minds of Members of Parliament themselves.

To our thinking the speech of the Prime Minister is a symptom of quite equal, if not of greater significance, of the progress that Religious Liberty—in the sense of universal disendowment and voluntarism as regards contributions for ecclesiastical purposes—is making in the public mind. One who so narrowly watches as he does, and conforms himself so carefully to the bents and changes of that mind, would not have given us the valuable confession that the Protestant Church is not that of a majority, did he not clearly see that its prestige is gone, and that the truth may at length be spoken about it plainly, preparatory to the plain dealing it has ere long to expect. And although objecting to Mr. Miall's motion and opposing it, he was yet, as we have seen, careful to make it understood that he only resisted the proposal "now" before the House, and not by any means that he was hostile to some other plan of their conversion to civil objects and purposes. The very weakness and utter worthlessness, too, of the pretended arguments, on which he rested his present desire to uphold a Church Establishment, were significant of his consciousness that it has no sound support, and that its ultimate abolition is less a matter of argument than a matter of time.

Meanwhile, that which should be the united body of its supporters had become divided into parties and sections, differing amongst themselves widely and increasingly upon points of discipline, of government, and even on those of doctrine, and with difficulty got to make a show of uniting for some such passing and really valueless demonstration as the majority on Mr. Miall's motion. With doctrinal differences it is not our province, and most certainly not our inclination, to deal in this paper, or in any public mode of controversy or discussion. But we may touch lightly upon some of the evidences of other differences of less intrinsic gravity, though of serious importance and significance as regards outward things.

The following is from the "Record," an ultra defender of the Church Establishment:—

It is our duty to raise our voice in respectful remonstrance to many of our Bishops, and earnestly to call attention to the fact that the position they hold in public opinion is neither honourable to themselves nor safe to the Church. . . . We say not a word now of the scandals which, from time to time, have arisen in the Church, making it a bye-word among men of the world, from the worldliness of one, or the untruthfulness of another, or the covetousness of a third ; from evil ambition, from insincerity, from partial nepotism, or oppressive tyranny. We have no wish to rip up these old sores again, for we are fully persuaded that it is impossible for us to mourn over them more profoundly, perhaps not so profoundly, as many of the Bishops themselves have done and do. In a worldly scale, it would be difficult, perhaps, to find a body of men morally more respectable than the men who have occupied the English Bench. But this is poor praise to bestow upon those who ought to stand in the van of the great Christian warfare ; the guides and the examples of that branch of Christ's Church which, with all her faults, is still one of the purest and most evangelical upon earth. The fact over which we mourn is still broader in its effects than any merely personal inconsistencies can be ; it is that the Bishops do not rise to the necessities of their great position ; that they are behind their age, instead of leading it; following doubtfully in the wake of the great religious movements which now agitate the world for good or evil, instead of standing boldly forward, surpassing the holy in their spirituality, the wise in their forethought, and the fervent in their zeal.

The position of the Church at the present time is eminently anomalous. The one great fact which stands forward in frightful prominence is, the spiritual destitution of thousands of immortal souls, who live and die nominally within her pale and within sound of her Sabbath bells, in a state of utter heathenism, not surpassed by the horrors of Hindoo idolatry, or the deep, unbroken barbarism which still broods over the heart of populous Africa. * * * Now we bless God that the great characteristic of the religious feeling of the present day is a profound appreciation of this awful fact. The anxious and almost feverish efforts put forth on all sides and in all directions for the evangelization of our people, are the unanswerable proof, how deeply this feeling has taken hold of the heart and mind of our English Christianity.

There does not exist a single layman in the Church of England, now engaged in the Lord's work, who would not rejoice to have the frank and hearty support of the Bishops, instead of that tardy, timid, and doubting aid which needs to be sought and solicited over and over again; or who would not, in such a case, willingly submit in points of detail to their counsel and direction. But the reverse is unbaptily the case. Instead of encouraging, our Bishops stand aloof in suspicious fear at this activity of lay zeal.

"LET US SAVE SOULS, IF WE CAN DO IT CONSISTENTLY WITH ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER," APPEARS TO BE THE FEELING, "BUT IF NOT, LET THEM PERISH." * * * We unhesitatingly assert that the limb of Christian zeal in the Church of England are fettered by restrictions, and tied by a timid fear of change, such as never existed in the days of primitive Christianity, and which primitive Christianity would never for a moment have tolerated.

To the squabbings, as at Torrington in the diocese of the well known Dr. Philpotts, Bishop of Exeter, and at other places in England, on the necessity or otherwise of episcopal consecration of burial grounds—to the unseemly, and not unfrequently riotous, proceedings in the same country whenever and wherever church rates come under parochial discussion—and above all to those still more unseemly and often far more violently riotous proceedings that have been, and are, of almost daily occurrence on the vexed questions as to the proper times for a clergyman to robe himself in black and in white—the amount and quality of the ornaments to be placed on or around the communion table, and the lawfulness or unlawfulness of bowings and genuflexions during Divine Service—to all these and the like incidents having relation to church matters, we shall no further advert than to remark that they are all necessarily tending to weaken more and more the authority and influence of the Established Church, to lower its dignity, and diminish popular respect, and to familiarize men's minds with the ideas of lay interference in ecclesiastical changes, and to the exercise and practice of it, at first partially and locally, then more generally and progressively, and at length universally, and to the ultimate extent of abolition of the Establishment.

But this last result, though assuredly upon the cards, and casting its shadow before with rapidly growing distinctness, is ignored in the most transcendental manner by the extreme High Churchmen, and by not a few others upon ordinary points not agreeing with the former. The very highest ground is at once boldly taken by these persons for the maintenance of a Church Establishment. They support it as a divine ordinance, and considering the Protestant Church Establishment of these countries to be the Institution most fitted to carry out the designs of Providence in this regard, busy themselves with interminable and most hair-splitting researches and disquisitions upon the just limits respectively of authority, civil, ecclesiastical, and spiritual, to the entire neglect of the war raging around them against any and all establishments, and seem to take no thought nor heed of the "Free-Trade Religionists" thundering at their gates!

"We have in England at the present time," say these respectable enthusiasts, (or mixture of respectable enthusiasts with overweening pretenders and arrogant intolerants,)—"the difficult task of discovering what are the proper limits of that Legislation which the State may upon sound principles and with useful result, exercise over those National Priests whom it has taken from among the Ministers and organs of the Church of God, the mystical body of Christ.

We assume the following positions: That the State by its Executive, has a right to maintain outward order and decency in all parts of its own constitution, and therefore in its National Priesthood. Also, that the Church is a body which has not only spiritual life and organic action as well as power to minister to the spiritual wants of her own members, but also has Divine authority to support and maintain in them a high order of holiness, the marked characteristic of true Christianity.

All men, however, in a nation do not from the heart believe, nor from the conscience obey. The disobedient, therefore, both of the national priesthood and of the laity, when their enormities exceed the sufferance of civilised life, must be restrained by suitable laws. But since it has been customary among civilised nations, Heathen or Christian, to require in the national teachers of their religion an example of superior order and morality, a peculiar class of laws, called 'the King's ecclesiastical laws,' are found on the statute books for the discipline of the clergy, but only in the peculiar capacity of a national priesthood. If, moreover, at any time, or in any kingdom, the spiritual discipline which ought to be administered by the organs of Christ's body be in abeyance, inoperative or lethargic, these laws have appeared the more imperatively necessary, and ecclesiastical statutes have been multiplied to save the national priesthood from contempt.

It cannot, however, for one instant be supposed that the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Prince can take the place or perform the service of the spiritual discipline of the body mystical, so as to render the revival of spiritual discipline, when in abeyance, neither desirable nor necessary. The sphere in which discipline statutes and spiritual discipline operate is not the same.

Possibly there are few of our readers who will hesitate to admit that an ecclesiastical statute, to secure the outward decency of the national priesthood, ought in its action to be considerate of, if not subordinate to, the higher and more spiritual discipline."

After a very long and laborious disquisition (accompanied by citations of authorities ancient and modern) into the origin, progress, and history, of jurisdictions, ecclesiastical and spiritual, the "Church Discipline Bill" of the last Session is made the theme of examination and suggestion:—

"If a clerk in holy orders be degraded by Archbishop or Bishop he may, by clause 42, have an appeal to the Privy Council . . . who may order him to resume the cure of souls. . . . We propose the amendment that spiritual persons be deposed only by the sentence of the Bishop and twelve synodical judices in the organic Synod of the Diocese . . . and that if the accused appeal to Her Majesty in council, and that Her Majesty refer back the sentence to the organic synod of the province, and receive back a confirmed or amended judgment and sentence.

"The various amendments we propose will not interfere with, but promote the object of the Bill, and assist in putting away all doubts, heart-burnings, and conscientious scruples attending on the decision of spiritual questions by the officers of an earthly sovereign. This evil could not be remedied by any other means than the revival of organic Synods, for even if all the Privy Council were Bishops, there could be no trust placed in their spiritual decisions, inasmuch as they would be assembled by, and be subject to the will of princes.

We solemnly call upon the Members of the Privy Council and Government, unless they have a Divine commission, or Revelation from Heaven, not to presume to meddle with those things which are under the ordering of that Person, of the ever-blessed Trinity, who descended upon earth, and who now abides below to care for the souls of men, by means of the organs which He makes in the body from time to time to guide and lead them into all truth!"—The 'SYNODICON,' Nos. IX. & X. April, 1856. Thompson, Publisher, 3, Burlington-street, Strand, London.

Enough is quoted above to shew the spirit and tenor of this publication, and how complete and high-handed is the assumption that the Establishment of the Protestant Church is to be maintained and perpetuated—the only question with the writers appearing to be to what extent, if at all, the Civil Power, which supports and feeds that Establishment, shall be permitted to express even an opinion upon its arrangements and management!

In taking leave of the uncompromising "Synodicon," we will only further extract the following short paragraph, which, whatever the intention with which it was written, or the connexion with the rest of the subject, seems to give rather a vantage ground to those who hold that a Church can and ought to stand and prosper totally unconnected with the State:

No rules nor directions are discoverable in Holy Writ concerning a national priesthood, nor that Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction which presides over its order and decencies. The Holy Ghost has made no revelation on the subject: neither the Apostles nor the Ministers of Christ are ever spoken of as being entangled with the duties of national priests. . . . The Redeemer warned the organs of his body to "beware of surfeiting and drunkenness," and "the cares of this life" in the latter days! It is a fact that the organs of his body served the empire of Rome as an Imperial Priesthood for five centuries without being enrolled in the Imperial Constitution.—The SYNODICON, No. IX., Appendix to Chapter VI.

If the Church in early times thus so well performed the work of its Divine Founder without state connexion;—if in those five centuries the great work of christianising mankind was so extensively and effectively carried out without any help from the State, is not the argument a fair one, that a Church which in these later days shall dispense with all that tends towards "surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life"—in a word, with the dangerous attribute of wealth, and yet continue zealous and effective in its ministrations, will thereby give the best evidence and proof of its possessing the truth.

Zealots, and pretenders to zeal, alike may speculate and theorize, may assume to dictate, and put forth dogmas with most oracular solemnity, but nothing that they can say or do can arrest the gradual but irresistible progress of the "Voluntary Principle" in Church-matters throughout these kingdoms. They are even hastening, to a certain degree, that progress themselves by the extreme tenacity of their resistance to suggestions and measures of reform, and the not a little arrogant tone which they adopt towards, not merely the old and avowed enemies of the Protestant Church-Establishment, but towards those who, attached as themselves to that Establishment, have allowed their common sense to act, and carefully scanning and considering the signs of the age, have recognized that timely reforms and concessions offer the only chance of long preserving the temporal ascendancy of their Church.

Advantage is further given to the "Voluntaries" by the very inconsistent approbation somewhat enthusiastically given by the extreme Church party to the sweeping measures of so-called reform, but real confiscation and deprivation, passed by the Parliament of the kingdom of Sardinia at the instigation of the reckless Cavour, for the Church of that befooled and conceited little State. If those measures be good for Sardinia, is it possible they should be bad for Great Britain and Ireland? If the voluntary gifts of their congregations in the hands of religious orders and secular chapters, and canonries of the Sardinian Church be fair objects of plunder by the State, and if those orders and ecclesiastical bodies are legitimately dispersed and deprived in Sardinia, what delicacy should there be about resuming from the State-Church in these countries the donations given to it by the State, and in suppressing benefices and canonries where the work done bears so small a proportion to the wealth enjoyed, as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have so frequently reported to be the case in many localities throughout the United Kingdom.

This example—preceded by the equally violent and equally lauded instances of Church Robbery in Spain and Switzerland, as well as in some of the wretched little South American Republics, and minor German states,—is extremely contagious; and those who pretend to read aright the signs of the coming time, are beginning to prophesy that the Established Church has before it only the choice of either accepting, with a good grace and speedily, large reforms and retrenchments proposed, and to be carried out in a peaceable and not altogether inconsiderate manner, or of having, at no very protracted period, to submit to rude and far more sweeping change—change perhaps going directly and without delay to the full extent of the abolition of temporalities. The maintenance very much longer of anything like the present status quo, does not seem to be within the list of possibilities, much less within that of what is probable. The danger to Church Establishments is not merely from popular agitation. Kings and princes and governments are, here and there, and with increasing frequency, giving manifestation of a desire to deal a little in the style of Henry the Eighth of England, with ecclesiastical possessions within their respective dominions. A very main article of those documents prolific of discord, which are known by the designation of "concordats" with the Pope, has always been the reserved right of the temporal power to put its fingers into the Ecclesiastical purse. And the Greek church in Russia, the Luthero-Calvinistic or "Evangelical" Church in Prussia, and the various forms of Protestantism in other parts of Europe, as in Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Wirtemberg, Saxony, &c., all can attest the lovingness of the state for their coffers, to at least as full an extent as its attachment to their dogmas. And in order to secure a power over Church Revenues of all kinds, interferences of the gravest character with Church arrangements of an internal character, and with ministerial appointments, &c., are becoming general.

One of the Evangelical periodicals of London has recently published a letter in which the writer calls attention to an address to the King of the Netherlands from a very large number of his subjects, professing Protestantism according to the form established in that country, in which they most movingly appeal against "the fearful state of despotism" in which they say their Church is held by his government. The address is too long and goes into too much minutiae of detail to be quoted here, but it is enough to say, that it exposes throughout, a system of governmental interference, especially in points bearing upon the collection and management of revenues and endowments, which rather forcibly reminds one of the famous equivoque in the case of George the First, when he announced to his people that he had come for "all their goods!" In Prussia the poor liberty of complaint is denied, and therefore, there is no such outspoken declaration as that of the Dutch churchmen; and of course in the Russian Empire there is a similar enforced silence. But in both those states the absolute bondage of the Established Churches, and the unlimited power of the temporal governments over ecclesiastical monies, are well known facts. It is then for those who are sincere and devoted in their attachment to the Established Church, to take thought in time, and endeavor to make up not only their own minds, but those of the clergy of their church, to the inevitably coming changes. From their clergy the opposition is at present strongest and most compact, although that body would be guaranteed (by the proviso for securing life-interests) from any loss of income in the present generation. This assured security has not in any way abated their opposition to reform in matters ecclesiastical, and we are quite willing to believe that their opposition proceeds from conscientious motives; in particular from the idea, so natural to the clerical mind, of its being against their duty and beyond their power to consent to any alienation from the church. But natural, or reasonable, or well grounded, or otherwise, as their, or the opposition of any other body may be, events will march notwithstanding, and the public will and the demands of the public voice must be conceded. Reform has made wide and large inroads and changes in matters political. It has totally, or nearly totally, changed the face of things in municipal affairs. It has invaded the long snugly-closed and guarded demeane of the Civil Administration, and even already has worked a wondrous revolution there, and opened wide the way for more to be done. It is idle then, and worse than idle, to think of shutting it out in matters ecclesiastical, and as the coming change neither can in these times be, nor is it desired to be, in the direction of a closer and more intimate state connexion or state dependance, true wisdom would dictate a making of terms in time, and a cheerful concession of a part to conciliate public and popular opinion, and thereby render the more safe and secure what remains.

At all events, if the Church Establishment advocates and partizans will not be up and doing, their opponents most certainly will. Mr. Miall and his friends are determined to go on, and many sections of the community, who do not agree in his plans and particular propositions, are yet with him in principle, and as determined as he is, that Reform ecclesiastical shall progress, and progress in earnest. "It is my intention," writes Mr. Miall, (to the secretaries of the recent public meeting at Clonakilty in the County of Cork, to petition against the Established Church), "at an early part of the next Session, to bring the question again before the House, and I will renew my efforts session after session.

 . . . The grievance I have assailed is so unsusceptible of any valid defence, that it must fall before enlightened public opinion.
 * * *

“As I have not taken up the matter in a light spirit, nor with any view to personal or party ends, so I trust I shall not be found to abandon it, nor suffer it in my hands to be disposed of by any unworthy compromise.”

We had intended ere concluding this Article to have gone into an exposition of the state and position, in so far as temporalities are concerned, of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, to show of what wonders voluntarism is capable, and the little reason there is to fear for the temporal maintenance of any Church that is well seated in the affections of its flock. In this country, the poorest in Europe, a complete hierarchy of four archbishops and twenty-eight bishops, and a second order of clergy and religious communities, comprising altogether over 4,000 persons, are maintained in the fullest efficiency, and religious edifices of great size, and frequently of much architectural merit, are upraised in every direction by voluntary contributions, without the slightest aid from the state, and assuredly the wealthy congregations of the Established Church—comprising, as it does, such a vast proportion of the upper classes within its fold,—could,—and would, readily do at least as much for their own Church as the poor laboring Catholic does for his. We are restricted by the necessity of concluding the present paper from going into details, but the facts we have alluded to are notorious, and the inference from them appears to be irresistible.

In fine, we wish well to Mr. Miall in his undertaking, although if we had to choose, a better and more suitable exponent of Irish popular views of this great question might perhaps be found. Still, the combination of energy and capacity with sincerity is not so frequent that their concurrence in his case should not be welcomed, and his exertions be duly lauded and supported. No one is deceived as to the motives of some of those who vote with him. They hope to make use of him so far as to get the House of Commons to do away with the paltry “endowment,” as it is called, of Maynooth College, and mean to stop there, and cease their efforts when that object shall be accomplished. But the stream into which they have thrown themselves has a strength they little wot of while swimming with it, and the moment they seek to turn it, will sweep them away, or cast them by, useless upon the shore. Common sense and reason have already shewn themselves too powerful for prejudice and privilege in other departments of legislation and state-business, and they now are gathering their forces for a grand assault upon the last remaining fortress of antiquated injustice. The demonstration of the Session just gone by, was of good and cheering omen, and if the friends of religious liberty will only bestir themselves during the months yet to run, of the usual Parliamentary Recess, the beginning of the Session of 1857, may witness a manifestation of sound public opinion and determination on the subject, before which it will be impossible for the most fanatical, or the wildest and ablest of the partizans of the Church Establishment, to maintain their ground.

We trust we shall be able to induce the writer of this valuable paper to return to the subject in our December number, and to shew, as no man in these Kingdoms could so well shew, the position, political and religious, of the Catholic Church in Ireland.—ED.

The following Table is important, and will enable the reader to judge of the relative number of worshippers in the various communions in England and Scotland. The figures referring to the Catholics are glaringly incorrect, and the numbers much understated.

The following passages are worthy of notice :—

A SMALL CONGREGATION.—The Northern Ensign says:—"In one of the parishes on the east coast of Sutherland, where the congregation was composed of two families, it happens that one of these families—a late importation from about Dunnet Head—had gone over to the Free Church; the other, two elderly maiden ladies, remaining as the flock of the parish minister. But the minister, in addressing the congregation thus femininely constituted, still uses the words 'brethren,' and 'my brethren,' much to the chagrin of these worthy persons, who feel insulted at their being thus masculined. Would it not be more courteous, and indeed more in accordance with the fact, that the gentleman should use the term 'sisters?' If some such change of expression does not take place, we fear it will soon be seen that these birds will also leave their nest and fly away."

A CONTRAST.—A dissenting minister in Wales, who is threatened with a seizure for church rates, writes—"I preach every Sabbath to eight or nine hundred colliers, miners, and labourers, and they willingly contribute about one hundred pounds a year towards my support. The rector reads a sermon to some ten or fifteen persons every Sabbath, and receives six or seven hundred pounds a year for his services, and yet it seems that I must be prosecuted for not supporting his cause. This is rather a hard case!"—Liberator.

We insert the following Leaders from "The Times" and "Morning Herald," as a suitable Appendix to the foregoing Article :—

From "The Times," September 8th.

The Church of England enjoys the reputation of being the richest in the world. No doubt, that reputation, like the credit of a mercantile house, is itself a valuable property. On the strength of comfortable livings and splendid dignities, thousands of parents are continually sending their most promising sons through public school and college, in hope of a share in these prizes. Thus, the mere calculation, whether doomed to be realized or not, brings into the ministry of the church a large proportion of men with good connexions and a place in society. It has been argued by men with much wisdom of the world, that this is a state of things which particularly suits the British people ; that the pay of the church is all the more seductive for being a lottery, and that the many who get only the blanks share the social consideration which accrues from the prizes. Arguments like these, and very much worse than these, are capable of a showy exposition, especially in that gay and airy style usual in successful dignitaries. But there remains the fact that, to most clergymen, the church is not only a disappointment, which may be said of many other things—not only a bad commercial speculation, which may seem only a just penalty on secular motives—but a grinding, degrading, and paralyzing poverty. To half of the clergy, including a large proportion of hardworking and meritorious men, our boasted establishment, so far from being the richest, is practically the poorest in the world. Not only is it poor—it is even impoverishing. Putting together school, college, and perhaps also private tuition and special preparation for orders, they have each had nearly £2,000 invested in this speculation, as it is admitted to be; and the interest of that sum at four per cent. is, by act of Parliament, the ordinary pay of a curate charged with the entire care of a parish. In some cases Parliament prescribes a higher rate, but £80 a-year is all that a clergyman, a highly-educated man of any standing and any personal qualification, may require, and is likely to obtain for the entire charge of a considerable parish, in any situation, good or bad. This is the Parliamentary provision for a working clergyman in a Church called the wealthiest in the world. It is all that any clergyman can be said to reckon upon ; and it is for this, this only certainty, that provident English parents deny themselves, and rob their other sons and daughters, to give one son an education which must cost £1,200 or £1,500, and may cost twice as much. Yet even this pittance, this four per cent. on the money invested, is not quite a certainty. There prevails in the English Church a most serious amount of what we may call contraband dealing between incumbents and curate, to defeat the parliamentary enactment for the latter. Out of the cupidity of the one class and the necessity of the other there arise numerous underhand bargains, in which the curate binds himself to accept less than the parliamentary stipend. We should only have to open our columns to cases of clerical destitution, and we should soon present such a picture of educated misery as is not to be found elsewhere in the world. But it has already been brought before us in various ways. One correspondent lately instanced a list of thirty advertisements from clergymen in search of curates. Out of this number one only offered £100 a year, one £90, one or two £80, and the rest rapidly fell from £70 down to £56, with a small furnished house, the rector being non-resident. One incumbent offered £50 a year, with the use of rectory-house, the curate to buy the furniture at a valuation of £360. Another offered £70 in a parish of nearly 6,000, where there was daily service. Some appealed to wealthy clergymen for gratuitous assistance. Several offered £50 a year, or the pay of a schoolmaster. These figures speak for themselves, and illustrate the relation of incumbent and curate in our Church. Every gentleman knows the position in which an incumbent stands, as a matter of course, to those whose entire services he has secured for £70, or £50, or £56 a year, particularly when they and he have condescended to evade the law in order to fix so low a sum.

That such a position, and a bearing in harmony with it, are only too general there is abundant evidence. We have lately an instance in the demeanor of an English incumbent, resident in Ireland, to his unfortunate curate, doing the duty of a large parish for £80 a year and a few surplice fees. No sooner was the unfortunate gentleman laid up with an illness arising from the insalubrity of his parish than he received a virtual dismissal. The cost for supplying the poor man's place was, of course, to be deducted from his pittance, and would inevitably soon eat it up. The generosity of the public has interposed between this curate and his employer, but the pecuniary figures of the case, the certain consequences of illness, and the summary nature of the ejection, are common to thousands of cases. Such are the scanty pittance, the precarious tenure, the impending calamities, and the social position of several thousand men who are humorously told to bask in the splendours of a wealthy establishment, and to rejoice in the light of golden canons and episcopal millionaires. Such are the men who have to govern parishes, to conduct themselves with ease and dignity towards squires and manufacturers, to relieve the burdens and share the anxieties of the poorer flocks—in fact, to be the mainstay of our social system. They have to be diligent, and therefore strong; wise, and free from excessive care; gentle, and therefore without much harass. They are always to be in good condition for their duties, which, well discharged, are laborious and trying enough. There is no situation, indeed, which so much requires the health of body and mind and ease of outward condition, as that of the man who appears among a number of ordinary people as the ambassador of Heaven—the representative of a Redeemer—the man to show the way to Heaven—immense pretensions, that can never be worthily maintained, and are too often miserably belied.

Of course, there is another side of the question, as incumbents take care to inform us. Curates are represented as an inferior race of men, otherwise they would not still be curates. Whatever their duties, they, in fact, do very little, getting over their parochial work very lightly, preaching indifferent sermons, and even reading mechanically. They are drudges, it is said; there are plenty of them, as there is of drudges in every department, and it is needless to pay more than the market price for an article of trade with which the market is overstocked. As to the alleged inferiority of the class, it should be considered that in this sublunary sphere it is not easy for any one to maintain a high tone, a dignified manner, or the other components of greatness, on £80 a-year, especially when a family has to be maintained at the same time. Poverty is very depressing, in so much that few have passed through that ordeal even for a brief period without retaining traces of it for the rest of their lives. But it is the permanent condition, the life's long trial, of the curate class, and when "a poor creature," as saucy young ladies and gentlemen calls him, gets up in the reading-desk, drones out the prayers, and hammers through an old sermon, few know how often it may be said that he once had genius, sentiment, learning, and zeal, but that

"Chill penury repressed his noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul."

It is all very well to talk of the labour of love, and to expect a man to be all the more open to the sublimest motives because he can have no other. Such, however, is the language of bishops and archdeacons, who are always the most eloquent in recommending "counsels of perfection." The truth is that nineteen men out of twenty—to be on the safe side—will be sure to do their work ill if they are paid for it ill, and they will make no effort to improve it if no improvement whatever be rewarded. Of the general class of curates few have the least chance of a living, even if they did their duty ever so well; and every head of a mercantile establishment knows how he would be served, if the best salary he could give his best men was one hundred pounds a year, without the chance of improvement. A curate need only take his allotted part in the services of the Church, show himself a little in his parish, call occasionally on a parishioner, and drop in now and then upon the school, and he will pass muster with the enthusiast who spends ten hours a-day in teaching, praying, exhorting, consoling, revealing, and other spiritual labours. They both stand the same in the eyes of the Church of England. The record of their labours is the same. If the devotee has a patron, or a wealthy friend, or £5,000 to spare in his own pocket, he may, if he pleases, solicit his patron, or invest his money, and acquire a more important, or more dignified, or more agreeable position in the Church. Otherwise, he not only may, but most probably will, remain all his life what he is—a curate, or small incumbent, on his £100 a-year. Being a devotee, however, he is much more likely to spend his money in charity, in church-building, in education, in answers to appeals, and he will probably remain what he is all his days. No doubt, it is better for him that he should. No doubt, he has treasure "elsewhere." No doubt, in that "elsewhere" piety, simplicity, and zeal are recognized even in the humble form of a curate. In the Church of England they are not. Whether its preferments are in private or official hands, or simply on the market, they are very rarely indeed administered on any such consideration. This state of things will not only be admitted, it will even be defended by most zealous Churchmen. In the gross violation of common sense which characterizes the state of our ecclesiastical endowments, "zealous Churchmen" see a trace of the supernatural. There must be something heavenly about it, for it defies all earthly consideration. If the salaries and promotions of any department of State, of an army, or a navy, or a mercantile house, were left on such a footing, everything would go to rack and ruin. But spiritual facts are not in their nature so palpable and obtrusive as material: while a department in confusion, an Exchequer in default, a foundered fleet, a Crimean campaign, or a bankrupt bank addresses itself to the most "carnal" apprehensions, a spiritual chaos can be discerned only by those who really care about such things.

From "The Morning Herald," September 8th.

The Press endeavours to escape under cover of "a feigned issue." It says:—

"There is only one substantial point in dispute between the Herald and ourselves. It is simply as to whether Maynooth was ever a test of Conservative Protestantism between 1835 and 1841."

What have we been discussing with the Press for the last three weeks? The Maynooth question. And what is the Maynooth question? It is, whether or not the act of 1845 shall be repealed? Now, what can speeches made in 1835 or 1841, long before the Maynooth Endowment Bill was framed, have to do with that question? Clearly, nothing. We ourselves introduced the years 1835-1841 into the discussion. But how? We stated that Sir Robert Peel built up the Conservative party on Protestant professions, and ruined the Conservative party by proving a traitor to those principles. And we warned the Conservatives of the present day against the blindness, the madness of treading in his steps. That he did so rear up a party on Protestant professions we proved by Dr. Buchanan's memorandum, confirmed by Mr. Pringle's evidence, and still more confirmed by Sir Robert's own wretched plea of non mi ricordo. We proved it still further by Sir James Graham's speeches of 1838-1839, 1840, made while he sat by Sir Robert Peel's side.

"But did he say nothing about Maynooth?"

No, he did not say anything about Maynooth—nor about the Wiseman aggression, nor about Mr. Chambers's Bill for Conventual Visitation. The reason may be found in the Critic—

"The Spanish fleet thou canst not see, because 'tis not in sight."

So much for Sir James Graham's speeches. Lastly, we are again reminded of Lord George Bentinck.

"The important fact, that the lamented Lord George Bentinck was not only opposed to insulting the Roman Catholics of Ireland, by revoking grants to them, over which time has cast the shield of prescription, but that he was actually in favour of endowing the Roman Catholic priesthood, a project which we never recommended."

It is said, "the Herald thought it better to keep silent on this important fact." We kept silence, because we thought it a fact of no importance whatever. Lord George Bentinck spoke and voted in favour of the Romanists, as he spoke and voted in favour of the Jews; and might, probably, if he had been asked, have spoken and voted in favour of the Socinians, or of the Mormonites. But what then? Lord George Bentinck was a great man on two or three particular questions, to which he had devoted much attention. On these his opinion was valuable. But there were other questions, and questions of importance, respecting which he was profoundly ignorant. In the present case, if we were to be struck to the earth by the mere mention of his name, as approving Maynooth, we might reckon on being next called upon to "emancipate the Jews," because that was his vote. But the plain truth is, that both on the Maynooth question and the Jewish question, at least 99 out of every 100 of the Conservative party hold Lord George Bentinck to have been altogether in the wrong. And hence, to cite his opinion on the question now before us, is of as little use as to cite the opinion of Mr. Thomas Moore or my Lord Palmerston himself.

ART. VIII.—PEEL'S MEMOIRS—THE PHILOSOPHY OF AGITATION.

*Memoirs by the Right Honorable Sir Robert Peel, Bart.,
M.P., &c.*—Published by the Trustees of his Papers, Lord
Mahon, now Earl Stanhope, and the Right Honorable Edward Cardwell, M.P.—Part I. Roman Catholic Question.
London: John Murray. 1856.

Most of the critical journals have noticed Sir Robert Peel's memoirs, and join in the expression of some disappointment at the dryness of the first volume. So far, however, from regarding the justification disclosed by its pages as incomplete, they seem of a mind to consider it superfluous. What the public expectation required was either more amplitude or more anatomy, a warmer pencil, or a more vigorous scalpel. Although the correspondence, of which the book is principally made up, purports to be, and is, in strictness confidential, it retains for the most part a severely official character. There is hardly any freedom, any unreserve, anything unguarded, that may serve to mark the stages or break the abruptness of a change, which we take to have been less sudden than it seems, rather on Sir Robert Peel's credit than on the evidence of his memoirs. The outline, too, of events and circumstances, by which the letters stand connected and explained, is thin although distinct. It is in the nature of a ground plan, where we find everything correct, symmetrical, and intelligible, but without beauty or interest. We must look elsewhere for the philosophy of consistency or change; for any large or abstract principles of statesmanship; for any gloss upon that most difficult chapter of constitutional history for which these memoirs supply materials. Still more hopeless is the prospect of anecdotes, or sketches of character, or smart sayings, or scandal, or sentiment, or anything that constitutes the vulgar merit of memoirs. These things have their own place and fitness, but if the public expected them of Sir Robert Peel, the public has no reason to complain of disappointment. Sir Robert Peel was never more accurately himself than in the compilation of this book. Calculating, but not speculative; regardful of things as he was incurious of ideas; not so nice about a name as studious of a result; governed, but not overawed, by his responsibility; treating politics as a pursuit, while too many regard it as a game ; and the commonwealth as a trust, though it is the high breeding of party to use it as a counter ; ambitious yet scrupulous ; benevolent without the forms of benevolence ; self-sacrificing without the externals of heroism ; bold, but not imaginative, and sagacious though not ingenious ; he seems exactly the man to have written the book before us from a sense of duty, not as a labour of love, even of self-love ; and to have composed his history as he performed his part, for the ease of his conscience and the service of the state.

The book might easily have been rendered more attractive, whether by the author or the editors, but in that case it must have been less characteristic. It might have made been more welcome to the drawing-room, and that without any decrease of value ; but its present place is in the closet, and in the hands of the advanced student who can dispense with notes and scholia. The philosophy to be learned in its pages has never been symbolized ; it is nowhere to be met in axioms or formulas ; it lies at considerable depth beneath the surface ; but it will reward the inquirer with some of the most important truths in the ethics of the constitution. "The origin of party may be traced," writes Lord Brougham, "by fond theorists and sanguine votaries of the system to a radical difference of opinion and principle, to the 'idem sentire de republicâ,' which at all times marshalled men in combinations and split them in opposition ; but it is pretty plain to any person of ordinary understanding that a far less romantic ground of union and of operation has for the most part excited the individual interests of the parties ; the 'idem velle atque idem nolle,' the desire of power and of plunder which, as all cannot share, each is desirous of snatching and holding. The history of English party is as certainly that of a few great men and powerful families on the one hand, contending for place and power, with a few other on the opposite quarter, as it is the history of the Plantagenets, the Tudors, and the Stuarts. There is nothing more untrue than to represent principle as at the bottom of it—Interest is at the bottom, and the opposition of principles is subservient to the opposition of interest. Accordingly, the result has been that unless, perhaps, where a dynasty was changed, as in 1688 and for some time afterwards, and excepting on questions connected with this change, the very same conduct was held and the same principles professed by both parties when in office, and by both when in opposition. Of this we have seen sufficiently marked instances in the course of the foregoing pages. The Whig in opposition was for retrenchment and for peace; transplant him into office, he cares little for either. Bills of coercion, suspensions of the constitution, were his abhorrence when propounded by Tories; in place he propounded them himself. Acts of indemnity and of attainder were the favorites of the Tory in power, the Tory in opposition was the enemy of both. The gravest charge ever brought by the Whig against his adversary was the personal proscription of an exalted individual to please a king; the worst charge that the Tory can level against the Whig is the support of a proscription still less justifiable to please a viceroy.

"It cannot surely in these circumstances be deemed extraordinary that plain men uninitiated in the aristocratic mysteries whereof a rigid devotion to party, forms one of the most sacred, should be apt to see a very different connexion between principle and faction, from the one usually put forward, and that without at all denying a relation between the two things, they discern the account generally given by party men, and suspect them of taking up principles in order to marshal themselves in alliances, and hostilities for their own interests, instead of engaging in these contests because of their conflicting principles—In a word there seems some reason to suppose that interest having really divided them into bands, principles are professed for the purpose of better compassing their objects in maintaining a character and gaining the support of the people."*

This statement, for it is something more than theory, so broadly presented by Lord Brougham, though true to a great extent, is, perhaps, not so universal in its application as even our own experience might lead us to suppose; nor do the facts themselves inevitably lead to the conclusions that have been drawn from them or involve the moral offence imputed in the passage. Many men of vigorous intellect, and incorruptible virtue, having been rocked and dandled into statemanship, connect the well-being of the state as a matter of course with the power of their party; and look upon their own advancement as a happy accident, nay, rather a necessary condition of prosperous government. The weight of authority the sacredness of tradition, the spell of association, accompany them from beginning to end, perhaps narrowing the mind but not necessarily corrupting the heart. Much of what Lord Brougham describes is inherent in human nature—much, perhaps, inseparable from our system of government; a great deal of it the small price of incalculable advantages. But after making every possible allowance, after straining indulgence to its limit, and trimming Lord Brougham's generalities with probably too critical a knife, there yet remain sufficient meanness and sufficient bad faith in party politics to make his averments substantially true. The small ambitions, the sordid interests, the obscene avidities, the ravening claims, hungry in proportion to their emptiness, and clamorous in the degree of their immorality, the vigilance eager to be lulled, and the virtue that waits to be deflowered, are too familiar as the offspring of party in its most repulsive aspect, not to be easily recognized even when limned by a less skilful hand than that of Brougham. The instances of men in power who have sacrificed conviction and the empire to office, to party, to weakness, or to cowardice, are too numerous. You have no occasion to look for them. There is scarce a great name since the Revolution that does not represent delinquency such as we have been describing. Lord North's administration perhaps is the most signal as well as the most disastrous instance of adherence to a policy condemned by reason and conscience, in deference to the requirements of party or at least of a king. The adoption of the war policy by Pitt in 1793 mainly with a view to the monopoly of office; the abandonment of the Catholic claims and the repudiation of his own pledges by the same minister in 1804; the tenderness of Canning and Lord Castlereagh for the conscience of George IV. a tenderness which so completely seared their own; the bad system of open questions by which dishonesty was perpetuated under the style of compromise, as ladies of uncertain reputation, not only get the brevet rank of honest women, but a safe and protected range of license, by a change of name; the intimate conviction impressed upon the minds of statesmen that office is essential to usefulness, a conviction fortified by the belief that they are essential to office, and gliding smoothly into the persuasion that office is its own reward: these, with other and innumerable proofs in later years, which we forbear to mention as they are still the proper matter of party comment, afford sufficient evidence that the morality of party stands in need of a reform; and that the reform requires to be deep and wide. Perhaps, indeed, the present disorganized state of parties is the precursor of some such change, but it has not taken that shape, or given itself out as such. On the contrary, the last general election furnished the most pregnant example of party spirit in quest of a principle, and taking up with a cry. Weary in its chace after even a phantom of protection, it crimped "No Popery," a more villanous and disreputable spectre still ; and, after wandering in dry places through its term of probation, it came back to the swept and garnished house from which it had been expelled, not with new doctrines or purer principles, but with other spirits more wicked than itself.

But if the boundaries of party have been at all confused, and whether the confusion be for in good or in evil, Sir Robert Peel was certainly the man who, by his adoption of the Catholic claims, unsettled the allegiance of men to party, even although, like him, they may not have transferred it to duty. It would be quite wrong to consider Sir Robert Peel, at least up to a certain period, as a patron of religious freedom. Lord Grenville was undoubtedly a confessor of the Catholic claims, and sealed his confession with much sacrifice. Were it not for his adherence to these claims, and to the principle of the claims, he might, as Lord Brougham very truly observes, have held the first place in the councils of the state. Sir Robert Peel was never, or at least not till a very late period, a convert to the principle of religious liberty. He had certain interests very much at heart ; these interests he believed to be the most precious in and to the state ; he came, in the course of his experience, to believe these interests compromised by the continuance of Catholic disabilities ; and, having once arrived at this conclusion, he resolved to assert the dignity, liberty, and duty of the statesman in upholding, at whatever cost to himself and to his party, the interest best approved to his reason and nearest to his conscience. The fume of his self sacrifice might have been very agreeable to those interests, but his sacrifice alone could not have secured them ; it was his part to save them first and then sacrifice himself. He yielded the Catholic claims, not because he considered them just, nor did he resist them because he thought them unreasonable. For the purpose of our inquiry x or y may be substituted for emancipation or the repeal of the corn laws. Our concern is with the minister elevated to office by his party, and promoting in that same office an object of national interest, to the discom-figure, disarray, and all but extinction of the party he was supposed to represent.

It is in this colder and less amiable light that Sir Robert Peel has chosen to hold himself out in his memoirs, but to the political philosopher it does not alter his position in the least. As friends of religious freedom we should be glad to claim so distinguished a convert, although it has never been made clear to us that he held a very different theory of religious liberty from that maintained by the friends of emancipation; but throughout these memoirs, in vindicating his change of conduct, he rests his defence upon no change of abstract principle, but upon grounds purely political, and deals with the entire question as one of danger and expediency. This is very clearly put by himself, in a letter to the late Bishop Jebb, an inexorable opponent of concession, and in the closing pages of the volume, which recapitulate the motives that urged him to undertake the adjustment of the Catholic Question.

Mr. PEEL, to the Bishop of LIMERICK.

Whitehall, February 8, 1829.

MY DEAR LORD—I beg to assure you with perfect sincerity, that no opinions that you can express to me, and no course of public conduct that you may feel yourself called on to take, can diminish the gratification that I shall have in hearing your sentiments, and still less my unaffected respect for your unblemished name and great acquirements.

I am the last person to express surprise that you should apprehend danger from concession to the Roman Catholics; but I entreat you dispassionately to consider the facts I am about to recall to your notice, the prospect which there is of being enabled to maintain permanent resistance to concession, and the danger that concession may be forced upon us under circumstances much more unfavourable than the present.

In the first place there has been a division between the House of Lords and the House of Commons on this subject that has now endured sixteen years.

Secondly, It has been found necessary, in carrying on the Government of this country for the last twenty five years, not to exclude from the councils of the King such men as Mr. Pitt, the late Lord Melville, Lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Canning. Their exclusion from the Government in times of pressing difficulty was impossible. Their admission into it produced disunion in the Cabinet, and tended to advance Roman Catholic interests. Their inability immediately to carry their views into effect made them probably more decided in their language as to the necessity of ultimately adopting those views.

Thirdly, The opinions of the young men who are now entering into public life, and who are likely to distinguish themselves, are, with scarcely an exception, if with one, in favour of an adjustment of the question.

Fourthly, In the course of the last six months. England being at peace with the whole world, has had five-sixths of the infantry force of the United Kingdom occupied in maintaining the peace and in police duties in Ireland. I consider the state of things which requires such an application of military force much worse than open rebellion.

Fifthly, There has been established an intimate union between the Roman Catholic laity and the Roman Catholic priesthood; in consequence of that union the representation of the counties of Waterford, Monaghan, Clare, and Louth, has been wrested from the hands of the natural aristocracy of those counties; and if the present state of things is to continue, if parties in Parliament are to remain so nicely balanced that each can paralyse the other, that one can prevent concession, the other can prevent restraint and control, we must make up our minds to see sixty or seventy Radicals sent from Ireland when a General Election shall take place.

Sixthly, The state of society in Ireland will soon become perfectly incompatible with trial by jury in any political cases. The Roman Catholics have discovered their strength in respect to the elective franchise. Let us beware that we do not teach them how easy it will be to paralyse the Government and the law, unless we are prepared to substitute some other system of criminal jurisprudence for the present system.

If this be the state of things at present, let me implore you to consider what would be the condition of England in the event of war.

Would an English Parliament tolerate for one moment a state of things in Ireland which would compel the appropriation of half her military force to protect or rather to control that exposed part of the Empire?

Can we forget, in reviewing the history of Ireland, what happened in 1782, what happened in 1793? It is easy to blame the concessions that were then made, but they were not made without an intimate conviction of their absolute necessity in order to prevent greater dangers.

My first impression is that, unless an united Government takes the whole condition of Ireland into its consideration, and attempts to settle the Catholic Question, we must be prepared for the necessity of settling it at some future period in a manner neither safe to Protestant establishments, nor consistent with the dignity of the Crown of England.

Remove the differences as to civil disabilities, and I think the Protestant mind will be united against Popery in a ten times greater degree than it is at present.

Excuse the haste in which I am obliged to write on a subject of such vast importance.

Believe me, &c.,

ROBERT PEEL.

Bishop of LIMERICK to Mr. PEELE.

February 11, 1829.

MY DEAR SIR—I have reconsidered (for they were not new to me) all the arguments in your letter with the utmost calmness and deliberation in my power. The result has been an increased conviction, if possible, that infinitely more difficulties and dangers will attach to concession than to uncompromising resistance.

That our state is most awful I cannot, if I would, conceal from myself. The Papists of Ireland indeed know their strength; but their chief strength lies, and they know that too, in the weakness of our Government. After a long period of misrule, with an appalling military force in the country, no substantive measure has been taken within the last six months of total anarchy against the agitators and against treason worse than open rebellion. On the contrary, the friends of the Constitution have been discountenanced almost as enemies,—its enemies encouraged altogether as friends: and, humanly speaking, under such a system nothing can save us.

But my ultimate reliance is placed, where it cannot be shaken, in Divine Providence. I trust that all will yet be right; but, in the mean time, in defence of all that is dear to British Protestants, I am cheerfully prepared, if necessary, as others of my Order have formerly done to lay down life itself.

With every feeling of personal kindness,

I have, &c.,

JOHN LIMERICK."

Of opponents of another class equally determined with the Bishop to resist the measure of relief, but less charitably disposed towards its author, there were abundant examples among the constituent body whose confidence I had the misfortune to forfeit.

If it had been alleged against me that the sudden adoption of a different policy had proved the want of early sagacity and foresight on my part—if the charge had been that I had adhered with too much pertinacity to a hopeless cause—that I had permitted for too long a period the engagements of party or undue deference to the wishes of constituents to outweigh the accumulating evidence of an approaching necessity—if this had been the accusation against me, I might find it more difficult to give it a complete and decisive refutation.

But the charge preferred by those whose favour and goodwill I had forfeited was the opposite of this; it was that I had without any sufficient reason, nay that I had from pusillanimous and unworthy motives, counselled the abandonment of resistance, which it would have been easy, as well as wise, to continue unabated.

I must leave it to others to determine, after weighing the evidence which I have adduced, and that additional evidence to which the lapse of time will no doubt give access, whether, at the period that concession was determined on, the reasons in favour of concession as opposed to continued and uncompromising resistance did or did not preponderate.

Of my own motives and intentions I may be allowed to speak.

Pusillanimity—the want of moral courage—would have prompted a very different course from that which I pursued. If I had been swayed by any unworthy fears—the fear of obloquy—the fear of responsibility—the fear of Parliamentary conflict—I might have concealed my real opinion—might have sheltered myself under the dishonest plea of a false consistency, and have gained the hollow applause which is lavished upon those who inflexibly adhere to an opinion once pronounced, though altered circumstances may justify and demand the modification or abandonment of it.

If I had been stimulated by personal ambition—that sort of ambition, I mean, which is content with the lead of a political party, and the possession of official power—I might have encouraged and deferred to the scruples of the Sovereign, and might have appealed to the religious feelings of the country to rally round the Throne for the maintenance of the Protestant religion, and the protection of the Royal conscience.

From the imputation of other motives still more unworthy, the documents I now produce will, I trust, suffice to protect my memory, I can with truth affirm, as I do solemnly affirm in the presence of Almighty God, “to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid,” that in advising and promoting the measures of 1829 I was swayed by no fear except the fear of public calamity, and that I acted throughout on a deep conviction that those measures were not only conducive to the general welfare, but that they had become imperatively necessary in order to avert from interests which had a special claim upon my support—the interests of the Church and of institutions connected with the Church—an imminent and increasing danger.

It may be that I was unconsciously influenced by motives less perfectly pure and disinterested—by the secret satisfaction of being,

“———when the waves went high,
A daring pilot in extremity.”

But at any rate it was no ignoble ambition which prompted me to bear the brunt of a desperate conflict, and at the same time to submit to the sacrifice of everything dear to a public man, excepting the approval of his own conscience, and the hope of ultimate justice.

ROBERT PEEL.

Many Roman Catholics from the date of Emancipation, and nearly the entire body at a later period, conceived an exalted idea of the services of Sir Robert Peel. The feeling warmed into admiration, or even into something like enthusiasm, during the papal aggression ferment in 1851, when the only statesmen, with one or two distinguished exceptions, who opposed the popular movement, were those who had remained to the last under the leadership and cherished the memory of Sir Robert Peel. The warmth of these sentiments, it is evident, has suffered some abatement since the publication of the Memoirs, and no one could be altogether unprepared for the disappointment expressed by many at the somewhat chilly doctrine in the extract just quoted. The reason, however, of this feeling is not very solid—Sir Robert Peel never that we are aware embodied in words any opinion, or set of opinions, with which these last are at variance, and he is no more to be held accountable for the fancies of his admirers than for those of his traducers. Still it cannot, but be interesting to compare the estimate formed of Sir Robert Peel by the more thoughtful and educated Roman Catholics a few years back, with the impression apparently communicated to them by the present volume, and for this purpose their well known organ, the Dublin Review, may be taken to represent their opinions with tolerable accuracy. Accordingly, in a paper upon Edmund Burke (No. LXVII., April, 1853), we find the following certainly not unwilling tribute to Sir Robert Peel, in which his merits are thrown into considerable relief by the reflections of the essayist upon a living statesman.

But in noticing some of the revolutions of opinion, whether supposed or actual, in public men, it would hardly be forgiven in us Catholics, if we were to neglect a passing allusion to those connected with the honoured name of Peel. There is little in common between Burke and him, nor do there exist, that we know of, any of those salient points of difference that furnish matter for an historical parallel. Burke had to repel the charge of inconsistency, while Peel as frankly confessed to change; and whatever name that change may take, we owe his memory a worship for it, which it never could be ours to deny or stint. His motives are not to be curiously or irreverently scanned, for though he may not have had for our faith the same tender, respectful, and almost filial reverence as Burke, he looked upon ourselves as countrymen, and brethren in right; as children of the same great empire and gracious sovereign. We have so lately suffered from far different changes of conduct and opinion, that we are in a proper tone of mind to study his, and we might propose the manner, even if not the substance, of them to all who contemplate a change or foresee its probability. It was no part of his changes to discharge splenetic insults on those he had left, or what he had uttered without dignity, to retract without grace. He flung no smoky firebrands to burn himself in the attempt to stamp them out, or surrounded abortive projects of vexation, with misty threats; exaggerating to the dimensions of persecution the petty deformities of annoyance. If he had to work a change, he spurned any tricky expedients for doing it, and along with the pedantry of his school, rejected all ministerial sleight of hand. His course may have been eccentric, it was not erratic : let him steer where he might, he always anchored where he ought ; let public clamour and public fanaticism bear down upon him as they would, he neither defied their power with proud words, nor conjured their rage with muttered spells ; he flung no chains into the surge, he laid no stripes upon it, but neither did he propitiate it with libations, or appease it with despairing vows. He relied upon himself, met it full upon his prow, steered right on, broke it, and rode through. His were changes we could scarce barter for a consistency less glorious than that of Burke.

We next quote from a paper on the Peel Memoirs in the last number of the same journal, in which the feeling of disappointment to which we have adverted is expressed, not ungracefully it is true, nor in a cavilling spirit, but with a good deal of positiveness and decision. The reviewer, after copying the last pages of the volume, goes on to say—

It is hard to refuse to sympathise with an avowal so open and so direct from the heart. It is still more difficult to do so, when we carry our thoughts back to the angry and excited period, the still painful recollections of which no doubt inspired the tone of indignant earnestness which characterises this appeal—when we recall the charges of “imbecility, pusillanimity, and irreligion” from which even men like Southey could not forbear, when we see what was done under the most honorable motives openly described as “a deceiving of friends and a betrayal of the constitution ;” above all, when we recollect that the very plea of necessity, by which alone the ministry sought to vindicate their change of policy, was broadly stigmatized as a plea of their own creation—a plea arising out of a danger, the growth of which they had themselves knowingly, wilfully, and even treacherously, tolerated, or rather fostered.

And yet while, viewing his conduct under these relations, it would be ungracious and ungenerous to withhold our sympathy from one who, with a full knowledge of the obloquy to which he exposed himself, had the courage to brave it in our cause, we doubt whether there be any Catholic who, with all his admiration, and gratitude for the author of these Memoirs, will not rise from their perusal with a feeling of vague disappointment, if not of absolute regret. It cannot fail to strike him painfully that, although there is not, from the beginning to the end of the volume, an unfriendly sentiment or a disrespectful phrase in reference to the Catholic Church, yet neither is there a single word or phrase from which it would be possible to infer, that the course taken by Mr. Peel on the Catholic Question arose from a higher motive than that of political expediency, or perhaps it might better be said, of political necessity. Not a word occurs—whether in his correspondence at the time, or in the observations and communications by which it is now accompanied, or in the general narrative in which the course of events is reviewed—which can be construed into a retraction of those opinions on the abstract justice of the case which he had professed throughout his earlier career;—not a word of real sympathy with the Catholic struggle for equality, or of regret, much less of indignation, at the long course of intolerant exclusion of which they had been the victims. The author of this Memoir never once rises beyond the level of a politician, we had almost said a partisan; nor is there a single principle brought forward, whether in the many discussions which took place between him and his colleagues, or in the various state papers submitted to the King, to the cabinet, or to his private friends, which could be dignified with the name of political philosophy. In no phase of his life does Sir Robert Peel appear more unmistakably as THE STATESMAN OF EXPEDIENCY, than in the records which he himself has left of the settlement of the Catholic Question.

But, on the other hand, it is only due in justice as well as in gratitude, to confess, that, having once, from whatever motive, taken a decided course on this momentous topic, his after conduct was marked by the highest principles of honour, and by the most graceful and generous frankness. If his papers exhibit no evidence of avowed sympathy with Catholics, neither do they bear a trace of secret hostility, or what would be worse, of insidious friendship. If there be in them no show of a desire to favour, yet neither is there any show of a disposition to undermine. Sir Robert Peel had the good sense and the manliness to abandon the petty devices, by which, under the name of securities, former legislators, even those most favorable to Catholics, had sought to mar the benefit which they offered, and to fetter the liberty which they conferred. There is abundant evidence that the few restrictive provisions by which his measure of relief was accompanied, were meant to remain a dead letter; and were rather intended to disarm the opposition of the antagonists of Catholic liberties, than to restrict these liberties, or to limit the fulness of their exercise. If his measure of concession was tardy, it was, when it came at last, generous, graceful, comprehensive, beyond the dreams of former emancipators, and we may add, beyond the hopes of many among the most sanguine of Catholics themselves.

There is much truth in the last paragraph especially of this extract. As was the case in all Sir Robert Peel's political (distinguishing them from his politico-fiscal) measures, the conception was outdone by the execution, and in view of this fact at least, Catholics have no reason to cancel a line or recall a word in the expression of their gratitude. The securities with which even the original friends of concession proposed to confine and stunt it, in the hope of conciliating opposition, would have gone farther to demoralize the Catholic emancipated than his disabilities had degraded him unrelieved. He should have purchased the being free or being not half free of the city at a great price indeed. Outside the constitution he had been an object partly of pity and partly of dread ; within he must have been sacred to contempt. It would have been left for him either to preserve his dignity by keeping aloof, or forfeit his pride and independence the moment he approached. Fetters are at all events more respectable for a man than leading strings, and Prometheus under the beak of the vulture is greater than Hercules under the discipline of the slipper. Thus, it was proposed to make the admission of Catholics depend upon a yearly vote ; or to give them only a few years' trial in the first instance ; or, to limit their numbers in Parliament ; or to restrict their privileges ; or confine them to neutral ground, by excluding them from the discussion of certain questions ; or to interfere in the election of bishops and intercourse of ecclesiastics with Rome, by establishing an inspection of bulls and rescripts. The idea was even entertained of applying to the body politic one of those little ingenuities of torture, one of those perpetual blisters that act with such wonderful vigour in Baden or Wurtemberg, a board of direction for ecclesiastical matters composed of lay Catholics, to mediate between the Protestant sovereign and Roman Catholic hierarchy ; and to keep up that agonizing itching and luxurious scratching which it is the delight of German pedantry to contrive for the unhappy states subjected to its practice. But Sir Robert Peel was above the policy of governing by an Irish row. He of course knew that in carrying his measure he might be enabled to destroy the credit of half a dozen of laymen, perhaps to bring a notable portion of the clergy into suspicion—to maintain a chronic fever, not fatal to life, but destructive of enjoyment—to keep a few traitors in pay, and a whole nation of malcontents in anger, powerless against the state and useless for its service—yet he saw no condition of security in disorder ; for he felt that to weaken conscience is not to strengthen loyalty, and that you cannot have public virtue if you humble public spirit. Under this impression he discarded the securities, and gave as permanent a character to the relief measure as perhaps was possible under the circumstances. The two or three restrictions embodied in the bill were intended and contrived more for effect than use (as was well known at the time), and as the event has proved. It is quite evident that the measure, as it stands, is provisional and incomplete, and we have reason to believe that its author himself looked upon it in that light. The

The endowment of Maynooth was nothing more or less than a complement to the relief act ; and though it had the appearance of a bribe to the prevailing agitation, there is now little doubt of its having been one of a projected series of well considered measures, which Sir Robert Peel could certainly have properly carried had time and opportunity been given to him. In his speech as a minister of the crown, he stated his deliberation, after sixteen years' experience of the relief act, that a full and equal equality should be established in Ireland between the Catholic and Protestant ; thereby affirming, in the first place, that his own measure had not created that desirable equality ; and secondly, giving his successors to understand that they were to expect his countenance and aid in the furtherance of such measures as they might propose to Parliament for the rectification of the position of Roman Catholics in relation to the Established Church and to the state.

From all this it is not unreasonable to infer that Sir Robert Peel in office was prepared to deal with Irish politics as they came, that it has not entered into the hearts of other statesmen to conceive. Since his retirement, not an effort, not a ray of hope, has been contributed by men in power towards the satisfaction of claims that all admitted were up to the mark of unsatisfied. The distinguished statesman who succeeded him explained and justified Irish discontent, in the sixteenth year after the emancipation act, by an illustration from prison. "You cannot," he said, "require a prisoner to accept of his captivity, because you have enlarged his window and increased his sun-light." He was undoubtedly right. A man acting on behalf of others can take an instalment of rights and of all demands ; and, when a nation is in question, it is criminal to compound for justice than to compound for it. Yet it is humiliating to think that neither the minister who spoke these words in opposition, nor the men who advocated the most radical and comprehensive changes, have ever repudiated their pledge of their belief since their accession to power. On the other hand, the representatives of a great party in Ireland appeal to passions they are predetermined not to satisfy, encourage cries they never can appease, and throw up their hands for Maynooth in Ireland, while they rail at it in England. Their consistency is never impeached, they go boldly to the front and thank Heaven they are not like other men, paltering with faith, traitors to their party, keepers of evil company.

Peel ; on the contrary, their morals, they say, are pure, and have purged their club ; they quote the right authors ten a day, and they give the right dinners at the proper place ; entitling themselves on every score to the praise of honesty and truth. But these things are the vulgarities of political life, they are the stock in trade of parliamentary jesters, and are not tempted to pursue the subject much farther. In our only mistaken view, Sir Robert Peel's political morality is severe, and approaches more nearly to perfection, than any which constitutional history takes notice, and we can afford to rest this conviction without going into the niceties of a detail which applies itself to every matter of accusation, and which has led him to have regulated his public conduct by the code of private honor, unlike so many whose private worth has been a traint upon political unworthiness.

And here we close this branch of the subject with an extract which goes to show that Sir Robert Peel in abandoning the old securities, was prompted to that course not merely by a sense of the weakness of any such guarantees, but by a confidence in the generosity and right feeling of those he sought to enfranchise.

There were three different classes of "security" that might be considered. The first and the chief security was in the abolition of the distinctions between Protestant and Roman Catholic which had bred suspicion and distrust in the loyalty, and fidelity, and civil obedience of the Roman Catholic, in the opening to him of all the avenues to honour and political power, in the consequent discouragement of hostile designs and irregular ambition, in the breaking up of the combinations dangerous to the State that then were of so frequent recurrence in Ireland, and owed their origin and their strength to the sympathies awakened and confirmed by a common religion.

The second was a moral as distinguished from a legislative security. It was a security founded on a generous confidence in the loyalty and obedience of the Roman Catholic, and on the hope that he would have new reasons for attachment to a Constitution from none of the privileges which he was to be hereafter debarred.

It was possible no doubt to suggest other securities, securities founded by law, against the abuse of power by the Roman Catholic ; but there was necessity for great caution lest such securities, instead of being of any real value in themselves, should, by implying a continuance of suspicion and distrust, detract from the efficacy of the moral security to which I have referred.

The more I considered the subject, the more I was disposed to banish all thought of legislative securities, of imposing restrictions, for instance, on the number of Roman Catholics admissible in Parliament, or of maintaining distinctions of any kind in respect of capacity for power, or the exercise of power, legislative or executive, between Protestant and Roman Catholic.

There is no more striking feature in the character of Sir Robert Peel than the devotedness with which his friends adhered to him in the great crisis of his life, notwithstanding the absence of all impulsiveness or wariness in his eloquence; notwithstanding the perfectly unimpassioned reasoning which seems to have guided him in his conduct, and led others to adopt them, it does not appear that any one who came within the reach of his influence escaped the fascination of his noble character. The power of his deep attachment is, if not an argument, a very usual concomitant of genius, and, when those who conceive the attachment are men of honor, the object of it can hardly be without virtue. Nothing could be warmer, more touching, more affectionate, than the zeal and sympathy which his friends displayed for Sir Robert Peel in the moment of trial, when the storm which he and they so clearly foresaw was closing its gloom and intensifying its rage, they gathered round him with eager and anticipative solicitude, and challenged him to his obloquy like a portion of their inheritance. Lord Brougham, the Bishop of Oxford, at the time actively engaged in promoting Peel's return for the University of Oxford, wrote to him—"Send me word of anything that tends to alleviate your difficulties and mitigate your struggles." Mr. Vernon Harcourt, in the course of a letter expressive throughout of the warmest admiration, says—"I did not think I should ever have been so concerned myself with Oxford politics, but believing in your interests, and those of the Church Establishment, I have taken out of your hands without detriment as well as advantage to ourselves, I entreat you to authorise your friends to do so for you again, and I proffer a zealous cooperation with your wishes." Dr. Marsham, the Warden of Merton, Lord Bathurst, and Mr. Berners, all wrote in a similar spirit. (Dr. Marsham had already expressed his opinion that the University would disgrace itself if it failed to return Peel, and the result of their labors, though not what they had calculated upon, is recorded by Sir Robert Peel with a just pride. "I find," he says, "this paper giving an account of the minority which supported me. 'Mr. Peel pe less than Sir Robert Inglis, and had twice as many first men, 14 out of 20 professors, and 24 out of 28 prize the 24 prize men having gained 36 prizes. Of Christ ch (the College of both candidates) Mr. Peel had 39 first men, his opponent only 8; he had also all the noblemen voted, 4 deans out of 5, and 333 clergymen, as an argument for the No Popery and Church in danger men.'" though it does not appear for the present to drop in with current of our observations, we offer no apology for using Sir Robert Peel's description of the last spasm of erance, in the darkest and therefore most appropriate cell e worst heart in England. It is now well known that no , nor even Jacobite family, not Balmerino, Mar nor Lovat, cordially detested the principles of the revolution, than the y to which it gave the crown. Never sat four more ough-paced despots on the throne of England than the four ges. Without the boldness of the Tudors, or happily for selves the infatuation of the Stuarts, they were as tyrannas either, and as untaught as the latter, though more prunor perhaps more timid. Hallam says, in a tone rather too upphant for a professing friend of conscience, that many of family of the Princess Sophia "had been a little wavering our Act of Settlement became a settlement of their faith;" his was true of the family of Brunswick in their political more than their religious creed. Despots in all the conation of their German littleness, the family of Brunswick the glorious revolution, sat frowning upon each other like h and Sin, in the allegory. The one "the likeness of a ly crown" had on, not the regular legitimate sort of thing its full suit of prerogative jewels, but a may-fair business inchbeck and paste, while the other, threatened by the unral appetite of the wearer, had reason to say, and often did n substance if not in terms—

the reigns of the four Georges were a succession of intrigues nst the bill of rights, and anything in the form of right or liberty. The Third of them organized a band of satrap the King's friends, that overrode his own ministers, administration and opposition equally at defiance. For devouring the revolution he dismembered the empire in person, as we shall see, was prepared to stake Ireland on the chance of war on the very eve of the revolution of 1801, all her wrongs unredressed, and the public mind open to lessons as might be learned from France, Belgium, and Spain, and Ireland herself, just then entering upon the struggle for which was only conceded to the fear of revolution.

I took my seat on Tuesday the 3rd of March. We had our deliberations in Cabinet up to that time, and had arrived at perfect unanimity on the general outline, and indeed on the details of the several measures to be proposed to Parliament. Under the impression that we had the sanction (the reluctance, but still the complete sanction) of the King for our proceedings. Being anxious that there should not be a momentary delay, I gave notice on the 3rd of March that I would on Thursday the 5th call the attention of the House of Commons to that part of the Speech from the Throne which related to the Catholic Question, and the removal of the civil disabilities under which Roman Catholics laboured.

In the interim circumstances wholly unforeseen occurred which appeared for a time to oppose an insuperable barrier to any progress with the measures of which the actual notice had thus been given.

On the evening of Tuesday, the 3rd of March, the King, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, and myself attended His Majesty at Windsor at an early hour on the following day. We went there accordingly, and on our arrival were surprised by the presence of the King, who received us with his usual cordiality.

He was grave and apparently labouring under some anxiety or uneasiness.

His Majesty said that we must be fully aware that it had cost him the greatest pain to give his assent to the proposal made to him by his Cabinet, that they should be at liberty to tender collective advice on the Catholic Question, and still greater pain to feel that he had no alternative but to act upon the advice he had received.

His Majesty then observed, that as the question was now brought forward in Parliament, he wished to have a personal conference with those of his Ministers whom he had invited on this occasion to attend him, and whom he must regard as responsible for the advice tendered to him. He said that he would receive from us a more complete and detailed explanation of the manner in which we proposed to effect the object we had in view.

Upon this requisition from His Majesty, being probably surprised by the details of the measure which I had to submit, of Commons on the following day, I proceeded to explain to the King. I observed to His Majesty that the chief impediment to the enjoyment of complete civil privileges by his Roman Catholic subjects was the obligation to make the Declaration against Transubstantiation, and to take the Oath of Supremacy as qualification for such privileges—that we proposed to repeal altogether the Declaration against Transubstantiation, and to modify in the case of Roman Catholics that part of the Oath of Supremacy which relates to spiritual and ecclesiastical jurisdiction and superiority of the King in reference to the Oath of Supremacy, the King seemed surprised and said rapidly and earnestly, "What is this? you do not mean to alter the ancient Oath of Supremacy!" He explained to each of his Ministers on the point. We explained to His Majesty that we proposed that to all his subjects, excepting the Roman Catholics, the Oath should be administered in its present form, and that the Roman Catholic should be required to declare his belief that no foreign Prince or Prelate hath any temporal civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or preeminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm. We added, that if the Roman Catholic was still required, before his admission to office in Parliament, to declare his belief that no foreign Prelate hath any right to have any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction, power, or preeminence within the realm, the measure of relief would be complete; that an effectual impediment to the enjoyment of civil privileges would remain unremoved.

The King observed, that be that as it might, he could not possibly consent to any alteration of the ancient Oath of Supremacy—that he was exceedingly sorry that there had been any misunderstanding on an essential point—that he did not blame us on account of that misunderstanding—that he did not mean to imply that in the explanation which we had previously given to him in writing there had been any concealment or reserve on this point: still the undoubted fact was that he had given his sanction to our proceedings under a misapprehension with regard to one particular point, and that an important one, namely, the alteration of the Oath of Supremacy, and he felt assured that our opinions would be in concurrence with his own—that a sanction so given ought not to be binding upon the Sovereign, and that His Majesty had no alternative but to give his consent, if the measure to which it had been given under a misapprehension were bonâ fide disapproved of by his deliberate and conscientious judgment.

In answer to this appeal we expressed our deep concern that there had been any misunderstanding on so important a matter, but we retired acquiescent in the King's opinion that His Majesty ought not to be bound by a consent unwarily given to important public measures under a misapprehension of their real character and importance. After a short lapse of time, His Majesty then said, "But in this explanation of my feelings what course do you propose to take with my Ministers?" He observed that notice had been given of the proceedings in the House of Commons for the following day; and addressing himself particularly to me, who had charge of proceedings, said, "Now, Mr. Peel, tell me what course you take to-morrow." I replied that, with all deference and to His Majesty, I could not have a moment's hesitation of course—that the Speech from the Throne had justified the expectation that the Government intended to propose me the complete relief of the Roman Catholics from civil incumbrances—that I had vacated the seat for Oxford on the assumption that measures would be proposed—that the consent of the House of Commons had been given to the Bill for the Suppression of the Catholic Association, if not on the express assurance, at least on the full understanding, that the measure of coercion would be immediately followed by the measure of relief—that I must therefore entreat His Majesty at once to accept my resignation of office to permit me on the following day to inform the House of Commons of that unforeseen impediments, which would be hereafter likely to prevent the King's servants from proposing to Parliament measures that had been announced—that I no longer held office of the Home Department, and that it was my painful duty to draw the notice which had been given in my name.

The King put a similar question to the Duke of Wellington, who replied that he desired to be permitted by His Majesty to resign office, and to make to the House of Lords an announcement to the same effect with that which I wished to make to the House of Commons.

The Chancellor intimated his entire acquiescence in the course which the Duke of Wellington and I proposed to pursue.

His Majesty was pleased to express his deep regret that he could not remain in his service consistently with our sense of his public duty. His Majesty said moreover that he could not be surprised at our decision, or blame us for the conclusion at which we had arrived.

Our interview with His Majesty lasted for the long period of several hours: there was unintermitted conversation during the whole time, but nothing material passed excepting that the Duke of Wellington, which I have faithfully reported. At the close of the interview the King took leave of us with great composure and great politeness, and gave to each of us a salute on each cheek, and accepted our resignation of office, frequently expressing his sincere regret at the termination of the interview which compelled us to retire from his service.

The following passages, having reference to this interview, are extracted from the Memoranda left by Lord Eldon of the interview which he had with His Majesty a few weeks subsequent to our conference with the King.

Lord Eldon saw the King on the 28th of March and on the 1st of April. In the account of the conversation of the first of the following passage.

LORD ELDON'S MEMORANDA.

"The King complained that he had never seen the Bills of the Government, and that he was in the state of a person with a pistol pressed that he had nothing to fall back upon, that his Ministers had ened (I think he said twice at the time of my seeing him) to re- the measures were not proceeded in, and that he had said to 'Go on,' when he knew not how to relieve himself from the state ch he was placed, and that in one of these meetings, when resig- was threatened, he was urged to the sort of consent he gave at passed in the interview between him and his Ministers, till interview and talk had brought him into such a state that he knew what he was about, when he, after several hours said n."—See 510, vol. vii. Campbell's Chancellors.

Speaking of his interview with the King on the second day, Eldon observes:—

his led to the King's mentioning again what he had to say to ent. In the former interview it had been represented that, much conversation twice with his Ministers, or such as had down, he had said 'Go on;' and upon the latter of those two ns, after many hours' fatigue and exhaustion by the fatigue of sation, he had said 'Go on.' He now produced two papers, he represented as copies of what he had written to them, in he assents to their proceedings and going on with the Bill, certainly in each, as he read them, very strong expressions pain and misery the proceedings gave him."—Campbell's Chan- vol. vii. p. 512.

and Eldon must have misunderstood the account which he re- from His Majesty of our interview with the King. In the place there was only one interview such as that to which I referred—one interview, I mean between His Majesty and his ers in which the offer of resignation was made. In the sec- place His Majesty did not give at the close of the interview sion to "Go on." His Majesty accepted from each of us the of resignation, and we returned to London under the full sion that the Government was dissolved—at least that we in- ally were no longer in the service of the Crown. On our re- to London we joined our colleagues who were assembled at a et dinner (I think at Lord Bathurst's), and announced to their e astonishment that we had ceased to be members of the nment.

udden change, however, took place in the King's intentions. ate hour on the evening of the 4th of March the King wrote r to the Duke of Wellington, informing him that His Majesty oated so much difficulty in the attempt to form another ad- ration, that he could not dispense with our services; that he herefore desire us to withdraw our resignation, and that we at liberty to proceed with the measures of which notice had iven in Parliament.

e Duke of Wellington sent immediately this letter to me: I o copy of it, and am giving from memory the purport of this he following communications with the King on the same t.

her the Duke of Wellington observed in sending this letter to r I suggested to the Duke in returning it, that after what had d in the morning, the mere permission by His Majesty to proceed with the measures was not sufficient authority ; and ought to make a further reference to the King for the purpose of ascertaining distinctly whether we were authorized to assume the measures in contemplation were proposed by the entire consent and sanction of His Majesty.

Accordingly a reference to this effect was made to His Majesty in the course of the night, and an answer was received from His Majesty, giving us full authority to proceed with the measures in question.

For the purpose of silencing all cavil on this subject, in the course of those measures on the following day in the House of Commons I commenced my speech in this manner :—

“ I rise as a Minister of the King, and sustained by the authority which belongs to that character, to vindicate the measures given to His Majesty by an united Cabinet,” &c., &c.

We have allowed ourselves this rather lengthy extract from the philosophy of agitation, it would be a great mistake to leave out of view the conscience of the King, even of such a King as George IV., not the conscience which is supposed to reside in the keeping of the Lord Chancellor, but the conscience of the King, considered, however erroneously, to reside in the Royal person. The scruples of George IV., in relation to the Catholic question, would be perfectly unexplained phenomena in present times. A bad life, did we not constantly find the most decided bigots dividing the same breast with the most unbounded intolerance. Louis XIV. and James II. are sufficiently striking examples of this strange union to place the fact itself beyond controversy, though it may yet be a question from what source the scruples of George IV. proceeded. His father, it is not unlikely, had a conscience, uninformed, stupid, and obstinate as it was, but he seemed as if the son borrowed it for the occasion, or got rid of something like it. At one juncture we find the Prince of Wales writing that “ he owes it to the truth and sincerity of character, which he trusts will appear in every action of his life, in every situation placed, to declare that the irresistible impulse of duty and affection to his beloved and afflicted father led him to dread that any act of the regent might in the smallest degree have the effect of interfering with the progress of the Sovereign’s authority.”* The composition of the letter is ascribed by the Duke of Buckingham, from whose book we have borrowed the extract, to Sheridan, but the sentiments were adopted by George IV. certainly is difficult to suppose that the author of that letter was the man and the son that he was, could ever have had science of his own, or seriously appropriated another man's even for a time.* Hence the gravest argument against his conscience having suffered violence in the settlement of the Catholic question, is his appeal to the sentiments of his "excellent and revered parent." We leave out of consideration for the present his former leaning towards the Catholics, because an expression of friendship or attachment on his part at once raises a presumption of hypocrisy very difficult to repel. If there was anything real, or conscientious in his proceedings, it was his opposition to the Catholic claims. Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning acted on the assumption that his conscience was not to be forced in this particular; and being constitutional ministers, they were right in the assumption, as a rule of action: but, on the other hand, they committed the error of forcing their own conscience to acquiesce in a state of things which they know not only to be incurably vicious, but to grow more unmanageable by delay. Had they taken the same means to enlighten the King's conscience as were adopted by Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues—had they resolutely withheld their services until he came to distinguish between conscience and inclination, the same success would have attended them that attended him, and the country should never have witnessed political agitation reduced to an art; and conducted under great disadvantages, upon legal and scientific principles, to triumphant issue; begetting other agitations like itself, destined to be equally successful and effecting revolutions, that otherwise never could have been accomplished permanently, or without waste of blood.

We are not concerned for the present to show that this result of the pusillanimity or erring judgment of Castlereagh and Canning was an advantage to the state or the reverse. Agitation is no doubt a dangerous science, and those who take it up as a profession are not the most reputable practitioners; but Sir Robert Peel certainly brought out to the satisfaction of the people, that a king cannot be indulged with the possession of a privy conscience in matters of state, and that the country never will acknowledge its existence. It is impossible to apply force to

* "If we were together," writes one of the Grenvilles to the Duke of Buckingham, under date, "Whitehall, December 21, 1788," "I could tell you some particulars of the Prince of Wales' behaviour towards the King and her [the Queen], that would make your blood run cold; but I dare not commit them to paper because of my informant."—Memoirs of the Court and Cabinet of George III., from original family documents, by the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos. the conscience of any man, and at the worst, a king or a minister has often to choose between his conscience and his crown. The constitutional theory of the "liberum veto" is untouched, as it is to be hoped it will always remain, and competent for the king to say to the houses of Parliament any morning of his life, "le Roi s'avise," but in the temper of the British people, and notwithstanding the love and worship of Royalty, it is difficult to conceive a more hazardous experiment, or one in which the sovereign would have greater need of the deliberation implied in the form of refusal, than the exercise of his constitutional prerogative in opposing the wishes of the nation constitutionally expressed. When the Duke of York, at one period of the succession to the crown, thought it becoming to declare an oath he never would give his sanction to a settlement of Catholic claims; that declaration was met by Sheil, in a manner to be considered a most constitutional spirit, by a counter oath taken up by the entire body of Catholics in as solemn a sacramental a way, as the former oath had been uttered by the Prince; and although it cannot be doubted that the numerical majority of his subjects would have supported the Duke against parliamentary majorities, in the exclusion of the Catholics from equal rights; it is equally true that the victory would have been dangerous to the prerogative, the encouragement of its exercise at a later period; and it would have led to secret conspiracies between king and minister, and perhaps between King and opposition, to betray and outwit the people. It is well known, for example, that the king desired a person in his confidence to inform the peers of his household, it was his desire they should vote against a measure, although he had already promised his assent: and can it be doubted that the same king would, under other circumstances, encourage dishonest men to save their popularity by voting against a measure with the understanding that it was to be vetoed by the king? We should then have the sovereign incurring the odium that so often falls upon the House of Peers when it refuses its consent to measures favoured by the count of the court, not demanded with that sternness which deprives the king of the yield of all the grace of concession. Not only has Sir Robert Peel secured to agitation the confident assurance that the sovereign will not be an obstacle to the desires of the people, but he has properly ascertained, but he has saved the crown from the ger of a bad precedent, and the balance of the constitution from certain derangement, immediate or remote.

The Edinburgh Review, in its last number, while acknowledging that in this conjuncture Sir Robert Peel deserved well of the country, confesses to a good deal of perplexity in the attempt to account for his previous conduct upon the Catholic question without referring it to personal ambition, and is only induced to give up this interpretation by the positive certainty that no personal motive controlled or even influenced his course in 1829. His entire conduct, however, taken as a whole, is affirmed to have resulted in evils hardly to be atoned for by his services and sacrifices. In the opinion of the Reviewer, Sir Robert Peel's errors and their reparation concurred in bringing about a state of things, the evil consequences of which will make themselves felt to unborn generations, as they not only loosened or broke the ties of party, an evil of great magnitude in the eyes of the essayist, but exhibited to the world violence and intimidation successful pleaders when right and justice had never been allowed a hearing, and was fertile in examples of inconsistency which has lowered the character of public men, and bewildered the country in its choice of servants.

These observations, it appears to us, are rather wanting in fairness to Sir Robert Peel's memory, and to a still greater extent, though this of course is open to question, do they seem to us deficient in sound philosophy. Not to go through them one by one, as we have no particular interest in Sir Robert Peel's defence, it seems a rather harsh procedure to make him responsible for the denial of justice to the Catholic claims before his own time, and piecing that denial with the share he himself took in their adjustment, to impute to him the evil consequences resulting from the tardy concession of what it is assumed could no longer be withheld. In the first place, Sir Robert Peel is not chargeable with opposition to the Catholic claims put forward under the protection of reason and principle alone. He was thrown into the conflict of Irish politics, into that scene of violence and intimidation, to which it is complained he yielded, fresh from "an old Tory College," a boy in years, and although a man in sense, not more than a man; and without a man's experience. Of course he brought with him to the Irish office all the crudities of his Tory politics, and all the venerable fallacies of the place he came from. The time for appeals to reason had gone by long before his day. The question had been taken out of the guardian.

ship of the few Catholic peers and gentlemen who used to be pale at their own whispers, and never ventured upon the petition of the most drearily legal description, with morseful suspicion of treason, or misprision of treason, very least. The Catholics had gone through their votive of salaaming and prostration, and had promised never to turn to it, before Sir Robert Peel had passed his "Bill," and if they been taught to believe that the constitution of heaven, suffered violence, and that the violent alone could turn it off, Sir Robert Peel, though he may have counted for a while to strengthen the impression, certainly had done nothing to originate it. A vulgar mind would have shrunk from the reproach of yielding to intimidation, but, with the ingenuity of self love, would most probably have framed the very argument against concession which he had to deal; and we think the great glory of this state of affairs to have encountered in the discharge of duty, with courage, the imputation of moral cowardice, the imputation of all others most abhorrent from his character; and yet so plausible in pretence, that even those he more immediately concerned, and in whose favour the obloquy was to be incurred, for a time at least, be the sincerest and most devoted believers in the scandal.

The first few pages of this Article will have sufficiently shown that we do not consider the breaking up of political combinations ascribed to the part taken by Sir Robert Peel upon the Repeal Question, the positive evil it has been regarded by some as. On the point of fact the dissolution of party dates from the repeal of the corn laws, and not from the Emancipation measure. The Conservative party were never so powerful, so uniformly disciplined, and never owed a more willing allegiance to a leader, than in 1843. But whatever lessons may have been taken and may yet be taken by statesmen from the event, the people were not slow to profit by the experience acquired; and every great measure passed since 1843 the result of popular agitation, controlled and directed by the confederacies of the O'Connell type. Nor would it be worth omit noticing one other association under the management of the same great master, which, although professedly directed to the attainment of what most men consider an impracticable object, the Repeal of the Act of Union; was undoubtedly instrumental in the promotion of at least three important measures, the result of yet unexhausted controversy, popularly known as quests' Act, the Provincial Colleges' Act, and the Maynooth Endowment. Of this association, too, it must be said that its history is incomplete for philosophical purposes, in as much as causes beyond the range of human calculation, and which it would be impossible for any statesman to combine, namely, the death of its great founder, and the four years of the Irish famine, not to speak of the revolutionary spirit in the association itself, united to work its dissolution. But even although this be the case as to actual results, it would not the less be matter of grave and not unprofitable speculation, to compute the amount of power which that body might have retained upon the very lowest estimate, had O'Connell lived and the famine been delayed till after the revolutions of 1848. We may therefore suppose that reaction, and the constant adjournment of success, the frequent recurrence of May day without the promised Repeal, the impossibility of providing and applying continual stimulants, and whatever other elements of weakness that and every other voluntary body must contain, had reduced the association to its working staff, its organization and its leader; nevertheless, to any one knowing of what materials these were composed, and who understands how easily a popular body cleverly organized is set in motion, it cannot be matter of doubt that the revolutions of that period would have revived and re-energized the Repeal association, so as to have made action of some kind inevitable. Nothing can be more probable than that many of the acknowledged grievances of this country would have been redressed, or else a civil war, more terrible than that which Peel and Wellington shrunk from the responsibility of provoking, although with the certainty of speedy victory for the government, must have deluged the country with blood for a time and with tears for a century.

This then is a feature in popular associations of a permanent character or regular organisation, of which statesmen or popular leaders will not fail to take account: that however unpromising the agitation may appear at the moment, it is impossible to deny that any moment may bring forward a contingency to make its power irresistible; and neither the sagacious leader, nor the sagacious minister, if the question be one of tactics merely, will rely solely upon a Fabian policy; the one will never look upon the voluntary confederacy as below contempt, nor the other as beyond hope. It is a different question whether a good minister, after striking a balance between the dishonesty and honesty of the movement, will not put himself into a proper frame of mind for estimating his danger regarding the agitation if upon a grand scale, as raising a question at least, of something that requires remedy. Mr. Russell, in his life of his ancestor, the Lord William Russell, lays down the broad proposition, that general discontent is sufficient ground for revolution. We are far from adopting a doctrine of such pungency but after reducing it to what may be considered wholesome, it cannot be denied that it is in the breast of the minister alone who must deal with a general agitation, especially if it assume a character of perseverance and system; to inquire, whether its bare assertions are apart from the men who govern or influence it, and the evidence of suffering and wrong, and an argument for reform.

It would indeed seem that two elements of success are necessary to any political agitation—real wrong, or suffering, however much they may be overcoloured and distorted; and a man of real genius to organize the movement. Without taking up the common-places that are so often written about agitation, we cannot but say it is not that these circumstances must concur to make an agitation successful; otherwise it would be in the power of every declaimer to change the face of the state from year to year. Since O'Connell's death, Ireland has seen a succession of associations framed upon the most approved principles including that which he left behind, but they have all died and only languish for want of genius to invigorate and guide. Yet it is not that Ireland is free from real suffering, or without substantial grievances. For the present the matter is in the air, but while the suffering and the wrong exist the people should never be unprepared for the coming of the man of the closest and most careful induction, there is no person more clearly deducible from all history than that the world produces its man. Cæsar was not the destroyer of liberty, nor Bonaparte the creator of the French Republic. The court of St. Louis could not have produced the maxim of the maxims, nor De Joinville have written squibs against the great ladies of the Fronde. It would therefore be a mistake to rely upon the tranquillity prevalent in Ireland as likely to prevent the present circumstances to become the normal state of the country, or to build hopes upon the apathy of the people to its alleged devotion to purely material interests, or to the excitement produced by the traffic in popular enthusiasm for primore open and unabashed in Ireland than elsewhere. All these things have no doubt co-operated to produce the present tranquillity of Ireland, and undoubtedly it is happy they have done so: but we have not the slightest guarantee for its continuance so long as substantial grounds of discontent are present to encourage agitation. It was early seen that the concessions made by Sir Robert Peel, although conceived in the most liberal spirit, introduced an order of things purely provisional, and that Ireland with the most anomalous institutions in the world, would certainly try to right herself, however ungainly or violent might be her efforts. Accordingly, in the lapse of twenty years we find the country passing through every stage of agitation, from the effervescence of rose water to the spilling of blood; nor do we find in any instance an attempt to bring the provisional government of Ireland to a close, and establish a settled and regular condition for her like that of England and Scotland. Sedatives and palliatives were freely applied. The feelings of the people were soothed, and their confidence gained by a free admission to the privileges which had been secured to them by the measure of 1829. Places of honour and trust were as liberally and as gracefully bestowed as circumstances admitted; and whenever the popular party was in power, men who were endeared to the people by their virtues, and their services, administered the law, such as it was, and with a gentle and steady hand. But the law was often such as no good man could administer, and as in the case of the tithe system, scarce anything short of insurrection could procure its repeal or modification. Here again the remedy was palliative, and the amelioration provisional, for the Church question has been allowed to remain as sore, and as smarting as ever. The injustice was somewhat diminished at the time, the lash was applied to a less sensitive part of the nation, but the slight and humiliation were suffered to continue. The badge of conquest was not removed or covered, but adjusted merely; for Ireland must be exceptionally treated, not in reference to the position she ought to occupy as the second member of the British Confederation, but in reference to the false position she is forced to hold, by the unwillingness of statesmen to accept the responsibility which lies on them of providing for the future as for the present. The measures of municipal and electoral reform accorded to Ireland were founded upon the same principle, that of averting the evil day, of holding by the provisional, of sacrificing the nation to the institution ; the principle that man was the Sabbath, and not the Sabbath for man : and the effect of every measure of relief was lessened by its spirit, and new and ample standing room left for plans of agitation.

In the year 1840, a conservative reaction gave the party adopted that name a firm hold of power under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel, and we soon find O'Connell, bringing his second great association with whose history is so familiar, and for which the three Irish measures of Peel's government have been claimed as results. But more we are met by the same unfortunate spirit of Legislation. The provincial Colleges which now compose Queen's University were stated to be founded on the pattern of the University of London, but their establishment proceeded on the very false assumption that the Roman Catholics stand in the same position as the Dissenting body in England, and that the supremacy of dignity, if not of power, was reserved to the University of the favoured religion. They were at the choice of the contrivers of that measure, which would have provoked a syllable of comment from the Roman Catholic clergy, or involved an appeal to Rome. The scholarships of Trinity College Dublin, might to some extent have been opened to Catholic and Dissenter, or a second College, as part of the University of Dublin, could have been founded on liberal principles. That the former at least of these might have been followed without remonstrance and with approval from the Catholic Clergy, is now proved by the scholarships and even some professorships, have been granted to Catholics for months past without eliciting an expression of dissatisfaction from a member of their body. But the spirit of Irish legislation prevailed ; the whole question of the Maynooth was opened up to controversy ; and, as might have been expected, the controversy did not linger ; a measure of conciliation was changed into a measure of exasperation ; and the cup is not full. The Maynooth endowment, on the contrary, was a measure which gave unmingled satisfaction to the Roman Catholics, and had the merit of a permanent character ; but in our view it was principally valuable in its relation to the measures of conciliation undoubtedly was intended to begin a series ; for it was expected to conciliate the entire clergy of a country by being granted generously, and even royally, for their education, w thing is done that can be done to lower their status the moment they enter the world, no hope could be more futile or better deserve to be disappointed. Upon leaving college they find their episcopacy disowned, called spurious, suspected, guarded against, treated with hurtful rudeness or more hurtful courtesy. They themselves are brow-beaten by small officials, drawn into unseemly contests by Poor-law Guardians, regarded half-caste by country gentlemen; and it is expected after all, that they should be everything their best friends could wish. Maynooth had not once renewed itself after the passing of the Endowment Act, when the whole nation, or a considerable portion of it, went mad upon the miserable question of ecclesiastical titles; and more reputations founded upon years of merit and sacrifice, were immolated to the ugly Juggernaut usurping the name of Protestant opinion, than as many years again of merit and sacrifice can revive. Under circumstances of such exasperating a character as were involved in the extension, (gratuitous to say the least) of that measure to Ireland, it could not be expected that the endowment of Maynooth, almost without political value as a single and unrelated measure, should have an effect upon the temper of the clergy educated there.

If that same measure alone was expected to have any effect upon the political action of the priesthood, the disappointment was deserved; and we venture to predict, that as long as the political and social condition of the class from which the priesthood must be recruited continues what it is, Sir Robert Peel's measure will be a failure in this respect. While the Roman Catholic clergy stand in no definite relation, or if in any, in a relation of hostility to the government; and until there be established relations, not of salary or dependance, but of courtesy, confidence, and good understanding, that will make intercourse honorable, safe and easy, the interference of the clergy in politics will be no other than it is. It avails nothing to say that the opinions and feelings of all who value good government, whether of the nation by its rulers, or of the flock by its pastor, are opposed to the active pursuit of politics by the clergy of any denomination. It is not disputed that the most discreet use of a political influence derived from a religious character, is attended with dangers which the peculiar circumstances of Ireland are not calculated to diminish. There is nothing to be gained by dwelling upon the precise nature of those dangers, but Maynooth alone, under our provisional government, can no more influence them than the synod of Saint Paul. While the human mind is constituted as at present, while the actual relations between the members of the family are maintained as now, the political action of the clergy flows as naturally from these relations as their most obvious consequences. In other countries where the clergy take a part in politics, it is effective and prominent, because there is no play for that intense language, and but little to provoke that bitterness which have been made the subject of reproach to the Catholic clergy in Ireland. In such places questions of political, or even religious interest, will be discussed with earnestness, perhaps with acrimony, but they are never of that organic kind that will admit of no parley, no compromise, present the sternest alternatives, challenge the most sacred, probe the most angry prejudices, and absorb all the hopes, because they involve all the hopes of either party. This character have been the questions agitated for the last thirty years, constantly preserving their force by their import, and the pregnancy of their consequences.

In Ireland, since O'Connell's death, his co-religionists had no political leader, although they have had political tales quales. Some of her representatives not deficient in want character, others possessing character have no ability, and some who unite character and ability are entirely without influence. We could lay our finger upon at least one, a member of an ancient house, and member for an historic county, a rich man, once of uncommon promise, who having attained the position of ground that other men would give twenty years of life, is oftener to be found in the coffee room than the study, and loves better to discuss a devilled bone, than a question that would be worth an immortality to Burke. If he were to propose to resign, were he to say, I find myself unequal to the weight of my name and the duties of my place—the people would be nothing better off, for his successor probably be less clever and equally indolent. It is not therefore that under the circumstances, the priest should be politically as well as morally the heart of the nation, rising and sinking to the play of national excitement, and the current of national blood, and sympathetic to the national suffering. But then it will be said the priesthood form the heart of another system, so different from any civil constitution, and the life it has to diffuse through the mystic members of which it is the centre, is something so unlike the spirits that circulate through the body politic, that it seems difficult for the one principle to animate two organizations so dissimilar. In reply, the most ardent clerical politician will admit that such a state of things is not quite wholesome or natural, but he will challenge you, and it is to be feared unanswerably, to provide a remedy. The priesthood is recruited almost exclusively from the emphatic people, and the Times Newspaper, which professes to be as familiar with the physiology and habits of the Irish landlord, as with what it considers the analogous instincts of wolves and tigers, attributes the misery and humiliation of Ireland, in a great measure, to its landlords. Before the young student leaves his family for Maynooth, his knowledge of an Irish landlord is somewhat more accurate than that of the Times. He has been exposed to influences which no subsequent training can ever wholly counteract. His mind has taken its shape and become rigid to any other formation. He was a close observer of the ejection process before he heard of Bellarmin and Thomas of Aquinas, and he was familiar with bailiffs and drivers before he knew of Dean or Bedell. We perhaps look drowsily and not very often over a paragraph in the morning paper, to the effect that the under-sheriff, Mr. John Noakes, proceeded with a detachment of constabulary to execute an "habere" at the suit of Thomas Styles, Esq. on his Mauor of Dale, and levelled or unroofed so many houses. Perhaps we do not even glance at the letter of a clerical correspondent, under the heading of "wholesale evictions in the county of Mayo." We read, or omit to read all this as if it were as far from us in time and place, as the proscription of the second triumvirate, or the massacres of Timour the Tartar. Not so the student of Maynooth. He has been a witness, possibly a sufferer. The iron has entered his soul and burned the scenes into his memory. In vain may such a man go to Maynooth—in vain shall he subject intellect and will to the discipline of the place—in vain shall he leave politics at the door, and as vainly shall the jealous rule visit with expulsion the second offence of reading a newspaper. To little purpose will he set a guard over his heart, chastise every feeling of resentment, and believe he has succeeded in repressing it. Let the restraint once be removed, restore the student to the light and movement of the world; and the fire that slumbered at its first contact with the air, and the flood of memories pour in faster and more furious than if they had been excluded. "Our soul hath passed through" perhaps our soul had passed through a water insupportable.

The new priest will not at first admit all this to himself, but the example of his seniors in the ministry will aid the reaction of his old feelings. He now stands under an influence which it is scarce possible to exaggerate in a simple and primitive family. He sees it without any of coherence within, and with no friendly pressure from without to induce coherence, unless what he and his brethren may direct that strength. He owes it to his flock, from whose hands his own support is supplied, and that of rival parishes, to wring. The mutual relations of protection and guidance between the love of kindred, class, and religion animates him. The political opponents are the enemies of all three, and triumph unopposed unless the priests oppose. As Ireland is governed provisionally Maynooth can do but little, and in that little there is no prospect of increase.

Yet in this, the principal Irish measure of the time, two subordinate measures of halting and doubtful course to which we have alluded, and in the Repeal agitation all its heartburnings and vanities, the Irish government of Robert Peel was consumed. The free trade administration of Lord John Russell was even more barren of results than a measure of a political or social character, was abandoned in the presence of the famine—unless perhaps the bill for enabling the Queen to renew diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome which resulted in an Act disabling the Court of Rome from renewing diplomatic relations with the Queen. But to describe the picture presented by Ireland during that period, or who will charge upon any government of the time, men all the misery and all the errors of the time were dead putrified in the haunts of life, and the living ghastliness were more spectral than the dead; when the brawn of the strong man and the bosom of the stout collapsed in a week, and hung loose and shrivelled up like starting bones; when shapes of the stature of infancy, famine, follies of disease, reeled along the roads, as Silenus, not with the fumes of the grape but with the of decomposition ; when auxiliary work houses rose like exhalations from the rotting fields, and the fever hospitals daily discharged their choking wards into the common pit, daily to renew them ; as the now empty churches had been used to renew their congregations for successive Masses ?

If anything could have moved wild laughter in the throat of death, Ireland would have laughed to see her own appearance after the extraordinary presentment sessions of this period had done their work. Here were new roads half finished, and old roads more than half destroyed—here an artificial defile or costly precipice, and there a highway stopping short at the perpendicular section of a hill—designs so strangely adopted and so suddenly abandoned, that Mr. Mitchell claimed them with great show of reason as a providential arrangement for his intended guerilla. Scenes like these must haunt the dreams of a defaulting railway contractor, when even in slumber he finds himself, amid half pierced tunnels, abortive cuttings, crumbling embankments, and creditors, as was actually the case in the government works, pouncing upon his wheel barrows and picks. Was it then to be expected that amid the din and whirl of rival theories, of chemical nostrums for the cure of the diseased root, of culinary efforts to provide a substitute, of economical quackery for the entire crisis, of mills for the preparation of starch out of the potato, and receipts, for the manufacture of soup out of nothing—in the confusion and vexation of a hundred experiments and a hundred failures, with millions gasping for food as ravenous as young wolves, as helpless as unfledged linnets, was it to be expected that ministers should find time for political and social legislation ?

In the early part of this interval O'Connell died, and all aid or embarrassment from him, his organization or his doctrines was at an end. In a few weeks he was followed by the Earl of Bessborough, the excellent Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ; and under the succeeding administration of Lord Clarendon, a nobleman of much experience, undoubted ability, and good intentions, a season of great difficulty and great opportunities ensued. The difficulties to some extent were overcome ; others, the growth of that period, hold their ground, but one and all they devoured the opportunity, and everything done or attempted in Ireland during that period was provisional. Lord Clarendon made some attempts to establish a proper and dignified intercourse with the Roman Catholic prelates, but each attempt was defeated, partly by the misfortune of Lord Clarendon's antecedents, for all of which we hardly consider him responsible; partly by the spirit of which he was in Ireland to administer. His name was first place mixed up that of the notorious Mr. Borlase, subsequently stood in disagreeable neighbourhood with that of Mr. Birch. There was, moreover, a suspicion of an odour of diplomacy, supposed to pervade his simplest and most straight-forward movements, that could not fail to be hurtful to his influence. People smiled at the idea of his attempting to reach the depth of Clarendon's words, their very confidence was an argument of doubt and despair, for men that could not find any variety of meanings for an official common-place, are not aided by a clear and pertinent expression of opinion. The creative fancy was unable to realize the idea of Lord Clarendon's ante-diplomatic period. It was said he required no more than the infant Mercury, that his very nurses were transferred into attachés, and the nursery into a "salle des conférences," where, while retaining the usual preference of infants for the third person, he avoided the ungrammatical use of "I" and always lisped himself "the undersigned." Nay, it was believed that "he availed himself of an opportunity" to coax a horse out of a pony; that having done so, he drew up a protocol for a conference, which was even then a model; and that in some of his riper years he never negotiated a transfer of taffy at a distance, or without assuring the other parties of "his distinct consideration." He was looked upon and approached as a man of Rajah Brooke, partly governor and partly diplomatist, of a dependent republic under the tropics, not of Heaven or of a European faction, and that he was sent there to wheedle, to flatter, to intimidate, to keep quiet, to keep down, anything but to govern a country whose constitution, liberties, and laws, were settled upon a solid and assured foundation.

We are not sponsors for this class of opinions, or for the charges which impeach the sincerity of Lord Clarendon's action. In the brief interval between the commencement of his administration and the revolution of 1848. The government of that day was not free from sufficiency of real faults, and neglected opportunities, for which it must answer for, without overloading its responsibility with failures: but no matter how fair the intentions of Lord Clarendon, or how large the discretion allowed him by his government, the spirit and policy of the law, by which all governments must in some degree be influenced, were such as to make him the most powerless. The spirit and policy of the law are hard ter of surprise. Our code, if code it can be called, is the growth of an age when the rights of conscience were no where understood, and the reigning intolerance of these kingdoms persecuted Ireland after a style compared to which the massacres of Alba were a mercy, and St. Bartholomew's eve a midsummer's night dream. We are prepared to find the laws redolent of the spirit of these years, and to hope for, rather than expect it's exorcism ; but it is time for ministers who live in other days, when the light and warmth of tolerance have beautified the face of society, to act upon a policy different from that of the laws. As a dry question of government they ought to do so. In dealing with the Catholic people, and more especially with the Catholic clergy, suspicion has always been the starting point, or rather, as a German would say, the stand-point of the government ; and then, with a singular inconsistency, they seem to expect that distrust should not beget distrust, and that any project whatever, emanating from the government, should not be looked upon with the deepest suspicion. In the arrangement of measures in which the concurrence of the Roman Catholic clergy might seem desirable, it seems never once to be admitted, even for argument's sake, or as part of the charities of discussion, that their course is dictated by conscience. Pride, that vulgar vice of Churchmen, the lust of power, the foreign oppression of their consciences, and in short, every supposition injurious to their character as men and Christians and Christian ministers, is adopted, before having recourse to a presumption of good faith as the basis of negotiations. The most liberal-minded statesman becomes a doctrinaire, the moment Ireland is in question : he applies his square, drops his plummet, and will not be driven an inch from the perpendicular. Some rigid theory is then set up, acceptance of it in every essential point is adopted as a standard of moderation and honesty ; it is given to the Clergy in a " take it or leave it " style ; perhaps they are forced to take it, and it seems a more coveted result to create a little bad blood between clergy and laity, than to secure the co-operation of both in the success of the measure.

The state of Roman Catholic charities is another instance of this spirit of suspicion, reciprocated by the clergy with an intensity that certainly is not realized by men in power. The policy of the law was formerly to confiscate Catholic charities ; the policy of law and government alike now seems to aim at preventing their revival. The reformation found the Catholics in the possession of Churches, Convents, Monasteries, and Schools, sufficient for their wants. That movement handed over a large portion of them to the professors of the new religion ; a larger portion still is to be seen in ruins, and on the descendants of the Catholics who provided all these has been thrown the burden of building the church, of keeping up the fabric, of supporting the clergy, of endowing schools, convents, colleges, hospitals ; all which they do upon a scale of astonishing proportions. If the law mean to defeat or obstruct the Catholic haslaw been more completely or ignominiously defeated than it is, be intended to act as a small engine of annoyance, of vexation, of mistrust ; to be a perpetual thorn and a reminder of days more evil still, the law is abundantly successful. It is perfectly certain that not one shilling has been diverted from its legitimate purposes for the last hundred years in consequence of any obstruction or interference with the law, to Catholic charities as such ; unless perhaps in the case of larger fees to the contriver of new conveyancing, &c. Occasionally, it is true, in a small charity, say for the support of a little school, the bulk is eaten away by the expense of maintaining new trustees, while a Protestant charity of like character administered unexpensively for centuries by reason of the corporate character of the Protestant Bishop ; but surely a more pitiable triumph to be bought at such a price. This is the result of mortmain laws ; and if it were, the youngest man passing under the bar, that has given common attention to his business, can evade the most stringent of them ; it has been the case of the most justifiable, the most indispensable charities to exist ; and so long as the law regarding Catholic Charities remains as it is, the clergy of that Church must by the rigour and necessity of the case live in alienation from the Government. The law as it stands, undeserving of respect and unable to command obedience although powerful to effect annoyance, is a source of legislative torture, it is dilletante practice at the best ; it is vexation to beget vexation, and if any one expects better results he will do well to get rid of the delusion at his own convenience.

So far then, Lord Clarendon like every other Lord of the Council, tenant was at a disadvantage ; and in the second place it hardly fail to be admitted, that the revolutionary party of 1848 gave him and the Government sufficient occupation of their own minds that few governments would have chosen that precise time for the application of remedial measures or the introduction of a new state of things. Again, for we are anxious to state our views, the interval between the suppression clubs and the unhappy ecclesiastical titles movement, was perhaps too narrow, and the recollections of the period just traversed too recent, to admit of measures as extensive in their character as the condition of Ireland might seem to require. And with regard to the ecclesiastical titles Act itself,—the motives that induced ministers to extend its provisions to Ireland, are so completely out of the range of calculation with reference to that particular crisis, that we are disposed to refer it to some inscrutable dispensation of Providence that was never dreamed of in Ireland, and that public opinion never called for in England. But surely no infatuation could go so far as to say that it established a normal or suitable state of things in Ireland, one likely to promote good citizenship or one which the people of that country will endure beyond the continuance of their inability to set it aside.

This was the last Irish measure of the Russell administration; the Establishment of the Incumbered Estates Court was its best; for though temporary in duration, its influence was destined to be lasting, and it soon became felt that its machinery would not be broken up, but removed “with all the modern improvements” to another place for the perpetual advantage of the country.

The brief administration of Lord Derby supplied one only lesson in the philosophy of agitation, the necessity of leadership. The people, or the large majority, had in view a scheme of Tenant-right, exciting and plausible: many men of respectable abilities, and at least three, of talent approaching to genius were committed to the measure, but from want of discipline one week demoralized the Irish vote; and what might have been a power courted and conciliated for some one purpose or another, disappeared in the course of a month from party calculations. The Irish members were drawn into Irish rows, they were third-rate actors, their colleagues spectators, they ranted and the audience hissed. Passing over the administration of Lord St. Germans, uneventful as far as Ireland merely is concerned, we at length reach our own times, when earth and sky seem to have exchanged tokens of reconciliation; and the gloom that brooded over present and future, rolls back to show us pleasant pastures at hand and bright summits not too far off. Under its mysterious canopy great things were accomplished, and great things in progress, of which we took no note. Town gave its hand to town, and sea to sea across the island. Experience took its last and inexperience its first and every other lesson in discipline of a new school. The soil had been wrested from a dead and corrupt but unrelaxing hand of insolvency, and handed over to those who could apply and reward industry and commerce, finding new issues, discovered new resting places, and enterprise won victories unlooked for on new fields. We have lived to see children twine their hair with field flowers by the roadside, where their fathers had browsed upon nettles; we have seen a marriage feast, a revived tradition where hunger had reigned, ceased by the liver of an ass. We have seen the ruin of society, so lately thinned by death and desertion, re-peopling itself, and giving promise to the country of wisdom, and fortitude beyond its former experience. We have been witnesses of a revolution at once more daring and more conservative than party ever fought for, a revolution which has proposed to mere mind and unprotected power prizes whose patronage enabled Dundas to hold an empire in the hollow of his hand, and which even yet requires any amount of servile mediocrity, or servile genius to be appreciable still.

The government of Ireland moreover has been confided to a man whose person is in still greater respect than belongs to a man, and yet whose favour with the people it would be incorrect to describe as popularity, according to the more aggravated sense of the distemper. We have seen no dusty terrace, no weedy garden, nor any other suburban or marine impertinence, called "Carlisle." The "Eglinton" shirt, we believe, has not been deposed; nor has the cruel ingenuity of Hyam or MacLennan taxed for new deformities of costume, whether cape, coat, or mantle, to issue under the viceregal auspices. The feeling of the people, however, is not wanting in strength of expression unnecessarily sober, if we may be allowed to judge from the addresses presented to Lord Carlisle, and the manner of his reception on the occasion of his visits to various parts of the country to inaugurate great or useful undertakings. One singular fortune of his administration is the accord of opinion to acknowledge in Lord Carlisle the social and intellectual qualities, which party spirit more especially in Ireland affects to ignore, or at least endeavours to disparage. There is no one that does not recognize in the Lord Lieutenant the friend of all the classes, the master of all the courtesies of life. No one capable of being insensible to the charm of his familiar speech, which is not a treasure in the mine nor a hoard in the treasury, but a jewel on the breast and riches in flow and cir-or which, perhaps we are wrong in comparing to an ornament or a dress, when it is rather a complexion, an emanation, an undefined grace of manner: or, say, the same to the style that the stream is to the landscape, sometimes sparkling through remote, sometimes heard though unseen, sometimes heard and seen, but whether neither or both, to be traced in the depth of verdure and luxuriance of fertility that mark its path.

There is not an editor that ever let off article, nor a Brunswick that ever aimed bottle at Lord Lieutenant, unwilling to see the Earl of Carlisle seek acquaintance with the hospitals and charity schools of Dublin. No one refuses applause to his patronage of art: to his zeal in promoting every institution whether new or old, of a civilizing and educational tendency: to the kind word of encouragement or assistance of a different kind so liberally given to the humble and the timid; or the duly weighed approval accorded to success. He seems to have received an indemnity for acts and appointments of a party character, which in other times must have provoked endless controversy; or at worst they have been noticed by way of protest, as a safe formality, and in order to avoid the creation of a precedent. Perhaps indeed his clearly ascertained position and decided political connexions have been rather favourable than otherwise, to the influence we have attempted to describe, as arguments of earnestness and sincerity. Perhaps too the tacit agreement of men to interrupt for a while those political conflicts whose violence providentially works its own surcease, has had an effect in inducing them to attribute less of a party significance to the appointment of Lord Carlisle than to any other in the choice of his government. The University of Dublin itself in its complimentary address, a piece of writing more remarkable for proper feeling than pure latinity, expressed the belief of the academic body, which to all intents is that of the Conservative party, that the Lord Lieutenant would redeem the pledge of good government which had been taken from the Chief Secretary: a sentiment repeated in various forms as often as a portion of the public has had an opportunity of addressing his Excellency. As truly as it was virtue in the king of France to forget the quarrels of the duke of Orleans, the people seem to think it would be virtue in Carlisle to remember the well-doing of Morpeth. And lastly, we believe that the country is pleased to recognize in its governor not only an undegenerate, but, we might almost say, a regenerate peer; a man who has not only kept his hereditary honours, but minted honors of a new stamp, preserving that real nobility, according to the notion of Euripides, though transmissible, cannot always be sustained, which indeed is not inconsistent with decent mediocrity, but when it falls upon the truly worthy, is always in process always on the increase.

Διὸς χαρακτὴ καὶ τίσιμος ἐν βροτοῖς,
 Ἐσθλῶν γινώσθαι καὶ πῶς μῦθον ἔρχεται,
 Τῆς εὐγονίας ὄνομα τοῖσιν ἀξίους.

And this being so, now that the storm of popular passion is overblown, and men's minds intent upon the triumph of industry and enterprise have become disgusted with the error and dishonesty of politics; now that the people have begun to understand their substantial interests, and to value those only which it is impossible to confiscate, because they are in every man's breast and in every man's arm; when the government is committed to hands, so gentle and yet so sure; when the smile of the withal appears to smile, and the face of the earth to be re-joyced when we are without one element of discontent, or one ground for comment in the philosophy of agitation—is this a time when will be asked, to speak of wrongs and rights, in terms which no meaning is lost, if they ever had a serious meaning? Why then to forgotten recollections, which should best remain for the sake of why teach lessons that are only good to be unlearned? Why the monster meetings so incombustible, was Conciliation so regular an institution, or its rival the Confederation so inconstant an amusement, or the tithe riots a rustic game, that we should exchange our peace, or at least our truce, our prosperity for the advancement for the worse than sterile excitement of the form and the club? Why call our present condition provoking? Might we not all say, if we thought proper, here shall we stay because we have chosen it, in the increase of our fields, in the increase of our flocks, in the increase of our coin, in the advancement of our station, in the enlightenment, strength, and independence we are acquiring? Can any other than the general discontent repress the gladness that should be inspired by the picture we have been drawn? can any one but the most intractable malignant find fault with the acknowledged happiness and repose of the country, or rather, are we not entitled to believe that this very repose is the object of his dislike? is it peculiarly at this improvement he repines, that he is not happy in the very happiness?

Virque tenet lacrymas quia nil lacrymabile cernit

There would be some truth in this style of reasoning if it were proposed to revive a specific agitation, or even to recommend agitation of any kind whatever at this particular juncture. Every thing has its fitness and its reason of existence, even agitation ; neither is it virtuous or safe to encourage reactionary dislikes, and arguments from the abuse to the disuse, for they are always obstinate, unintelligent, and blind. Agitation never can be the normal condition of any state, unless perhaps of Spain and the South American republics ; but neither can absolute inaction and dead level be the perpetual condition of a constitutional empire like ours. All our adventures cannot be by the fire-side, nor all our migrations from the blue bed to the brown ; although we do not pretend it can be salutary, or even safe, for the state to be continually shaken and dislocated by the discussion of organic questions such as we have noticed in the early pages of this Article, some of which have been set at rest, and too many allowed to remain open in Ireland. But without especially referring to any portion of the United Kingdom, it neither is nor can be the natural or bestting condition of a society like ours, with such a variety of ambitions, and such often conflicting interests, with a system involving such combination and such opposition of forces to remain long unmoved by some question of great if not vital import. That wonderful something, not quite an abstraction nor altogether a reality, called the State ; which is neither Cæsar nor the Commonwealth, nor yet has an existence separate from both, unless, as suggested by Lord Brougham, it can be resolved into certain great families who govern for governing sake ; is sometimes paralysed, and the medicinal spring beside which it lies for cure, must be agitated before the bath can be salutary, although the commotion may require anything but an angelic hand. It is, perhaps, more necessary to the morality of our institutions than to their mechanical working that there should be some commotion from time to time in the spirit of the nation ; that there should be distinct and clearly marked party divisions ; that there should be the belief in a principle if nothing more, to prevent mere place and mere plunder from being openly and shamelessly proposed and coveted as the sole reward and the sole object of political service. Our public virtue requires the discipline of its own palaestra, and the emulation of its own stadium, or its nerves relax, and its spirit becomes enfeebled. We require a licensed theatre for ambition, and we should miss in popular agitation a school of great qualities, though not counter-balanced, by some disadvantages. Butler observes, in his Analogy of Religion, with respect to the virtues of fortitude and generosity; which belong to a more perfect state, and yet find their place in the economy of creation as a necessary consequence of its imperfections. The proprietary of a railway company may be abusive, and sarcastic; the members of a literary association may be smart, vigorous, and even slashing in style and manner; meetings, so pleasantly called religious, may furnish a variety of uncharitableness that can acidulate a meek temper with the most intense bitterness that can dash a Christian's spirit; gall; but these are not the schools where the youth of the empire are to learn virtue, statesmanship, or eloquence. The House of Commons itself requires some wholesome agitation to obtain a sufficiently close approximation to the country which it obtains for it the confidence of those it is supposed to represent. "It must," says Burke, "be made to bear some state of opposition to the people at large, for it would be a more natural and less evil that the House should be infected with every kind of frenzy of the people, as this would indicate some connection and sympathy of nature with their constituents, than that it should in all cases be wholly untouched by the opinions and feelings of the people out of doors."

According to the well known aphorism of Sir Robert Peel, the registries are the battle field of the Constitution. When the people are appealed to, whether by means of a petition of right, or by a bill of opposition, that the peer and commoner are made to stand on equal ground, and take their trial before that public tribunal, which is more ostentatiously worshipped, if not better understood, in this country than in any other; and to put forth all their strength and ingenuity of trained and developed mind, to defend themselves right before the country, and secure the confidence of their friends. Great principles will often require to be advocated perhaps at great risk—accounts due in praise of the government be paid in obloquy—the enmity of the powerful must be provoked, the defamation of the press must be encountered, the most corrupt passions must be set under foot, the most powerful interests must be exposed, and interests at once the meanest and the most powerful be destroyed or subjugated. The man who does this with all his strength, of whatever party or what religion he is, is noble, while he who by his energy of spirit and shoulder can achieve it, is prince of nobles,* but to do this his sinews must have lost their delicacy and his arm be yellow with the sand of the arena. These very struggles are the life of party, as it is understood by those who regret the alleged dissolution of party by Sir Robert Peel, for it is not the less fit that party should exist because it may occasionally be necessary for great minds to break loose from its associations when they impose restraints upon duty. And if, as in the instance under notice, circumstances lead to the breaking up of a political connexion, it is not necessarily destroyed, although it must of course be recast. If its principles have degenerated into watch words, it must be right to give them up and trust to time for new ones that are likely to wear as well. We are bound to advance not guided or deterred by old enmities, however faithfully we may adhere to old attachments; always remembering that our highest duty is to the people; and well convinced that wherever the future of the country requires our presence, there, and not elsewhere, we are obliged to take our stand. "Quod si idem sum in Republicâ qui semper fui, tu libertatem requires meam quam tu ponis in eo si semper cum iis quibuscum aliquando contendimus depugnemus: quod longe est secus stare enim debemus tanquam in orbe aliquo Republicâ qui quoniam versetur eam deligere partem debemus ad quam nos illius utilitas et salus converterint."†

And to return to Ireland; Sir Robert Peel long spoke of the measure of 1829, as a compact, and as a final settlement, but he had ceased, as we know, to regard it in that light long before his death. We too, although far from desiring a renewal of the agitations that have convulsed this part of the empire for so many years, look forward to the adjustment of the questions which he left unsettled. Nay more, we should augur ill for the country if we thought, its acquiescence in the existing order of things could be of long duration. Without entering minutely into the degrees of inequality which constitute the difference between Ireland and the other members of the British Confederation, we shall only say that it is sound policy as well as mere justice to elevate Ireland to an equality in every particular with England and Scotland. The tranquillity and the industrial tendencies of the latter country have been often contrasted unfavorably with the turbulence and misery of Ireland, but been left or been kept out of sight, that the honour of the land, the national pride and the national prejudices have respected, have been even fostered; that it was her right to be governed in her independence by a line of princely descendants yet hold the sceptre; and that all her greatness is derived from that same independence which merged in the union was not lost in the union of the crowns. It is a duty to humble the pride and to destroy the self-respect of a nation without destroying even the vestiges of freedom. Vices of the individual are often meritorious in the people; what is selfishness in the one, is patriotism in the other; what is pride in the man, is well-becoming pride in the nation. We would accept of tenfold the wrong to be rid of the disease of inequality, and we predict that until the perfect, substantial equality of which Sir Robert Peel spoke be established between the members of the British family, men's minds will not be permanently turned to indifferent pursuits, to the welfare of the empire at large. We protest against the doctrine that man or nation is to live by bread alone, and that bread made from corn at sixty shillings a barrel. If our blessing is only in the fatness of the earth and the dew from heaven, it is the portion of the disinherited, and Lord Elgin said that it might one day fare ill with England to intercept or refused to share the more honourable part of the common inheritance. Appended to the poorer blessing to the lot of Esau, was a prophecy something like the prediction of which in the case of Ireland, Lord Elgin seems to have had before his mind in uttering the memorable words to him some months ago.

"I think the comparison of the results which have attended the connexion of England and Scotland and England and Ireland, will go very far to show how little a nation gains by succeeds in forcing its foreign laws, foreign institutions, foreign religion, upon a reluctant and high-spirited people. Oh, gentlemen, I fear, I greatly fear, that we have not learned that most valuable but most painful lesson to its children, to rely upon it, that if ever a collision takes place between the two great branches of the Anglo Saxon family, which dwell on the opposite shores of the Atlantic, that calamity, that disaster, that grievous that can befall either country, will be attributed to the humiliations which in bye-gone times England has imposed upon Ireland."

Ireland has doubtless, in the words of inspiration, lived sword and been the servant of her sister, and although never did the period seem more remote when the prophecy to which we have alluded might have its fulfilment, it would be wisdom in England to defeat its very possibility by obliterating every trace of legal inequality—every distinction of privilege between classes of Irish citizens, beyond that which their own deserts and the favour of the sovereign legitimately conferred might establish. We hope we may yet live to see the time when all vain pretensions upon this score shall be silenced, and all jealous heats allayed; when we shall have no insolent superiority upon the one side, or angry retort upon the other; when doctrines will be suffered to try title on the merits, when Catholics will have no cause of complaint, or Protestants of alarm; and when the grand characteristic of Christianity, so often missing in both, the love of each other, may be expected to appear. It is not probable that any statesman of the present time can have reached the height of this argument—nor even had he done so, is there likelihood of his being able to carry out so grand a scheme, but the career of Sir Robert Peel has taught us, and it is a lesson well worthy of note, that a great man who has made himself necessary to the people of England, can do anything. We cannot think that the man will always be wanting. Some one, encouraged by the example of Sir Robert Peel, and reassured by the justice now rendered to his policy, and to his motives, will be found to undertake the cause of the future, whether unpleaded and unprotected, or aided by the not unwelcome pressure of existing necessity; who, without neglecting the claims of friendship and the duties of political connexion, will set the interests of the country in the highest place; who will save the character of parliament from the pettiness of faction, though the faction be his own; who will relinquish small though immediate, profit for future and enduring gain; who doing what is right will be confident he has done best; hopeful of means but abiding consequences; and most valuing his mortal greatness as the title to immortal though it may be tardy gratitude. “*Quare imitemur nostros Brutos, Camillos, Ahalas, Decios * * amemus patriam, pareamus Senatui, consulamus bonis, presentes fructus negligamus, posteritati et gloriæ serviamus; id esse optimum putemus quod erit rectissimum; speremus quæ volumus sed quod acciderit feramus; cogitemus denique corpus virorum fortium magnorumque hominum esse mortale; animi vero motus et virtutis gloriam sempiternum.*”

ART. IX.—THE SMITHFIELD (DUBLIN) REFORMATORY

Captain Crofton's Letter to the Recorder of Birmingham

In our paper in the present number of this Review we have entered at considerable length into a disquisition on the merits of the admirable Refuge for Exemplary Prisoners founded by Captain Crofton, the Chairman of the Directors of the Convict Prisons in Ireland; but we cannot allow the opportunity to pass, of at once placing before our readers Captain Crofton's excellent and thoughtful Letter, addressed to the Recorder of Birmingham, and read by him at the Meeting of The National Reformatory Union, a full copy of which we have inserted in our QUARTERLY RECORD.

Captain Crofton was, from pressure of public business, unable to attend the Meeting, and thus placed his views on Reformation before the members of the Union :—

The Castle, Dublin, August 16, 1855

My dear Sir,

I regret very much that a pressure of public business prevents the possibility of my attending the approaching meeting of the National Reformatory Union at Bristol. I was anxious to have stated the views which has attended the application of the Reformatory system in this country previous to the discharge of Government Prisoners on this subject is so intimately connected with the one the Union has met to discuss (the majority of the convicts of to-day being juveniles who acted "sans discernement" yesterday) that I refrain from mentioning by letter a few circumstances and considerations which, unimportant as they may appear at first sight, contribute to establish the soundness of a principle big with important results affecting our colonies and ourselves, and at the present time calling for no ordinary exertion on the part of those interested in adult and juvenile Reformation. First, our plan is, for some time previous to the release of a well conducted Prisoner on Liberty, to train and prepare him for the world with which he is about to mix. This is effected, by removing him from the Prison to a Government Establishment, where by means of lectures on useful subjects; religious, moral, and industrial training, placing him in situations of trust, likely to engender self-respect, and the duties of messengers, &c., and I am glad to state, that the Prisoners have been on this duty for some months, necessitating their walking through the streets of Dublin with money in their pockets, not one instance has as yet taken place of any irregularity ; every proper safeguard against abuse is of course provided, such as noting the time and departure of messenger from each place he has to call, but at the same time if he has the will he has the power to do evil. It is by such demonstrations as these that objections to the employment of Criminals on discharge may be overcome ; we have abundant evidence of the well doing of the Prisoners who have been released after this probation, and the demand for their labor is quite equal to our supply, indeed at times exceeds it,—a large number having found employment in Dublin, opportunity has been afforded of judging of the practical working of the system. A loan fund instituted by the lecturer (Mr. Organ), affords a good test of the permanency of resolutions made in the Institution, and there are many traits of character brought forth by it, which prove that self-respect has been really restored.

Records are kept at the Smithfield Dépôt in Dublin, and abundant evidence afforded to satisfy any enquirer who may need information. Although it is to be expected that many may yet fail who will pass through this course, facts will prove that the principle is sound, and that the majority of Prisoners may be returned as useful members to society. So much for the Reformation, now for the economical part. A much greater quantity of work is performed than in the Prisons, with far less supervision and cost ; I have seen enough to shew me that able-bodied Prisoners so situated can be made self-supporting.

The interest taken by Lord Carlisle in this Institution has averted many difficulties that would otherwise have arisen, and has created a stimulus to both officers and Prisoners which has borne favorable fruits throughout the Prison service.

We are now training officers at Smithfield, so that when we pitch our tents for Public Works, the first of which will be the erection of a Juvenile Penal Reformatory, a well qualified staff will be ready.

I should now wish to apply this principle to the only colony open to us, "Western Australia," and will endeavor to shew that by so doing the present difficulties attending secondary punishments may be ameliorated, and the cause of "Reformation of adults, and juveniles" much forwarded. There can be no question that, whatever may be the efforts at home, we must have an outlet in the colonies ; it is a principal element in the Reformatory system that there should be a large and new field with a paucity of labor.

The colonists, however, judging of the Criminal classes they have known under the former system of Transportation all in the same category, and will not now receive them unless as demonstrated at home, and in the only colony we are able to experiment (Western Australia), that there are those who can safely be employed as the usual class of emigrants who leave their shores. Experience, which is in this country removing the difficulties must before long overcome it in countries where there is a scarcity of labor, and it is not too much to expect, that at no distant time the Colonists generally, will receive a reformed class of Criminals. Western Australia is reported as only being able to absorb a few convicts annually, but if this class of prisoners alone is taken into consideration the number can be so increased as to make the deportation of Criminals a valuable asset to the United Kingdom. There is no doubt that, from time to time, (as the conditional pardon men have done before them) the prisoners will move on to fields which offer greater advantages to the settler, and thus indirectly the whole Colony of Australia will be still open to a class of Reformed Prisoners, no injustice being done to the colonists at the same time. When their objections vanish, as soon they assuredly will, what a field is at once opened up for the furtherance of our Juvenile Reformatories, Refuges, &c., &c. To invite to the experiment, a public meeting has been recently held in Western Australia, forwarding resolutions to the Government highly approving the Reformatory system of treating Criminals. There is no doubt that much labor on the part of the Government and Governor will be required, but the stake for this cause is great, and must not be trifled with; the question directly affecting the social well-being.

Many may consider the circumstance of getting rid of the Criminals as of paramount importance, but it is a short-sighted view that will redound at a future day to our discomfort. To deal with and punish this class of Criminals, we have sufficient Prisons and Public Works at Gibraltar, Bermuda and at home, with an efficient staff to control them when their sentences have expired; but there is a more numerous class which, although not so innately bad, is more troublesome in this country, and constantly re-convicted, who are more susceptible of Reformatory influences, and in a new field, where their associations severed, become, after a proper course of treatment, home, reformed members of the community. Those accustomed to criminals will at once recognize the class I allude to, as one which, from bad training as children, and evil companions, have at last found their way to the Convict Establishments, and now form the great majority of the inmates.

Any person who reads the latest accounts from Western Australia, will observe that, though it does not present equal advantages with many other Colonies which are barred to our criminals, there are yet sufficient to answer the purpose required, and is capable of unlimited extension at a comparatively small increase of expense. The foundation of a new Colony and its consequent outlay, can apparently only serve to re-enact the old system of Transportation. Reformation and absorption without a community is impossible, the formation of one no easy task. Energy and a proper system thrown into "Western Australia," where already much money has been spent, will demonstrate to Moreton Bay which hesitates, and the other Colonies that refuse to receive Convicts, what we have lately learnt ourselves, that by classification and selection, a majority of Criminals may be profitably restored to society.

I can only add that our system (such as it is) is open to the inspection of those interested; details can be seen at the Smithfield Institution, amply corroborating what has been adduced, and although experience shews each month something to add or subtract, still the great principle remains untouched, viz., that a very large percentage of Criminals can, by a system of Reformatory training, introduced towards the termination of their sentences, be restored to the society they have outraged, as industrious and useful members, and that during the prosecution of such system they may be more profitably employed for the public service than in any other way yet suggested.

Believe me, my dear Sir,

Yours very truly,

WALTER CROFTON.

M. D. HILL, Esq., &c.

This admirable letter is of the very chiefest importance, and we believe that there is not one student of the great and difficult questions connected with Secondary Punishments and Prison Discipline, that will not thank Captain Crofton for the assistance his communication affords.

We have read this letter with mingled feelings of satisfaction and of anxiety. Of satisfaction, that something is at last done to prove that we can bless our colonies, not curse them, by sending out those who have been in Prison; of anxiety, lest the chance may be lost by permitting the transportation from England, of the old class of convicts, unreformed, untaught, and more deeply vitiated by unenlightened or careless systems of prison management.

West Australia is now our only colony to which convicts can be sent; why should the convict be sent, why not send the reformed man who has proved his reformation in such prisons as the Mountjoy, at such public works as Spike Island, in such Refuges as Smithfield?

Those men have made characters; they know that colonial life means work; they know that deportation to Australia is a boon; they know that in that new land there is "bread and work for all;" they have gone through the bitter pains of work, that brought no reward until reformation had been proved; they have experienced the full benefit of that silent separation, with which the life of the convict is wisely commenced, and in which reflection is made inevitable; they have been taught the first steps of knowledge, and of self-knowledge; their minds have been enlarged by the Smithfield lectures; they have been humanized, and taught self-respect in Smithfield; they have been dressed in ordinary clothes; they have seen the faces of those who can sympathize with them, and understand them; they have been tested and taught self-dependence by being sent out into the city as messengers, with money in their pockets,—they have, in a word, been taught that they are MEN, and that a convict can be an honest man if he desires to remake himself.

Such men as these are a boon to a Colony—they are just the patient, enduring, suffering-taught men who make the bone and muscle of a young nation. They are not as the raff of idlers, scapegraces, and often rogues, who throng the Colony, characterless and idle—they are the class who should be sent to a Colony, not as a punishment, but as a high reward.

Such a chance as this is now offered by Smithfield, and will be offered by English Institutions as soon as Captain Crofton's plan shall be fully understood; but if Colonel Jebb is permitted to send out, to transport the usual class of convicts, a class which he appears to think are suited for the colonies because they are by him considered irreclaimable, we must expect failure and disgrace upon all our efforts, possibly we may find our colonists unwilling to receive our convicts, our governors, or our Legislation.

In our minds, the system of transportation should be stopped until the Select Committee of last session shall have reported : there is no occasion for extreme hurry, and there is the most imminent danger in a further adoption, or continuation, of the old course favored by Colonel Jebb. His motto is—Transport your worst convicts to the Colony as a punishment;—Captain Crofton's plan is—keep your worst convicts at home, and send your best to the Colonies as a reward.

No men are better able to distinguish between the reformed and unreformed convict, than our Colonists. Even amid the excitements at Victoria they declared that "no unreformed" convicts should be admitted, and although not more than three days afterwards, they declared that "no convicts" should enter, yet the first statement showed their full knowledge of the distinctions between the two classes ; their second statement was the result of a conviction that the Government at home did not know how to reform, or would only transport those who were too hardened for amendment.

Smithfield can send those colonist of West Australia "reformed convicts;" the Golden Bridge Refuge can send them reformed female convicts ; Captain Crofton will stake his principle upon the good conduct of the first ; the Sisters of Mercy are fearless as to the good conduct of the second. These men and women would, probably, remain honest at home, they will be certain to remain honest and virtuous if sent to the colonies : if sent where labor is wanted, where strong hands and true hearts bring competence if not wealth, and where the women who might be vicious here from poverty or neglect, will have a certainty of being married if she shall feel inclined. West Australia is a most eligible field for female emigration ; the extraordinary excess in number of males over females, is every day becoming more patent and more embarrassing ; reformed women can be sent there and do a service to the colony ; the unreformed can be sent only as a curse, and to furnish new seed-plots of crime, of misery, and of woeful disease.

We say to our English readers, come over and examine Smithfield and Golden Bridge ; come and see men and women fit for freedom, not the half savage race, suited only for the dungeon, and who, because only suited for a dungeon, are sent out to bring disgrace on England, and misfortune on her dependencies.

We are very happy in being enabled to state that a PATRON-

AGE SOCIETY is now formed, for the purpose of providing lodgings for those discharged from Smithfield, and employed in Dublin. Four sets of lodgings are now occupied, and we understand that most excellent results are already appearing. The subscription to the PATRONAGE SOCIETY is limited to one pound. All information will be afforded by Mr. J. P. Organ, who can be addressed at Smithfield Institution, or at Mespil Lodge, Mespil Parade, Upper Leeson street, Dublin.

We have, just as we were going to press, received the following Circular :—

Smithfield Refuge for Exemplary Prisoners, September 8th, 1856.

This Institution, founded by the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, and which has now been in successful action during the past eight months, affording to the most exemplary class of convicts a place of probation between the prison and the world, and admitted by the most competent authorities to be the best solution to the great and important question—“WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR CONVICTS?”

Satisfied as all the friends of this Institution are with its success, they believe that that success cannot reach its fullest point of development without the agency of a PATRONAGE SOCIETY, which will aid in procuring employment for the men, and also in securing lodgings in reputable although humble portions of the city, and for which the men will be, as is well known, most happy to pay.

A few gentlemen well acquainted with, and interested in, Reformatory Systems and Prison Discipline, have agreed to act as a Committee until later in the year, when the inhabitants of Dublin shall have returned to the city at the close of the season, when it is proposed that a public meeting shall be called, and at which the objects of the Society can be explained at length.

Meanwhile all communications may be addressed to Mr. J. P. ORGAN at the Institution, Smithfield, where he attends each evening from 5 to 7 o’Clock.

ART. X.—ART IN THE CLOISTER.

Lives of the most eminent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects of the Order of S. Dominic. Translated from the Italian of Father Marchese of the same Institute, with Notes, &c.
By The Rev. C. P. Meehan. 2 vols. Dublin: James Duffy. 1852.

Some fifty years ago the title of these volumes would have appeared to many that of a romance, and even in these days when the conviction that a man may be a Catholic priest, or even a monk, and yet a scholar or an artist, forces itself reluctantly on a large portion of the public.

Ignorance and prejudice have combined with malice to misrepresent and blacken the monastic character. It is in no spirit of religious partizanship that we write, when we condemn, with every fair and judicious man, the attempts of those prejudiced and uncandid writers with whom a monk is a word synonymous with superstition, ignorance, and brutality.

If the character, as drawn by them, possesses the least ingenuity or intellect, these are sure to be applied to the worst ends, to the gratification of every debased and sensual passion, and, under the pretence of the advancement of religion, to personal aggrandisement and advancement.

Few, however, now a days, with the least pretensions to the title of educated, are ignorant of the history of what are called the Dark Ages—few who do not know that, for six centuries, the lamp of learning, of science, and of art, was preserved from extinction, and fed with its supporting oil, within the walls of the monasteries and convents.

Boundless hospitality, true hospitality, knowing no distinction of rank or creed, hospitality that welcomed with even hand the beggar and the prince, the heretic and the true believer, that threw open wide the gates, and gave the cheerful welcome to all comers, was the characteristic of the convent in the olden time.

The weary traveller, foot-sore and fainting on his lone journey, beheld the convent walls rising to his view in the dim twilight, and his frame was animated with renewed vigor. He entered without hesitation, assured of the welcome, and was greeted with courtesy tempered with humility. The cheerful board was set, and the good things from which the monastic rule debars themselves, were plentifully set forth to be enjoyed by the guests of the brotherhood. Then went round those ancient legends, some of which have descended to us illustrated by the pencils of their narrators, and in which historic truth and fiction were so curiously blended ; and while some of the community remained to dispense the hospitality of the house, others retired to their cells, some to prayer and meditation, and some to pursue the tasks of transcription or illumination, to which to this hour literature is so much indebted.

Truly those men well merited the name of slothful by whose unceasing toil, early and late applied, barren and desolate tracts grew into fruitful farms or bloomy gardens ; well were they called ignorant and brutal whose hands produced those manuscripts, those pictures, and those statues which still exist for our admiration ; well were they styled avaricious and grasping whose boundless hospitality embraced all comers.

In every age, and to the present hour, the monastery has been a refuge for men who, sated with the pleasures of the world, and convinced of the hollowness and nothingness of its delusions, desire to close their days in seclusion and the practice of devotion. We have never visited any of the noble continental monasteries, a few of which still remain, and marked the many noble though attenuated faces that meet the view, the flashing eye, subdued by religious feeling, which glances forth from under many a dark cowl, without thinking of the monk of St. David's, and fancying we see the melancholy half pitying glance which he throws upon the rough warrior who dismisses so carelessly his admonitory counsel :—

“Again on the knight looked the churchman old,
And again he sighed heavily,
For he had himself been a warrior bold,
And fought in Spain and Italy ;
And he thought of the days that were long since by,
When his limbs were strong and his courage was high.”

And again :—

“The monk gazed long on the lovely moon,
Then into the night he looked forth,

And red and bright the streamers light
 Were glancing in the glowing north ;
 So had he seen in fair Castile
 The youth in glittering squadrons start
 Sudden, the flying jennett wheel,
 And hurl the unexpected dart."*

But it is not alone to the weary and disappointed man that the monastery affords a refuge. Numbers enter at an early age, feeling conscious that its seclusion and repose are best fitted to the contemplative turn of their minds. The majority of these are persons of intellect and education, many of genius, and some of high birth and connexions, and here they all experience the truth of the words,

"Bonum est nos hic esse, quia homo vivit purius, eadit rarius, surgit velocius, incedit cautius, quiescit securius, moritur felicius, purgatur citius, præmiatur copiosus."

It is little surprising that the arts of painting and sculpture, in especial, should have had in the ancient monasteries their refuge and asylum.

The men who had forsaken rank, and power, and wealth, and broken all worldly ties, to consecrate to Religion, not alone their mortal frames, but their powers of mind and genius, could have had no higher or more glorious object for the exercise of those powers than the exemplification and illustration, by the labors of the chisel or the palette, of the history and mysteries of that religion to which they were body and soul devoted.

To raise fitting temples for the practice of Religion, architecture was studied and improved ; to adorn these temples, and to impress the unlettered multitude, painting and sculpture were employed, and by their means were brought vividly before the eyes those great events in the history of Christianity which formed the fundamental part of the general belief.

No inspiration could equal that which flowed from a religious source into the minds of these men, no sublunary motive could animate their toil, and lend that perfection to their labors which the desire to glorify their Creator and exalt his name and works supplied ; nor could they ever have imparted to the countenances of their painted figures the sweetness and beauty and refined spirituality which characterize them, had they not in their own minds and hearts, a perennial spring and fountain of heavenly charity and love.

When the history of all the painters, architects and sculptors which the monastic orders produced in the middle ages, has been written, the world will perhaps be willing to acknowledge what is due to that institution.

In the writer of the original of the volumes before us, the Dominican order have found an able and enthusiastic historian, who in his turn has been happy in the labors of an accomplished and elegant translator. The Rev. Mr. Meehan is a ripe and well read scholar, he expresses himself eloquently, and we cannot avoid heartily commending the spirit in which he has devoted himself to his task, and while he has established, by bringing before the general reading public, the claims of the Dominican order to the respect and admiration of the artist, and the lover of art, he has shewn that the Catholic priesthood, in these days, is not without its men of ability and merit.

The history of the origin and progress of the Dominican, or preaching friars, is now pretty generally known. The names of Albertus Magnus, Aquinas, and Savonarola, are familiar to all, but in the volumes before us we have a want supplied.

Though they embrace an account of the sculptors and architects, they are principally devoted, and justly, to the history of the painters of the Dominican order. Of these the highest places have by general consent been assigned to Fra Angelico da Fiesole and Bartolommeo della Porta.

Fra Angelico was born near Florence, in the year 1337. His family name is unknown, but the purity of his life gained for him the designation by which he is now known, "Angelico," and he was also distinguished by that of "Beato," or Blessed, Fra being a familiar word for Frate, or Brother.

His early instruction in painting is unknown, but it appears that he at first devoted himself to the illuminating Choral books, which practice was at the time the usual introduction to more ambitious efforts.

Having entered the Dominican order, Fra Angelico subsequently joined the Convent at Fiesole, founded by Giovanni de Domenico Bacchini, and having been by religious and political disturbances driven thence, he, with others of his Convent, settled for a time at Cortona.

When the disturbances which had driven him from Fiesole had become composed, he returned thither and there executed a large number of his best works.

In the pontificate of Eugenius the Fourth, he was summoned to Rome, where he worked under Nicholas the Fifth, and where, having declined the dignity of Archbishop of Florence, he died in 1455.

Nicholas the Fifth ordered a marble monument to be erected to his memory, in the church of the Minerva, (Santa Maria sopra Minerva), and according to some, wrote for it the following inscription:—

The fresco representing the Crucifixion, and painted by Fra Angelico, on the walls of the chapter room of the Convent of St. Mark at Florence, is thus described by Mrs. Jameson, in the introduction to her "Legends of the Monastic Orders:—"

In the centre of the picture is the Redeemer crucified between the two thieves. At the foot of the cross is the usual group of the Virgin fainting in the arms of St. John the Evangelist, Mary Magdalene, and another Mary. To the right of this group, and the left of the spectator, is seen St. Mark, as patron of the convent, kneeling, and holding his Gospel; behind him stands St. John the Baptist, as protector of the city of Florence. Beyond are the three martyrs, St. Laurence, St. Cosmo, and St. Damian, patrons of the Medici family. The two former, as patrons of Cosmo and Lorenzo de' Medici, look up to the Saviour with devotion; St. Damian turns away and hides his face. On the left of the cross we have the group of the founders of the various Orders. First, St. Dominick, kneeling, with hands outspread, gazes up at the Crucified; behind him St. Augustine, and St. Albert the Carmelite, mitred and robed as bishops; in front kneels St. Jerome as a Jeronymite hermit, the cardinal's hat at his feet; behind him kneels St. Francis; behind St. Francis stand two venerable figures, St. Benedict and St. Romualdo; and in front of them kneels St. Bernard, with his book; and, still more in front, St. John Gualberto, in the attitude in which he looked up at the crucifix when he spared his brother's murderer. Beyond this group of monks Angelico has introduced two of the famous friars of his own community. St. Peter Martyr kneels in front, and behind him stands St. Thomas Aquinas; the two, thus placed together, represent the sanctity and the learning of the Dominican Order, and close this sublime and wonderful composition. Thus considered, we may read it like a sacred poem, and every separate figure is a study of character. I hardly know any thing in painting finer than the pathetic beauty of the head of the penitent thief, and the mingled fervour and intellectual refinement in the head of St. Bernard.

Of one of Angelico's "Final Judgments," Father Marchese gives us the following eloquent description:—

It now remains for us to speak of that Final Judgment, which of all the Angelico's works, appears to me to be the most stupendous. From the days of Niccola Pisano, to those of Michelangelo, this subject tasked the art and genius of the most celebrated artists, who, for the most part, vied with each other in painting the joys of the Just, and the despair of the Doomed, as Allighieri had sung them. Indeed they had almost exhausted themselves in depicting the tardy disenchantment and appalling tortures of the reprobate: in inventing fanciful agonies, and unprecedented writhings; so much so, that the heart and soul must shudder at sight of that terrible scene which Signorelli produced in Orvieto, and Buonarrotti at Rome. Man, it is true, is conversant with sorrows and woes; and he can well depict them in verse, or on canvas; but when he undertakes to paint joy his imagery is defective, nor does he know in what guise he should develop it. Wherefore, as the drama of the Final Judgment consists of two most distinct acts; that is, of extreme joy, and of extreme sorrow, it was almost impossible to convey a lucid idea of the former, for since God has not revealed the joy of heaven to man, how will he, most miserable, essay to describe it in words or tintings of the pencil. To Giovanni Angelico alone, this power was given; and none of those who preceded or followed him have surpassed him in this most difficult experiment.

There are four pictures by him on this subject, two in Rome, and two in Florence. The first is in the gallery of Prince Corsini—it is that mentioned by Bottari in his notes to Vasari's Life of Fra Giovanni; the second was in the collection of the late Cardinal Fesch; the third is in the Academy of Design in Florence, it is a compartment of the doors in the Annunziata Church; and the fourth is actually in the possession of the Camaldulose Monks in S. Maria degli Angioli. All of them are splendid, but in my judgment the last is the most perfect, and it was for many years suspended over the sedilia, or seat used by the priests during the celebration of the chaunted Mass. It is about seven palms long, and its summit is in the form of three arches, the central one being largest, and the two side ones smaller. The Final Judgment occupies the central one; in that on the right he painted Paradise; and in that on the left, Hell. The figures are of the dimensions of these which he painted on the gradini of his pictures. The Judge of the living and the dead is seated in great majesty in the centre. He is encircled by choirs of angels, cherubim and seraphim, and you behold the Virgin, with arms crossed on her bosom, turning on her Son a look of love, and making her last intercession for miserable sinners. Ah, what words could describe her trepidation for such an immense section of the human race? A left and right of that tremendous judgment-seat, enthroned on clouds, are Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles, the series of whom is closed by S. Dominic and S. Francis. From the gold ground of the picture springs a torrent of light that reveals the glory of the Elect. At the feet of our Lord an angel raises on high the triumphal ensign of the Cross, whilst two other blow trumpets, whose sound causes man to shake off the sleep of ages, and to arise from the grave. The Supreme Judge is in the act of fulminating His malediction against the reprobate. Let not the reader fancy Him with His right hand stretched out, or that there is anything like human vengeance on His features, as others would depict Him; on the contrary, there is nothing irate in His expression: He merely turns away His eyes from the Doomed, and, by a waive of His hand, commands them to withdraw for ever from His presence. A most simple act this, but, surely, far more eloquent and sublime than any terrible menace. A brief space divides the Elect from the Damned. Michelangiolo painted both naked in the Sixtine: Zuccheri, in the cupola of the cathedral at Florence, represents the damned naked, and the elect clothed; and Luca Signorelli follows the former in his Judgment in Orvieto, employing only as much drapery as was required by modesty. Giovanni Angelico clothed all his figures equally, thus, not only preserving decorum, but greatly heightening the moral and religious effect of the whole composition; for we are thus enabled to recognise those whom the painter placed amongst the lost, as well as those who are made the recipients of eternal joy; from which the spectator may learn a salutary lesson. Thus Dante, not satisfied with having recounted the agonies to which his damned were sentenced, or the blisses which his elect enjoyed, determined to give us the names of the most distinguished amongst them, and to narrate, also, the virtues and the vices accordingly to which they were adjudged. He thought, no doubt, that he might thus awaken admiration for the one, and detestation for the other. It would appear that the Angelico was influenced by a similar motive. Hence, you behold amongst the accursed, persons of every age, grade, and condition, and especially many ministers of the sanctuary; a fact that should not startle us, when we recall the licentious days of the schism already alluded to in this work. Hence it is that he has placed so many monks, prelates, cardinals, and Antipopes amongst the damned; for, indeed, we cannot think that a painter of his well-known sanctity could have imagined the disturbers of the peace of the Church in these times worthy of any other location. Dante did the same, for other reasons, and also to impart a great moral lesson. It has been well remarked, that the countenances of the doomed do not exhibit the fury and despair that is given them by other painters; on the contrary, we find them undeceived and overwhelmed with grief for having forfeited the supreme good that was in store for them, as well as the elect, if they had observed the divine commandments. Strange and bizarre is the form in which the Angelico painted his demons; and it must be confessed that, in this portraiture, he lacked imagination. He divided Hell into seven circles, (or bolgi,) in each of which, according to the nature of the seven capital vices, there are various torments and tormented. And this portion of the painting, if it be not in every respect perfect in its composition, yields to that which follows in design and execution. The idea of finding the "Emperor who sways the realm of sorrow" in the depth of the abyss is somewhat poetical, and is evidently taken from Dante, for, indeed, the three-headed monster, who

"At every mouth his teeth a sinner champed, Bruised as with ponderous engine; so that three Were in this gulfe tormented,"* was not such a figure as would have presented itself to the imagination of Fra Giovanni, who seems to have contemplated little else than celestial beauty. But where this painter triumphs and establishes his title to the name of Angelico, with which the people honoured him, is on the right side of the picture, where we behold the Elect. Who can see these graceful little figures and not be enamoured of virtue? Who is it that does not yearn to taste the holy and ineffable joys of these blessed beings; who, having fought the good fight, and completed their term of exile, are now approaching their true country, to enjoy that reward for which they longed and for sake of which they had suffered so many afflictions? They all have their eyes and arms turned towards their Redeemer, and they seem to bless and thank Him for having placed them among his Elect.
